CHAPTER XI page 293

I go to Cesena to take possession of a treasure. I stay in Francia's house. His daughter Genoveffa.

I attempt my magical operation. A terrible storm comes up. My fear. Genoveffa remains pure. I give up, and sell the sheath to Capitani. I meet Giulietta again, with the pretended Count Celi, now Count Alfani. I decide to go to Naples. What puts me on a different road.

I buy a fine carriage and leave for Parma with the old Captain and the young Frenchwoman. I see Genoveffa again and present her with a fine pair of gold bracelets. My perplexities concerning my female traveling companion. Monologue. Conversation with the Captain. Private interview with the Frenchwoman.

CHAPTER III page 38

I set out from Bologna a happy man. The Captain leaves us at Reggio, where I spend the night with Henriette. Our arrival in Parma. Henriette resumes the dress of her sex; our mutual happiness. I encounter some of my relatives, but do not make myself known.

CHAPTER IV page 54

I take a box at the opera despite Henriette's reluctance. Monsieur Dubois comes to call, he dines with us; trick which my mistress plays on him. Henriette reasons on happiness. We call on Dubois; extraordinary talent which my wife displays there. Monsieur Dutillot. The court gives a magnificent entertainment in the palace gardens; our disastrous encounter there. I have an interview with Monsieur d'Antoine, the Infante's favorite.

APPENDIX

Giovanni Battista Manuzzi's Report to the Inquisitors Concerning Casanova's Activities, July 17, 1755.

Bernard de Muralt's Letter to Albrecht von Haller.

INTRODUCTION

I

There is something tricky, audacious, shameless, violent, Venetian, fascinating—apart from the quaint inhibitions that are so commonly associated with him—in Casanova's genius, and his mental activity, up to the age of seventy-three, was as prodigious as the activity which he had expended in living a multiform and incalculable life; creating, as he did in Dux during the intervals of fourteen years, his Memoirs, in which he reveals his naked soul, in which truth is deftly blended with what is obviously imaginary in the interminable descriptions of his amours—the amours of an insatiable lover.

And yet these Memoirs are perhaps the most valuable document which we possess on the society of the eighteenth century; they are the history of a unique life, a unique personality, one of the greatest of autobiographies; as a record of adventures, they are more entertaining than Gil Blas or Monte Cristo, or any of the purely imaginary travels, and escapes, and masquerades in life, which have been done into books. They tell the story of a man who loved life passionately for its own sake; one to whom woman was, indeed, the most important thing in the world, but to whom nothing in the world was indifferent.

"The man's own portrait," writes Charles Whibley, "offers a partial explanation of the enterprise of the eighteenth century. The hungry eye, the hawk-like nose, the savagely determined chin, indicate the selfish necessity of acquisition and enjoyment. On the other hand, the high receding forehead bears witness at once to intellect and fatuity." In this extraordinary and emaciated face all the fury and rage and disquietude of the man's temperament seem to be in a kind of eternal conflict. Pride, unvanquished pride, glitters in the hawk's eyes; the cheeks are ravaged with ravines of wrinkles; that lust which means always to him as much as life itself pervades the entire huge face; there is, you might say, something of the ferocity of the wolf, and something of the cruel craft of the serpent. Surely his portraits as well as his writings prove that he was vividly alive, full of fiery energy and calm resource. He was a thinker and a fighter in one; a scholar, an adventurer, perhaps a Cabalist, a busy stirrer in politics, a gamester, one "born for the fairer sex," as he tells us, and born also to be a vagabond; this man, who is remembered now for his written account of his own life, was that rarest kind of autobiographer, one who did not live to write, but wrote because he had lived, and when he could live no longer.

Our Casanova, impenitent courtier of all the hazards that exist, is the supreme protagonist of the unmoral will; his code of conduct, if he may be said to have had one, was written in the white-hot moment of action to suit the directions of his energy; and because these directions were many, there is no apparent consistency between the generous action and lofty imagination that are so often revealed in the Memoirs, and the rogueries of which he was not incapable. He is frank; he writes down in a most incongruous fashion his vices and his virtues, sparing himself not at all in his meanest moments; and if Casanova was, as he proclaimed himself, a philosopher, it may be said of him that he was not afraid to put his philosophy to the test of experience.

Never was there such an eager traveller! He mixed himself up in vast enterprises, he jostled with curious crowds in every important city of the continent; and as for following his wanderings, it is not only to lose oneself in a desert, but almost utterly to exhaust the map of Europe. His Memoirs give us sidelights, all the more valuable in being almost accidental, upon many of the affairs and people most interesting to us during two-thirds of the eighteenth century. Giacomo Casanova was born in Venice, of Spanish and Italian parentage, on April 2nd, 1725; he died at the Château of Dux, in Bohemia, on June 4th, 1798. In that lifetime of seventy-three years he travelled, as his Memoirs show us, in Italy, France, Germany, Austria, England, Switzerland, Belgium, Russia, Poland, Spain, Holland, Turkey; he met Voltaire at Ferney, Rousseau at Montmorenci, Fontenelle, d'Alembert and Crébillon at Paris, George III in London, Louis XV at Fontainebleau, Catherine the Great at St. Petersburg, Benedict XII at Rome, Joseph II at Vienna, Frederick the Great at Sans-Souci.

Casanova—a mass of tangled nerves which he generally managed to control—has striven, at his finest, not only to excite our senses with his most intimate confessions, but to touch our nerves to the quick. His narrative is vivid and image-provoking; his dialogue is spirited and witty; his characters are worthy of a great dramatist. Hundreds of persons are sketched in by his swift pen to stand out distinct as individual and living beings. As Uzanne says, he relates to us more than a hundred adventures conducted to some delectable end because they are deliciously alive and because they have an infinite variety, and all this with the aid of "une verve éroto-comique, parfois tragico-phallique." So our phallic Hermes pursues his adventures, which land him either in the island of Cythera or on that of Paphos.

II

The Memoirs, as we have them, break off abruptly at the moment when Casanova is expecting a safe conduct and the permission to return to Venice after twenty years' wanderings. In 1774, at the age of forty-nine, he wrote in the last volume: "I returned to Trieste, determined to do my best for the Tribunal, for I longed to return to Venice after nineteen years' wanderings. I expected no more of Fortune's gifts, for the Deity despises those of ripe age. I thought, however, that I might live comfortably and independently at Venice. I had talents and experience, and I hoped to make use of them, and I thought the Inquisitors would feel bound to give me sufficient employment." This they did; he received permission from them on the 3rd of September, 1774, to return to Venice; he was their Secret Agent from that year until 1782. At the end of 1782 he left Venice; and it was in the spring of 1783 (not in the spring of 1784 as it was generally supposed) that Casanova was presented, at a banquet in Paris at the Venetian Ambassador's, by Abbate Eusebio della Luna, to Count Joseph Waldstein; he was invited by him to become his librarian at Dux; this he accepted, and for the fourteen remaining years of his life he lived at Dux, where he wrote his Memoirs.

It is impossible to conjecture when he commenced that prodigious task, as prodigious as his mental activity, as his vitality up to the age of seventy-three. The first reference to them occurs in Histoire de ma Fuite des Prisons de la République de Venise, qu'on appelle les Plombs, finished in 1787, printed at Leipzig in 1788. "Whenever I am seized by the desire of writing the story of all that has happened to me in the course of twenty-eight years that I have spent in wandering over the whole of Europe, up to that moment when it pleased the Inquisitors of State to give me permission to return to Venice in an honourable fashion (on the 3rd of September, 1774), I shall begin it at this point, and my readers will find it written with the same style, for there is no writer who has more than one."

There are some references to the Memoirs in his letters to Opiz; in one written in 1791, he says: "I write thirteen hours a day and these thirteen hours seem as if they were thirteen minutes. I amuse myself because I do not invent. What pains me most is that I am in duty bound to disguise certain names, for I have no authority to publish the affairs of others. I have written two-thirds of my Life, which will make six volumes. I say everything, I never spare myself, and yet I cannot as a man of honour give the name of Confessions to my Memoirs, for I make no repentance, and without repentance one cannot be absolved. Do you suppose I praise myself? Not at all." He writes on the 27th of July, 1792: "I have arrived at the end of my twelfth volume at the age of forty-seven. I must assure you that my cynisme is so outrageous in all the details of my too vivid adventures up to the age of fifty that my life would be a work, and such a work that the reading of it would be prohibited in every land where one loves good morals. I am a detestable man, and I don't care who knows it. Besides that, my instructed readers would divine the names of all the women and would cry out against my soul's perfidy." On the 20th of July, 1796, he writes: "Pour ce qui regarde mes Mémoires, je crois que je les laisserai là, car depuis l'âge de cinquante ans je ne peux débiter que du triste, et cela me rend triste. Je ne les ai écrits que pour m'égaier avec mes lecteurs; actuellement je les affligerois, et cela ne vaut pas la peine."

There, evidently, he rings down the curtain, and for reasons known to himself alone. And yet he writes, near the end of his life, in reference to the year 1768: "If these Memoirs, written only to console myself in the dreadful weariness which is slowly killing me in Bohemia—and which, perhaps, would kill me anywhere else, since, though my body is old, my spirit and my desires are as young as ever—if these Memoirs are ever read, they will be read only when I am gone, and all censure will be lost on me. Why should I not be veracious? A man can have no object in deceiving himself, and it is chiefly for myself that I write."

III

Casanova died in 1798, but nothing was heard of the Memoirs (which the Prince de Ligne in his own Memoirs tells us Casanova had read to him, and in which he found "du dramatique, de la rapidité, du comique, de la philosophie, des choses neuves, sublimes, inimitables même") until the year 1820, when a certain Carlo Angiolini brought to the publishing house of Brockhaus, in Leipzig, a manuscript entitled Histoire de ma vie jusqu'à l'an 1797, in the handwriting of Casanova.

This manuscript, in its original state, has never been printed. Herr Brockhaus, on obtaining possession of the manuscript, had it translated into German by Wilhelm Schutz, but with many omissions and alterations, and published this translation, volume by volume, from 1822 to 1828, under the title, Aus den Memoiren des Venetianers Jacob Casanova de Seingalt. While the German edition was in course of publication, Herr Brockhaus employed a certain Jean Laforgue, a professor of the French language at Dresden, to revise the original manuscript, correcting Casanova's vigorous, but at times incorrect and often somewhat Italian French according to his own notions of elegant writing, suppressing passages which seemed too free-spoken from the point of view of morals and of politics, and altering the names of some of the persons referred to, or replacing those names by initials. This revised text was published in twelve volumes, the first two in 1826, the third and fourth in 1828, the fifth to the eighth in 1832, and the ninth to the twelfth in 1838; the first four bearing the imprint of Brockhaus at Leipzig and Ponthieu et Cie. at Paris, the next four the imprint of Heideloff et Campé at Paris, and the last four nothing but "A Bruxelles." The volumes are all uniform and were all really printed for the firm of Brockhaus.

IV

Casanova's Memoirs were proved to have been written by himself by Armand Baschet in his Preuves curieuses de l'authenticité des Mémoires de Jacques Casanova de Seingalt in Le Livre, 1881; these were corroborated by two articles of Alessandro d'Ancona in 1882. After these, the singular good fortune was reserved for me of being the first to discover the most interesting things contained in masses of Casanova's manuscripts preserved in Dux, done up in six large cardboard cases, the very existence of which was known only to a few, and to most of these only on hearsay. Beyond the publication of a few fragments, nothing at that time, in 1899, had been done with these manuscripts, nor had an account of them ever been given by anyone who had been allowed to examine them, except myself. Baschet had never himself seen the manuscript of the Memoirs, but he had learnt all the facts about it from Messrs. Brockhaus, and he had himself examined the numerous papers relating to Casanova in the Venetian archives. A similar examination was made at the Frari at about the same time by the Abbé Fulin; and I myself, in 1894, not knowing at the time that the discovery had been already made, made it over again for myself. There the arrest of Casanova, his imprisonment in the Piombi, the exact date of his escape, the name of the monk who accompanied him, are all authenticated by documents contained in the Riferte of the Inquisitors of State; there are the bills for the repairs of the roof and walls of the cell from which he escaped; there are the reports of the spies on whose information he was arrested for his too dangerous free-spokenness in matters of religion and morality. The same archives contain forty-eight letters of Casanova to the Inquisitors of State, dating from 1763 to 1782, among the Riferte dei Confidenti, or reports of secret agents; the earliest asking permission to return to Venice, the rest giving information in regard to the immoralities of the city, after his return there; all in the same handwriting as the Memoirs.

In September, 1899, I was shown at Leipzig the actual manuscript Histoire de ma Vie jusqu'à l'an 1797, in Casanova's handwriting. The manuscript I examined is written on foolscap paper, rather rough and yellow; it is written on both sides of the page and in sheets or quires; here and there the paging shows that some pages have been omitted, and in their place are smaller sheets of thinner and whiter paper, all in Casanova's handsome, unmistakable handwriting. The manuscript is done up in twelve bundles, corresponding with the twelve volumes of the original edition, and in only one place is there a gap. The fourth and fifth chapters of the twelfth volume are missing, as the editor of the original edition points out, adding: "It is not probable that these two chapters have been withdrawn from the manuscript of Casanova by a strange hand; everything leads us to believe that the author himself suppressed them, with the intention, no doubt, of re-writing them, but without having found time to do so." And, as I have said, the manuscript ends with the year 1774.

Just here I may mention my own most important discovery at Dux; that is to say, a manuscript entitled Extrait du Chapitre 4 et 5. It is written on paper similar to that on which the Memoirs are written; the pages are numbered 104-108; and though it is described as Extract, it seems to contain, at all events, the greater part of the missing chapters in Volume Twelve. It is curious that this very important document, which supplies the one missing link in the Memoirs, should never have been discovered by any of the few people who have had the opportunity of looking over the Dux manuscripts. I am inclined to explain it by the fact that the case in which I found this manuscript contains some papers not relating to Casanova.

There is a mass of evidence in letters, still extant, written during Casanova's lifetime, proving the genuineness of the Memoirs. For instance, on April 8th, 1791, Casanova writes to Carlo Grimani, saying, "I have written the story of my life." He goes on to say that the MSS. will remain in the possession of Waldstein, who, he supposes, will print them after his death; supposing also that they would be printed in six or seven volumes in octavo. They were, as we know, printed in twelve volumes.

On January 17th, 1792, Waldstein writes to Casanova: "The story of your life will certainly give me pleasure, but I do not know how to have it brought to me, as there are no conveyances that come from Prague unless they come from Vienna." On August 1st, 1797, Cecilia Roggendorff writes: "You say in one of your letters that before you die you will bequeath to me the fifteen volumes of your Memoirs." In answer to this he sent her a copy of his Précis de ma Vie, dated September 17th, 1792, the original of which is in Dux.

It seems to me that there are many and good reasons for believing that Casanova actually and deliberately ended his Memoirs in 1774, in which year at the age of forty-nine he returned to Venice. References to the work in his later letter, already quoted (cf. Opiz above) seem to bear out this point. In his Histoire de ma Fuite des Prisons he definitely states that the proposed Memoirs will deal with his adventures "up to the moment when it pleased the State Inquisitors to give me permission to return to Venice in an honourable fashion." It ought to be remembered that Casanova wrote the Memoirs to kill the ennui of those last fourteen years at Dux when his bodily energy could no longer keep pace with the eagerness of his desires. In his narrative he lived over again those years when his youth and personal magnetism had carried everything before them. But, as he complains again and again, Fortune plays traitor to old age, so what could be more natural than to suppose that Casanova concluded his story when it ceased to stimulate him, and that his zest for autobiography stopped when he had come to a point in his confessions when the glamorous vagabond became the inglorious and somewhat despised secret agent?

In turning over the manuscripts in Leipzig, I read some of the suppressed passages and regretted their omission, for, having compared many of the pages, I found scarcely three consecutive sentences untouched; the damage done to the original text by Laforgue, who was employed to deform it, is incalculable. I therefore give here for the first time verbatim the passage that was copied out for me, which I have checked word for word.

"Page 58. La première fois que le curé me fit l'honneur de me présenter à Son Excellence, je me suis très respectueusement opposé (page 59) à cette raison que tout le monde trouvoit sans réplique. Je lui ai dit qu'il n'avoit qu'à inviter à sa table ceux qui nature man-

geoient comme deux.—Où sont-ils?—L'affaire est délicate. V. E. doit essayer des convives, et après les avoir trouvés tels que vous les désirez, savoir aussi vous les conserver sans leur en dire la raison; car il n'y a au monde personne de bien élevé qui voulût qu'on dise qu'il n'a l'honneur de manger avec V. E. que parce qu'il mange le double (de vous) d'un autre.

"Comprenant toute la force de mes paroles S. E. dit au curé de me conduire à dîner le lendemain. Ayant trouvé que si je donnois le précepte bien, je donnois l'exemple encore mieux, il me fit son commensal quotidien.

"Le sénateur, qui avoit renoncé à tout excepté qu'à lui-même, nourissoit malgré son âge et sa goutte un penchant amoureux. Il aimait Thérèse, fille du comédien Imer, qui demeuroit dans une maison voisine de son palais, dont les fenêtres étoient vis-à-vis de l'appartement où il couchoit. Cette fille, âgée alors de dix-sept ans, jolie, bizarre, coquette, qui apprenoit (alors) la musique pour aller l'exercer sur les Théâtres, qui se laissoit continuellement voir à ses fenêtres, et dont les charmes avoient déjà enivré le vieillard lui étoit cruelle. Elle venoit presque tous les jours lui faire une belle visite, mais toujours accompagnée de sa mère, vieille actrice qui s'était retirée du théâtre pour faire le salut de son âme, et qui avoit, comme de raison, formé le projet d'allier Dieu avec le diable. Elle conduisoit sa fille à la messe tous les jours, elle vouloit qu'elle allât à confesse tous les dimanches; mais l'après-dîner elle la menoit chez le vieillard amoureux, dont la fureur dans laquelle il tomboit s'épouvantait quand elle lui refusoit un baiser, lui alléguant en raison qu'ayant fait ses dévotions le matin, elle ne pouvoit pas condescendre à offenser ce même Dieu qu'elle avoit mangé, et qu'elle avoit peut-être (page 60) encore dans son estomac. Quel tableau pour moi, âgé alors de quinze ans, que le vieillard admettoit uniquement à être témoin silencieux de ces scènes! La scélérate mère applaudissoit la résistance de sa fille et osoit sermonner le voluptueux, qui à son tour n'osoit point réfuter ses maximes trop ou pas du tout chrétiennes, et qui devoit (détenir) résister à la tentation de lui jeter à la figure ce qui seroit tombé entre les mains (pour la faire jeter par la fenêtre). Il ne savoit que lui dire. La colère prenoit la place de la concupiscence; et après qu'elles étoient parties, il se soulageoit avec moi par des réflexions philosophiques. Obligé à lui répondre et ne sachant que lui dire, je lui ai un jour suggéré le mariage. Il m'a étonné, me répondant qu'elle ne vouloit pas devenir sa femme.—Pourquoi?—Parce qu'elle ne veut pas encourir la haine de (la) ma famille.—Offrez-lui une grosse somme, un état.—Elle ne voudroit pas, à ce qu'elle dit, commettre un péché mortel pour devenir reine du monde.—Il faut la violer, ou la chasser, la bannir de chez vous.—Je ne peux l'un; et je ne peux pas me déterminer à l'autre.—Tuez-la.—Cela arrivera si je ne meurs (moeurs) pas auparavant.—Votre Excellence est à plaindre.—Vas-tu jamais chez elle?—Non, car je pourrois en devenir amoureux; et si elle étoit vis-à-vis de moi telle que . . . je la vois ici, je deviendroit malheureux. —Tu as raison."

In 1906 and 1914 Octave Uzanne examined this same manuscript in Brockhaus' room, in order to verify the variants in the texts: "I can only say that the graphic clearness of this manuscript is admirable and gives one none of the sad sentiments one feels when one turns over old yellow-coloured papers—waste papers as it were—which exhale the odour of shrivelled sheets of paper, worm-eaten, decomposed by damp. One might imagine that those pages had been written but yesterday. The ink only varies somewhat in its firm black pressure, as if Casanova had pressed hard on the pen he used. The Holland is milk-white, it is in perfect preservation, and it is a pleasure to admire the fine penmanship of the Venetian writer. It is not the writing of an old man whose hand trembles, it is an original handwriting, jeune d'allure, perfectly legible, supple, a curious running handwriting, with very few erasures, 29 to 30 lines on each page, with lines that contain about ten or twelve words. To have obtained so wonderful a result, certainly Casanova must have copied this final text after numerous revisions and a definite judgment. In all his works he was a methodical and regular writer. The paging, besides, has a variety of numerals that bear witness to his suppressions and revisions."

VI

Among the innumerable exploits chronicled by Casanova there is one, to take an example out of many, the exact veracity of which I am inclined to dispute: the episode of the Jewish Esther in Holland; for Ravà, who also disbelieved in it, mentions among other facts that Casanova misleads us in regard to the dates of his two visits, misleads us in every possible manner, and adds to this the recent discovery that Thomas Hope, the famous banker, mentioned with the initials D— O—, had no daughters! Rather a Biblical statement. When I discovered Manon Baletti's letters in Dux—there were more than forty of them carefully tied together—I took it for granted that Casanova was correct in saying that she had returned him his own letters—at Amsterdam on Christmas Day, 1759—begging him to return hers or to burn them and, besides this, announcing her marriage; and that he had allowed Esther to read them, meaning to burn them afterwards, and that Esther begged to be allowed to keep them.

It now seems quite certain that, if Casanova has not misled us in regard to the entire Esther episode, he is not very near the truth as to the date of the rupture with Manon, for instead of in December, 1759, Manon's actual letters to Casanova come to an end the 7th of February, 1760, and Manon was married, as we know from the marriage register, on July 20th of the same year. There was certainly no rupture with the Balettis at this time, for Casanova was still on friendly terms and in correspondence with Manon's brother, who was in Paris, which is proved by several documents recently discovered at Dux; notably, a certain letter written to Casanova on the 24th of May, dated Paris, which says: "Votre lettre, que m'a remise notre ami Baletti, m'a consolé."

"Be wise and receive the news I give you calmly. The packet contains your portrait and all the letters you have written to me. Return me my portrait, and, if you have kept my letters, be kind enough to burn them. I rely on your honour. Think of me no more. Duty bids me do all I can to forget you, for at this time to-morrow I shall become the wife of M. Blondel of the Royal Academy, architect to the King. Please do not seem as if you knew me if we chance to meet on your return to Paris."

But it seems evident Manon herself either gave back to Casanova all her letters and his portrait or had them conveyed to him privately, and the reason of this must have been her fury of resentment against his ingratitude, his infidelities and his indifference. I can imagine that the terms of the letter she would have enclosed in the sealed packet would have been similar to those she uses in a letter dated July, 1750, in which she foresees, with a clear vision, the inevitable end of their relationship:

"Je vous demande, Monsieur, pour votre dernière preuve d'amitié, que vous me rendiez mes lettres, qui doivent avoir très peu de prix pour vous et qui sont pour moi de la dernière importance. A quoi vous seraient-elles bonnes, sinon qu'à vous reprocher un peu de dureté et à vous faire voir combien peu je la mérite? Vous aurez donc la bonté de me les rendre. Il vous sera plus facile alors d'oublier totalement la pauvre faible créature qui les a écrites. Si vous avez encore quelque ménagement pour moi, vous me les donnerez dans un moment où nous ne serons pas aperçus; je crois que ce soir après souper sera le moment le plus favorable."

It would be unfair to Casanova, if we did not make allowances for certain divergences from the original in the various editions. For instance, Casanova met in London Ange Gondar, a clever but unprincipled publicist, who introduced him to Sarah, an Irish barmaid. In my Rozez edition, 1863, Giacomo boasts that he seduced the girl while his rival tried in vain to open the locked door. Mr. Bleackley says in regard to the Rozez, which differs so widely from the others in the last two volumes, "that one would imagine that its editor had used another manuscript." That is not the fact. When I was in Leipzig in 1899, I examined the entire manuscript in the handwriting of Casanova; it is done up in twelve bundles, corresponding with the twelve volumes of the original edition. Last year I wrote to Brockhaus, asking him if the pages in the Rozez edition, 202-206 of the last volume, which relate a tragic adventure that happened to Casanova, were to be found in the original manuscript. He replied: "As to your inquiry, I beg to inform you that I have looked through the original manuscript, but I could not trace anywhere the tragic adventure that happened to Casanova in Madrid. I am unable to explain this divergence, but I think I am right in supposing that Rozez made additions of his own."

Made in his own likeness Casanova's women were not, nor were they creatures of his imagination; they were veritably creatures of flesh and blood; they were most often openly his mistresses. In fact, I had only to turn over, when I was in Dux, several hundred letters from women addressed to Casanova—which I was the first to discover—to realize that all these letters are written with fervour or with passion; and that Casanova should have so carefully preserved all these letters proves that his own fervour had not entirely abated.

Those letters! With what actuality they bring Casanova before us! One still sees the seals on the backs of many of them, on paper which has slightly yellowed with age, leaving the ink, however, almost always fresh. They come from Venice, Paris, Rome, Prague, Bayreuth, The Hague, Genoa, Fiume, Trieste, etc., and are addressed to as many places, often Poste restante. Some are in beautiful handwriting, on thick paper; others on scraps of paper, in painful hands, ill-spelt. A countess writes pitifully, imploring help; one protests her love, in spite of the "many chagrins" he has caused her; another asks "how they are to live together"; another laments that a report has gone about that she is secretly living with him, which may harm his reputation. Some are in French, more in Italian. "Mon cher Giacometto," writes one woman, in French; "Carissimo e Amatissimo," writes another, in Italian. These letters from women were in great confusion when I discovered them. Thus I found letters in the same handwriting separated by letters in other handwritings; many were undated, or dated only with the day of the week or month. There were a great many letters, dating from 1779 to 1786, signed "Francesca Buschini," a name which I cannot identify; they are written in Italian, and one of them begins: "Unico Mio vero Amico" (my only true friend). Others are signed Virginia B.; one of these is dated "Forli, October 15, 1773." There is also a Theresa B., who writes from Genoa. I was the first to identify Manon Baletti as the writer of a whole series of letters in French, very affectionate and intimate, usually unsigned, occasionally signed "B." She calls herself "votre petite amie"; or she ends with a half smiling, half reproachful "good-night, and sleep better than I." In one letter, sent from Paris in 1759, she writes: "Never believe me but when I tell you that I love you and that I shall love you always." In another letter, ill-spelt, as her letters often are, she writes: "Be assured that evil tongues, vapors, calumny, nothing can change my heart, which is yours entirely and has no will to change its master."

In turning over another manuscript, I was caught by the name Charpillon, which every reader of the Memoirs will remember as the name of the harpy by whom Casanova suffered so much in London, in 1763-4. This manuscript begins by saying: "I have been in London for six months and have been to see them (that is, the mother and daughter) in their own house," where he finds nothing but "swindlers, who cause all who go there to lose their money in gambling." This manuscript adds some details to the story told in the ninth and tenth volumes of the Memoirs, and refers to the meeting with the Charpillons four and a half years before, described in volume five. It is written in a tone of great indignation. Elsewhere, I found a letter written by Casanova, but not signed, referring to an anonymous letter which he had received in reference to the Charpillons, and ending: "My handwriting is known."

VIII

But, though the letters from women naturally interested me the most, they were only a certain proportion of the great mass of correspondence which I turned over on my visit to Dux. There were letters from Carlo Angiolini, who was afterwards to bring the manuscript of the Memoirs to Brockhaus; from Balbi, the monk with whom Casanova escaped from the Piombi; from the Marquis Albergati, playwright, actor and eccentric, of whom there is some account in the Memoirs; from the Marquis Mosca, "a distinguished man of letters whom I was anxious to see," as Casanova tells us in the same volume in which he describes his visit to the Moscas at Pesaro; from Zulian, brother of the Duchess of Fiano; from Richard Lorrain, "bel homme, ayant de l'esprit, le ton et le goût de la bonne société," who came to settle at Gorizia in 1773, while Casanova was there; from the Procurator Morosini, whom he speaks of in the Memoirs as his "protector," and as one of those through whom he obtained permission to return to Venice. His other "protector," the Avogador Zaguri, had, says Casanova, "since the affair of the Marquis Albergati, carried on a most interesting correspondence with me"; and in fact I found a bundle of no less than a hundred and thirty-eight letters from him, dating from 1784 to 1798. Another bundle contains one hundred and seventy-two letters from Count Lamberg, mentioned in the Memoirs.

Among other documents directly relating to the Memoirs which I read at Dux are several attempts at a preface, written in Casanova's unmistakable hand, in which we see the actual preface coming gradually into form. One is entitled Casanova au Lecteur; another, Histoire de mon Existence; and a third Préface. There is also a brief and characteristic Précis de ma Vie, dated November 17, 1797. Some of these have been printed in Le Livre, 1887.

One manuscript I found tells with great piquancy the whole story of the Abbé de Brosses' ointment, the curing of the Princesse de Conti's pimples, and the birth of the Duc de Montpensier, which is told very briefly, and with much less point, in the Memoirs. There is an account of the duel at Warsaw with Count Branicki in 1766, mentioned in the Memoirs, an affair which attracted a good deal of attention at the time, in a letter from the Abbé Taruffi to the dramatist, Francesco Albergati, dated Warsaw, March 19, 1766, quoted in Ernesto Masi's Life of Albergati, Bologna, 1878. A manuscript at Dux in Casanova's handwriting gives an account of this duel in the third person; it is entitled: "Description de l'affaire arrivée à Varsovie le 5 Mars, 1766." D'Ancona, in the "Nuova Antalogia," referring to the Abbé Taruffi's account, mentions what he considers to be a slight discrepancy: that Taruffi refers to the danseuse about whom the duel was fought as La Casacci, while Casanova refers to her as La Catai. In this manuscript Casanova always refers to her as La Casacci; La Catai is evidently one of M. Laforgue's arbitrary alterations of the text.

One of the most amusing papers was an anecdote and its commentary, perhaps jotted down for use in that latter part of the Memoirs which was never to be written. Here is a single sheet, dated "this 2nd September, 1791," and headed Souvenir:

"The Prince de Rosenberg said to me, as we went down stairs, that Madame de Rosenberg was dead, and asked me if the Comte de Waldstein had in the library the illustration of the Villa d'Altichiero, which the Emperor had asked for in vain at the city library of Prague, and when I answered 'yes,' he gave an equivocal laugh. A moment afterwards, he asked me if he might tell the Emperor. 'Why not, monsigneur? It is not a secret. Is His Majesty coming to Dux?' 'If he goes to Oberlaitensdorff (sic) he will go to Dux, too; and he may ask you for it, for there is a monument there which relates to him when he was Grand Duke.' 'In that case, His Majesty can also see my critical remarks on the Egyptian prints.'

"The Emperor asked me this morning, 6th October, how I employed my time at Dux, and I told him I was making an Italian anthology. 'You have all the Italians, then?' 'All, sire.' See what a lie leads to. If I had not lied in saying that I was making an anthology I should not have found myself obliged to lie again in saying that we have all the Italian poets.

"If the Emperor comes to Dux, I shall kill myself."

In the Memoirs Casanova tells how he quarrelled with Voltaire because Voltaire had told him frankly that his translation of L'Ecossaise was a bad translation. It is piquant to read another note written in this style of righteous indignation:

"Voltaire, the hardy Voltaire, whose pen is without bit or bridle; Voltaire, who devoured the Bible, and ridiculed our dogmas, doubts, and, after having made proselytes to impiety, is not ashamed, being reduced to the extremity of life, to ask for the sacraments and to cover his body with more relics than St. Louis had at Amboise."

Here is an argument also very much in keeping with the tone of the Memoirs:

"A girl who is pretty and good, and as virtuous as you please, ought not to take it ill that a man, carried away by her charms, should set himself to the task of making their conquest. If this man cannot please her by any means, even if his passion be criminal, she ought never to take offence at it nor treat him unkindly; she ought to be gentle and pity him, if she does not love him, and think it enough to keep invincible hold upon her own duty."

Occasionally he touches upon æsthetical matters, as in a fragment which begins with this liberal definition of beauty:

"'Harmony makes beauty,' says M. de S. P. (Bernardin de St. Pierre), but the definition is too short, if he thinks he has said everything. Here is mine. Remember that the subject is metaphysical. 'An object really beautiful ought to seem beautiful to all whose eyes fall upon it.' That is all; there is nothing more to be said."

"They say that this Dux is a delightful spot," says Casanova in one of the most personal of his notes, "and I see that it might be for many, but not for me, for what delights me in my old age is independent of the place which I inhabit. When I do not sleep, I dream, and, when I am tired of dreaming, I blacken paper; then I read, and most often reject all that my pen has vomited." Here we see him blackening paper on every occasion and for every purpose. In one bundle I found an unfinished story about Roland and some adventures with women in a cave; then a Meditation on Arising from Sleep, 19th May, 1789; then a Short Reflection of a Philosopher Who Finds Himself Thinking of Procuring His Own Death; again, At Dux, on getting out of bed on the 13th October, 1793—a day dedicated to St. Lucy, memorable in my too long life. A big budget, containing cryptograms, is headed Grammatical Lottery; and there is the title page of a treatise on The Duplication of the Hexahedron, demonstrated geometrically to all the Universities and all the Academies of Europe. There are innumerable verses, French and Italian, in all stages, occasionally attaining the finality of these lines, which appear in half a dozen tentative forms:

Sans mystère point de plaisirs,
Sans silence point de mystère.
Charme divin de mes loisirs,
Solitude! que tu m'es chère!

Then there are a number of more or less complete manuscripts of some extent. There is the manuscript of the translation of Homer's Iliad in ottava rima (published in Venice, 1775-78); of the Histoire de Venise, of the Icosameron, a curious book published in 1787, purporting to be "translated from English," but really an original work of Casanova; Philocalies sur les Sottises des Mortels, a long manuscript never published; the sketch and beginning of Le Polémarque, ou la Calomnie démasquée par la présence d'esprit, Tragicomédie en trois actes, composée à Dux dans le mois le Juin de l'Année, 1791, which recurs again under the form of the Polémoscope: La Lorgnette menteuse, ou la Calomnie démasquée, acted before the Princesse de Ligne at her château at Teplitz, 1791. There is a treatise in Italian, Delle Passioni; there are long dialogues, such as Le Philosophe et le Théologien, and Rêve: Dieu-Moi; there is the Songe d'un Quart d'Heure, divided into minutes; there is the very lengthy criticism of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre; there is the Confutation d'une Censure indiscrète qu'on lit dans la Gazette de Jéna, 19 Juin, 1789; with another large manuscript, unfortunately imperfect, first called L'Insulte, and then Placet au Public, dated "Dux, this 2nd March, 1790," referring to the same criticism on the Icosameron and the Fuite des Prisons. L'Histoire de ma Fuite des Prisons de la République de Venise, qu'on appelle les Plombs, which is the first draft of the most famous part of the Memoirs, was published at Leipzig in 1788; and, having read it in the Marcian Library at Venice, I am not surprised to learn from this indignant document that it was printed "under the care of a young Swiss, who had the talent to commit a hundred faults of orthography."

I came upon a variety of small papers, among which were jumbled together on the same and on separate scraps of paper washing-bills, accounts, hotel bills, lists of letters written, first drafts of letters with many erasures, notes on books, theological and mathematical notes, Latin quotations, French and Italian verses, with variants, a long list of classical names which have and have not been "francisés," with reasons for and against; "what I must wear at Dresden"; headings without anything to follow, such as: Reflexions on respiration, on the true cause of youth—the crows; a new method of winning the lottery at Rome; recipes, among which is a long printed list of perfumes sold at Spa; a newspaper cutting, dated Prague, 25 October, 1790, on the thirty-seventh balloon ascent of Blanchard; thanks to some "noble donor" for the gift of a dog called Finette; a passport for "Monsieur de Casanova, Vénétien, allant d'ici en Hollande," October 13, 1758 ("Ce passeport bon pour quinze jours"), together with an order for post-horses, gratis, from Paris to Bordeaux and Bayonne.

Occasionally, from these papers I obtained a glimpse into his daily life at Dux, as in this note, scribbled on a fragment of paper (here and always I translate the French literally): "I beg you to tell my servant what the biscuits are that I like to eat, dipped in wine, to fortify my stomach. I believe that they can all be found at Roman's." Usually, however, these notes, though often suggested by something closely personal, branch off into more general considerations; or else begin with general considerations, and end with a case in point. Thus, for instance, a fragment of three pages begins: "A compliment which is made only to gild the pill is a positive impertinence, and Monsieur Bailli is nothing but a charlatan; the monarch ought to have spat in his face, but the monarch trembled with fear." A manuscript entitled Essai d'Egoisme, dated "Dux, this 27th June, 1769," contains, in the midst of various reflections, an offer to let his appartement in return for enough money to "tranquillise for six months two Jew creditors at Prague." Another manuscript is headed Pride and Folly, and begins with a long series of antitheses, such as: "All fools are not proud, and all proud men are fools. Many fools are happy, all proud men are unhappy."

Here, as so often in these manuscripts, we seem to see Casanova thinking on paper. He uses scraps of paper (sometimes the blank page of a letter, on the other side of which we see the address) as a kind of informal diary; and it is characteristic of him, of the infinitely curious mind which this adventurer possessed, that there are so few merely personal notes among these casual jottings found among his remains.

IX

The world of his Memoirs is not a world of his invention, as these papers eloquently prove; yet, when he warmed up to the theme of his exploits, he sometimes invented enormously and lied prodigiously, albeit entertainingly and delightfully. Our Venetian, like any true vagabond, could not resist what he called sa folie vagabonde. Wherever he went, adventures fell his way, and, incredible or not, there is a spark illumines his telling of them. He belonged to an age when the human animal exalted the satisfaction of the senses, and he was, above all, a man of his age.

INTRODUCTION

La Piste Casanovérienne, as it is fondly called, has long held a quite reasonable fascination for all students of social history and psychology. These famous Mémoires furnish an unique tableau of the eighteenth century, painted for us by a man whose personality was itself unique. The trail has been carefully followed by Englishmen and Frenchmen alike. Mr. Arthur Symons and Mr. Havelock Ellis in our own country have displayed a passionate interest in the wonderful Venetian; while Messieurs Armand Baschet and Octave Uzanne have foraged in the lockers of the Maison Brockhaus at Leipzig, in the Archives of the Venetian Senate, and have given us the results of their researches. Mr. Symons has in person turned over the papers lying mouldering in the white library at Dux, where the restless old adventurer spent the last tame years of his life, and relieved his solitude en broyant du noir sur le papier. Thus does he, in a fit of depression, deprecatingly characterise his own excellent piece of work. It is to these writers that we owe the discovery that Casanova was not a mere retailer of impossibly indelicate stories, but a memoirist of the first order, and the author of one of the most vivacious and artistically faithful pictures of the romantic age in which he moved, that we are lucky enough to possess. This 'passionist,' as the French love to call him, this prince of adventurers, was a man of action, who cared to analyse the springs of that action, and posed to himself, and to all his friends, as a philosopher. The list of his philosophical and metaphysical works would startle and weary. The Mémoires alone survive. Here he was his own subject, and he gloated on it! Les choses vues were with him also les choses vécues. He was an author-actor who actually lived the scenes he described, and his strong histrionic instinct points and modifies every incident. That is how he saw life—not steadily, not whole, but dramatically. In one of the many unused prefaces to the Mémoires found among his papers, he tells us that 'life is a stage, where the great author, God, sets the piece, in whose presentment audience and company change places, and a man is now actor, and now spectator.' Casanova may be said to have been both at one and the same time, so deeply developed always was his dual consciousness.

The stage of Casanova—the field of his vital operations—has been razed and abolished by the tremendous upheaval and alteration worked by the Revolution, but the world before the flood, of Madame de Pompadour's lurid prediction, lives again in the Venetian's pages. Though he survived the Revolution, watching its wild progress from his lonely home in Bohemia, his day was over before it broke out. From the circumstances of his life and training, he was an aristocrat at heart, a monarchist indeed, as his wordy contention with Voltaire shows, and the narrow spirit of his generation and the short-sighted political outlook of those with whom he ranged himself are evidenced by his absurd view of the causes of 'the outbreak.' We come across these views in the Mémoires and in a short essay of his entitled Causes of the French Revolution. He attributes the fall of the monarchy to the untoward existence of the Duc d'Orléans—Egalité—whose presence on this planet was the unfortunate result of cabbalistic experiments on the complexion of Egalité's mother, the Duchesse de Chartres!

But indeed the abuses of the old régime prevalent in all countries did not affect Casanova's welfare in the least. On the contrary, the careless, reckless whirlpool of society, the survival of the feudal instinct, made the world, as it was then, a happy hunting-ground for the adventurer. For fully half a century did he range at will over Europe; a débonnaire free-lance, taking to himself a most unfair proportion of the good things of this world, interviewing Popes and Sovereigns on equal terms, cheating men and betraying women. Only one woman, according to his own showing, betrayed him, and, curiously enough, the self-assigned date of the reflux of his fortunes, and the failure and decay of his wonderful vitality, is coincident with his English visit, and his acquaintance with the London lady who led him literally through the Maze, and befooled him as he had befooled others. Here the Mémoires do indeed begin to drag a little and he to write regretfully of the period —nel mestro camin nostra vita. He practically gave up the game. Yet, according to contemporary accounts, he seems to have reversed the process of the modern man: he looked young and felt old, or said he did. As to his youthful appearance there is no doubt; at no time did he look within ten years of his age. Here is a description of him as he appeared at the age of forty-seven, after his disgrace, drawn up by the official pen of the Venetian agent at Ancona:—

'I saw him with my own eyes. Some one told me it was he, for I had never seen the man before. He comes and goes freely, holds his head high, and looks every man in the face. He is received in several good houses. He does not look more than forty. He is tall and handsome and well made, his skin is very dark, and his eyes very bright. He wears a short chestnut perruque. From what they tell me, I gather him to be of a bold disposition and a disdainful. He has plenty to say for himself, and he says it well too.'

He was forty-seven then, and considered that he had already lived his life and was longing to be received into the favour of the mighty potentates who had banished him from his beloved native city, for he was a Venetian born, with a dash of Spanish blood in him. The details of his parentage and childhood as retailed by himself are interesting. 'I was an idiot till I was eight and a half,' he says somewhere, and a medical diagnosis founded on his own account of his symptoms would suggest that the boy suffered from the now fashionable childish complaint of adenoids. But at that age his health became established, and he was able to start on his career with a perfect physical equipment—a veritable constitution of iron. His wonderfully executed and planned escape from prison proves him a man of prodigious nervous strength and staying power. But, like the lilies of the field, he toiled not, neither did he spin, but lived freely at the world's expense. His attitude towards gambling-tables, and the amount of support and sustenance to be fairly derived thence, is sufficiently indicated in a casual remark of his. He called his successes there 'getting the better of fortune.' This feat 'was to be accomplished by some happy stroke of calculation, some touch of dexterity independent of luck.' 'I consider,' he continued, 'that a prudent player can make use of either or both of these means, without incurring blame or being taxed with cheating.' But all Casanova's lucky coups were not made at the tables, for instance the treasure of gold and silver and jewels wrung from poor old Semiramis, whose leaden substitutes were thrown into the sea near Marseilles, to propitiate Selenis, the cabbalistic spirit he had evoked for her ruin.

Though Casanova is 'damned to everlasting fame' for his treatment of the crack-brained 'Egeria' of the Regent, he shares the obloquy of exploitation with two other adventurers, Saint Germain and Cagliostro. The memoirs of the time are full of the tragi-comic history of the doting old marquise —her alembics, her retorts, and absurd processes of the science of alchemy, the fashionable sport of a superstitious age. Casanova is credited with dragging in the mire one of the noblest names in France; but we may point out that the marquise was only the widow of the last of the d'Urfés, and that only by the insistence of the Regent, who wished to establish Mlle. Jeanne Camus de Pontcarré, a member of his 'plus étroit intrinsèque,' creditably. In the scene where the old lady of seventy-three flings her lace cap up to the ceiling on receipt of some good occult news from Casanova, we are irresistibly reminded of Barnave's cynical saying, when her like went in scores to the scaffold, 'Le sang qui coule, est-il donc si pur?' and there is a ribald French song current still in Paris, 'Ah, quel malheur, Madame Camus!'

These volumes show Casanova to us a great lover, a great eater, a great talker; he was not a coward, but he disliked fighting according to the rules, and a diplomatic evasion of the laws of 'honour' often stood him in stead. He was a normal rather than an abnormal subject; the healthy materialism of these pages prove it. He would have us believe him a metaphysician and even an idealist, but he only used metaphysics to justify his actions, and idealism to add poignancy to his amours. He had no heart, according to the modern acceptation of the word, but he was benevolent and liked to see people happy about him. Greedy as he was in pursuit of the gratification of all his senses, and remorseless when thwarted in that pursuit, he was not actually averse to the sight of the enjoyment of others.

In one of the several prefaces he wrote for the Mémoires, of which that one definitely selected by him or his literary executors is the least characteristic, he enters into a very subtle form of apologia pro vita sua. He wishes to 'demonstrate in these very Mémoires the fact that the chain of events is independent of method, i.e. conduct.' If, as he owns, he has 'sometimes been led into altruistic courses, the result unfortunately has not always been for the best,' as, for instance, in the case of the moderation shown to Lucy of Paséan, whose grey, ruined ghost appears three times in the Mémoires, with a sort of rhythmical reminder. On the other hand, good has often been the result of evil, so far as he has been concerned. To sum up, he attributes all his vices and follies to the survenance of a 'moment of madness, an oscillation of the pulses, when a man is not himself,' but the blind puppet of 'something not himself' that makes for evil. 'Virtue,' he declares, 'consists, practically, in a man's keeping control of himself, and being able to suspend action till the vibration is over-past.'

This useful philosophy, so well adapted to the degree of moral stress suffered by a man like Casanova, though it would not cover the deliberate and long-sustained trickery of poor old Madame d'Urfé, which eventually led to her death, in a state of mind that would have made her a fit inmate of the Paris Bedlam, might account for his other actual crime—the cold-blooded murder of the lay sister, in furtherance of his amour with the artless nun of Chambéry.

His betrayal of the Spaniard, Manucci, caused him some actual remorse, but that was because it implied a public reflection on his honour. His sins of omission, such as the neglect of his old benefactor, M. de Bragadin, his ingratitude to the kind little actress, La Binetti, who saved his life at Stuttgart, to be cruelly insulted by him at Petersburg, did not distress him. Jules Sandeau has called him 'the most moral of Don Juans.' That must have been because, though he loved many women, he broke few hearts or none. He loved and he rode away indeed, but he always paid the bill. He found a husband for Cristina, and though Mlle. de La Meure was fascinated by him, he allowed her to see clearly the kind of man with whom she was dealing, so that although she flirted outrageously with the brilliant Casanova, she took care to secure the plain, complaisant merchant from Dunkirk. C. C. consoled herself with the Cardinal de Bernis, and the prudent Dubois (who 'read and enjoyed Locke,' and who reminds one a little of George Sand) took as a pis aller the maître d'hôtel, Lebel.

His relations with the freethinking nun and her weaker sister in religion—that partie carrée in the Venetian casino—form at once the blot and the curiosity, psychologically speaking, of the Mémoires. To abate the pure cynicism of the episode is to coarsen it. Love was a game in the eighteenth century, and women played it as skilfully as men. The two nuns of Murano, M. M. and C. C.—Matilda and Caterina—it is easy to reconstruct their names from the hints which their lover lets slip—are the best pair of portraits in the book, the blue ribbon of his gallantries. Matilda with her philosophy and her wicked books, and the sweet, weakly imitative Caterina, would make a novel by themselves. But what a gallery of charming persons he gives us! His early love Bettina; and the ill-fated Lucy of Paséan; Cristina, the naïve peasant girl of Mestre; Esther Hope, the banker's daughter of Cologne, who loved him, but who would only admit an honourable courtship; the sagacious Marcolina; Clementina, the dreamy bas bleu; the naïve English Miss and the sprightly housekeeper; the fair Amazon lady to whom he played butler at Zurich; the ladylike Pauline; the astute Madam Cornelys; the proud little Spanish countess who studies revenge; and last, sweetest and most complete portrait of all, Henriette, the French spy, for whom Casanova really cared, if he ever cared for any one.

With male portraits Casanova is naturally not so happy. He was not interested in men, they were mostly merely husbands to deceive, or victims to defraud. His descriptions of Voltaire and of the great Frederick are perfunctory and marred by the intrusion of his own vanity. The only man that really dominated him was the Cardinal de Bernis, who, though a fribble and a courtier, was his equal in brains and perversity. The 'flower of abbés'—Suzon la Bouquetière, as Madame de Pompadour called him—from whose breviary, scurrilous vers de société used to fall as he fared, powdered and scented, and pink as a girl, to Mass—was a match for the Venetian, and adroitly contrived to leave his deserted mistress on the hands of the latter when summoned home from Venice. Oddly enough, he chose to give a very different colour to his life there from that suggested by Casanova. He says in his own memoirs that 'the air of Venice did not suit' him. He was bored there—'Je n'avais pas de maitresses, et les soirées étaient longues.' He left Venice in 1755. Casanova's date differs as usual.

This wonderful processional novel, to give it its lowest claim to consideration, was conceived and written by the worn-out old roué to combat the deadly ennui that must necessarily overtake a whilom man of action, self-condemned to vegetate in inactivity. By its means he fondly hoped to 'cheat his grief' and 'cheer his old soul' in those dreary last ten years of his life, spent in the castle of Dux in Bohemia, where he fulfilled the nominal post of librarian to Count Waldstein at a thousand florins a year. His master, ce grand moderne, understood him and loved him, but he was a continual prey to indigestion, and the stupid malice of stolid German servants, unable to sympathise with his hasty Italian temperament.

Waldstein, who had come across Casanova in Paris, during a period of dejection, took a violent fancy to him, and carried him off to Bohemia. Count Waldstein's esprit Cabalon was obviously the link between the adventurer and himself. Casanova never dropped his mystic pretensions, of which he had made so much use in his days of action. Cabbalism was the social weapon of the day, and alchemy its serious amusement. The old Prince de Ligne, the count's father-in-law, living at his neighbouring castle of Toeplitz with his daughter, the Princess Clary d'Aldringhen, was captivated by the fascinating adventurer on more literary grounds, and 'believed him as he did the Credo.' 'Amiable, celebrated man, and profound thinker!' he says in one of his letters, 'you are logical as an iceberg and hot as a volcano.' 'You are finer than Montaigne.' 'I am Atticus to your Cicero.' The prince himself was an author, but is not particular about the laws of composition and spelling. He advises his friend not to try to 'eliminate his Italianisms, or to trouble over the stupid French grammar.' He was heart and soul interested in the progress of the Mémoires, which were sent to him volume by volume, and pored over—'eagerly devoured'—by himself and General Souvaroff and Count Salmond and others. Moreover they were read aloud by the foolish, vain old man to the family circles at Dux and at Toeplitz in the evenings. It is plain that Casanova reaped the harvest of vanity in his lifetime.

The prince is anxious that the Mémoires should be given to the world in their entirety. He would not have posterity lose a word of ces caractères de feu. 'All the people you write about will be dead by the time you are published,' he says. Casanova appears, in an access of prudery, to have proposed to burn the Mémoires. 'Nothing of the kind,' says the prince. 'Follow my example, go to my publisher, Walter, and stipulate for a hundred ducats' annuity on the book. Then go to bed, send for a priest, and let him throw a few reams of paper on to the fire, to represent your works, which you offer as a sacrifice to the Holy Virgin. Walter will not tell. He will give you two hundred copies for yourself, and the rest to be printed after your death. This is my own arrangement with him; perhaps in the place where we shall be by then, we can afford to laugh at the faces of the people on earth who are reading us!'

'Don't talk of dying. Reserve a volume for the account of what may yet befall you of an agreeable nature.'

Perhaps the wily Italian himself demurred at the publication of details which would doubtless concern the persons in whose company he was then living, and though he declared his intention of carrying the Mémoires on to 1797, they stop abruptly in 1774. That he actually wrote at least a volume more is proved by the Mémoires of this very Prince de Ligne, who gives a résumé, careless and inaccurate, of some of the more salient facts in that volume, including certain incidents that do not appear in the Mémoires so far as we have them.

It is impossible to doubt the fact that Giacomo Casanova, or Jacques as he preferred to be styled, with the territorial addition of Seingalt, which self-applied name held a vague reminiscence of the canton of St. Gall, where he once made a long stay, did himself compose a manuscript of six hundred in-folio pages, which he entitled Histoire de ma vie, jusqu'à l'an 1797. He declares, in the preface to a little volume, The Flight, written and published in his lifetime (because he got so tired of telling the story!), that he would not call his book

'Confessions' because 'un extravagant had sullied the glory of the title.' This was Rousseau, the man of thought, whom, for obvious reasons, the man of action detested.

The fact that Casanova wrote his own Mémoires has actually been questioned! M. Paul Lacroix (Le Bibliophile Jacob) says that 'Casanova was incapable of writing French, or of producing a work of any imagination of style whatever. . . . It is certain the celebrated Chevalier d'Industrie left notes, and a clever man, no less a personage than Beyle himself, put them together.'

The style of Casanova is at times intensely dramatic and always flowing; his imaginative power is undeniable. That he was quite aware that he could not write good French is evidenced by the Prince of Ligne's advice to him, but this goes to prove the authenticity of the Mémoires. And let the reader turn to a paragraph in the original work, quoted by M. Baschet, before it was shaped by M. Laforgue at the instance of M. Brockhaus of the publishing house of Leipzig, and he will see that though Casanova's French was by no means perfect, a very slight 'derangement' of the turn of the sentences gives us a practically unaltered version of the Mémoires as originally written.

His veracity is very much more difficult to establish, though in the collation of his arrangement of public events with the actual happening of them, as shown by dates and the testimony of contemporary chronicles, Casanova does not come off badly. It has been contended, with regard to his escape from the Venetian State prison, that the State Inquisitors were in the habit of opening doors to certain prisoners and winking at their escape. This is to make Casanova truly ridiculous, as a person of so little account politically that his treason was a negligible quantity. But as a matter of fact, his minute description of the various stages of his flight and the material checks he met with tallies exactly with the locale. An ardent Casanoverian even went carefully over the scene of the flight backwards, beginning at the Scala d'oro, and ending in the attics of the Chancellery, and the cell whose ceiling the fugitive spoiled. The bill for its reparation, amounting to six hundred and eighty-nine livres, is still extant. To disbelieve Casanova is to believe in the ridiculous collaboration of the terrible Three in his flight, and their theatrical arrangement of its details!

On the other hand, an exhaustive search has failed to discover the famous paragraph in the St. James's Chronicle mocking the placard which appeared in the window of Casanova's house in Pall Mall, and which resulted in his acquaintance with the mysterious and dignified Pauline, whose own history, reported by Casanova to be absolutely consonant with contemporary events in Portugal, is not to be collated therewith. The tale of the Talking Parrot receives no confirmation, as Casanova says it does, in the pages of The Daily Advertizer. The memoirs of the time are strikingly innocent of allusion to this man, who, by his own showing, made such a hole in the world. Sir Horace Mann, with whom he dined in Florence, never advises Sir Horace Walpole of the fact; and the record of the famous Madam Cornelys is clear of any mention of that old lover of her salad days whom she exploited so heartily in London.

The fact is that Casanova was by nature extremely untidy and inaccurate. But a quality inherent to a superb memory like his is that accuracy in detail often predominates over the recollection of the broader facts of time and space. He remembers, for instance, that the candles were of tallow, not wax, at the hotel at Chambéry, and that there were four at the cardinal's petite maison at Murano; he forgets to tell us what became of that famous blue diamond, commonly supposed to have been the 'Regent,' that his partner in escroquerie, the Count of Saint Germain, was sent into Holland to pawn, and which came into the hands of Casanova's friend, M. d'O—— (otherwise Hope). The name suggests a connection with another famous diamond, whose late possessors bear that of the diamond merchant of Amsterdam. Casanova could perhaps have told us something about it, but here he allows his usual vagueness to prevail and obscure history.

As Mr. Havelock Ellis says somewhere, 'There is reason to believe that an organisation like Casanova's, for whom the external world is so vivid, is associated with memory power of a high order,' and the presumption is that the actor-author did as well as he could. He wrote a rough synopsis of every chapter, as his papers found at Dux prove, and filled in the details afterwards. He had no wish to throw dust in the eyes of posterity. He is candid enough about the many checks incidental to the adventurous life. Indeed, the latter half of the Mémoires is more or less a record of the snubs the Chevalier d'industrie received in the exercise of his profession from different governments. His relations with the authorities were always pleasant enough, on condition that he 'moved on' when asked to do so. He describes the scenes fully. We seem to see the smile of Prince Kaunitz, as he shows the amusing, garrulous fellow the door. 'Go and sin the more—but not in Vienna!' The great Frederick toyed with his pretty wit, and praised him for his true qualification. 'You are a very fine-looking man!' The great Catherine flirted with him a little, but Panin was always watching. With regard to his relations with women he was not so sincere. His dramatic instinct led him to 'arrange' life pictorially and sympathetically, to trim off the raw edges of reality, to bring his best characters 'on' again, as, for instance, Henriette's several effective and pointed re-appearances. The same may be said of the story of the renewal of his relations with Teresa at Florence, with the addition of her accommodating husband, which is so amusing. We may or may not believe the stories of that sleep in the very jaws of danger which arrested the Flight for two hours, the three meetings with Lucy of Paséan, the episode of Mlle. de Roman-Couppier, and his cabbalistic influence in her fortunes, which is not borne out, nay, is contradicted, by contemporary accounts, but they certainly add intensely to the rondeur and pointedness of his narrative.

There are actually no contemporary records to corroborate the statements of Casanova, till we come to the causes of his condemnation in 1755, when his dossier begins to form part of the Venetian archives. With the Flight, and his own verbal account of it, Casanova became a famous man; before this he was, in the eyes of the State at least, a mere commonplace roysterer, a dangerous subverter of authority, a plausible dabbler in forbidden arts of necromancy. He was actually bred up for the Church, and was made Doctor of Civil Law at the age of sixteen. The Mémoires tell how he filled the part with cleverness and aplomb, till his natural bent came uppermost, and he made a fool of himself. We realise the vanity which bore him up, and admire the bonhomie with which he explained the dangers and advantages of his temperament to the good Bishop of Martorano—all the future Casanova lies revealed in these first few flippant pages. Vanity, which impelled him as an abbé to bestride a horse for the first time in his life, made him fling away his cassock and don the uniform. As a soldier he meets Teresa, and sets the note of all his dealings with women in his treatment of her. Fully disillusioned as she must have been, she meets him again with open arms at Florence. So did all Casanova's loves, in response to his indestructible charm. On his return to Venice, the loosely poised pendulum of an adventurer's life has swung to the other extreme—he is a humble fiddler in the orchestra of a Venetian theatre.

It is in this capacity, when his fortunes were at the lowest ebb, that the great opportunity of his life comes to him. He is able to be of use to the noble senator, de Bragadin, and the cabbalistic leaning of the fond old man is the basis of the entente between them, as it is later in his friendship with Waldstein.

Casanova gives his own version of his relations with the credulous senator, the evolution of the spirit Paralis, whom he makes responsible for the devilish suggestions that he does not like to father on himself. Paralis and de Bragadin find a husband for Cristina. Enriched by the old man, whose gondola he uses and whose liveried servants he orders about, Casanova leaves him to visit Italy, France, Germany and Witnesses were called—the landlord of a certain café, La Malvasia, in the Frezzeria—and Casanova got his five years. In fifteen months he made his escape.

He went to Paris and lived on the reputation of his marvellous adventure, writing and publishing a long account of it, at the instance of de Bernis, to save himself the pleasant annoyance of retailing the incidents of his escape. The minister's version does not appear. The edition we have was published in 1787 at Prague, where he himself presided over the printing. He makes several attempts to fleece the confiding Parisians. His memorandum concerning his famous lottery bureau is said to exist; there is among the Papers of France an unsigned document of that description. His shop in the quarter of the Temple for the production of stamped patterned material was another business undertaking of his, not quite so happy. His master-stroke was his getting hold of the Marquise d'Urfé. He combined all these industries with the trade of espionage, in which he was never very proficient. He went to Dunkirk, at the instance of the Abbé de la Ville, to reconnoitre the English Fleet at a fee of five hundred louis. He went twice to Holland to try to raise a loan for the French king. The second visit was not so successful, socially, as the first. The members of the various embassies had had time to make inquiries and examine his letters of introduction more carefully. Private official letters preserved in the Paris archives enable us to collate Casanova's own story with the facts. It is amusing reading. He was never in quite such good odour as he fancied, and gives us to understand. For instance, M. D'Affry, the French minister to Holland, notifies de Choiseul of the advent of M. de Casanova, and hints at some discreditable incidents of his previous visit to The Hague. He will be civil to M. de Casanova, but would like to know how far the duke would like him to go, and wonders if the letter of introduction was not obtained by an intermediary while the Venetian remained unknown to the duke? He complains of Casanova's notable indiscretion. 'He seemed to me terribly irresponsible, with no sense of the seriousness of his mission, or else he has great powers of dissimulation.' He has heard that 'the man is the son of an actress,' and is distressed 'to hear him abuse his own countrymen.'

The duke, in reply, informs M. D'Affry that his surmises are correct, that the introduction was obtained second-hand through the duke's brother, and he advises the minister to have nothing to do with the Venetian. Casanova, who at all times seems to have had a secret sense that warned him when it was time to decamp, left for Bonn and Cologne, and tells us so, but nothing more.

The minister at Bonn notifies to his Government that an unknown Venetian has arrived, who spends money, flaunts diamonds, and plays high, speaks of Versailles as if he were an intimate there; a banker of Cologne [the credulous, upright Hope?] answers for him.' Later on he got into trouble again. The minister, who has by now discovered his name, mentions his having 'an adventure which made some noise.' Casanova relates this adventure, but from his own point of view. The minister's curt relation is that Casanova owed a certain Baron de Vidau some money, and was arrested as he was coming away from the Comte de Torcy's house, where he had dined. He disclaimed the debt, but he paid in a ring, a box, and watch and some money, 'to avoid prison.'

This differs somewhat from the spirited, dashing account vouchsafed us by the man himself. In these official documents we come across the good Baron Kettler, whom Casanova plagued so adroitly. Kettler submits that Casanova is a traitor, a plotter, and bears about with him the proofs of his treason in a certain casket. But, as usual, the Duc de Choiseul takes a lenient and uncomplimentary view of the extent of the peril, and bids Kettler to ignore the harmless spendthrift. He had probably learned from Madame de Rumain that her gallant friend was not politically dangerous. Casanova, as usual, departs appositely, and hies him to Switzerland, to incur the idyllic adventure of Soleure, to argue literature and politics with Voltaire, and to trifle with an abortive conversion at the altar of our Lady of Einsiedel.

Three years later he is at Marseilles preparing for the comic martyrdom of that fine old piece of credulity and folly, Madame d'Urfé, whose dignity survives all the affronts which the adventurer puts on her, and who is most truly grande dame when most grotesque.

The adventurer all through these his wanderings is swayed by what we may call most intense love of country. He leaves no stone unturned to induce the inquisitors to grant him a safe-conduct, and eventually a pardon. From London, in 1763, he unfolds to them a commercial scheme. It is his own secret of dyeing cotton Turkey red, which he offers to the Government, and will test his method in the presence of Zucatto, the Venetian ambassador in London. Patterns he will send from London, and, for ten sous, he can make a handsome bandanna handkerchief, that Venetians buy for ten livres (ten shillings), and—here is the thin end of the wedge—he offers to escort a company of workmen to Venice!

To this proposal he probably received no reply.

The London visit is of extreme interest to English people. He sees our customs with his naïve, foreign eyes, and describes them in his frank, outspoken, Italian fashion. Le boxe and its eccentric laws impressed him deeply. Madam Cornelys takes care that her old admirer purchases a seven-guinea ticket for her series of balls in Soho Square. London taverns, Le Canon and Le Star, knew him. He treated a new conquest in true British fashion to cakes and ale at Marylebone Gardens. He infests the British Museum, and Milady Harrington's card-parties. He joins in a queer dance called the rhompaipe [hornpipe ?], and a queer game called a rober [rubber ?]. He sees a disturbance at Drury Lane Theatre, and Garrick on his knees to the audience; he hobnobs with 'Kety' Fisher and 'Miss' Charpillon and Lady Betty 'Germen,' Sir Augustus Hervey, and Lord Pembroke. Miss 'Chodeleig,' from the window of her house at Kingston, sees him fall from his horse, and succours him. He abuses the puritanical British Sunday, but indemnifies himself for its dulness by driving out to 'Harwich' [Hackney?] and 'Bames' [Barnes?] after dinner.

Then he forged a bill of exchange—backed a friend's bill, he says—and had to leave the country. He had, he admits, been living at the rate of four hundred guineas a fortnight.

Belgium, Brunswick, Berlin, Warsaw, and Petersburg are next on his list. At Petersburg he met the Empress Catherine walking in the Summer Gardens. She asked 'who the tall, remarkable man was?' At Moscow he fought a duel with that heroic personage Branecki—not the famous marshal of that name. Dresden, Prague, and Vienna next had the honour of his sojourn. At Aix he came across Cagliostro, 'sewing cockles on to his cloak.' He and his wife were pilgrims to Turin and the relic of St. Veronica. (Cagliostro, says a contemporary, had been included by the heirs of Madame d'Urfé, long since dead, with Casanova in their prosecution of her betrayers.)

In Spain, where he passed the greater part of the year 1768, he behaved disloyally, and has the grace to admit it. He betrayed the confidence of a certain Manucci. A foolish intrigue with the mistress of one in power—Casanova was always colliding with the authorities in this way—resulted in his close acquaintance with the donjon of Barcelona, where he was shut up forty-three days. From these prison shades he wrote his refutation of Amelot de la Houssaye's indictment of the Venetian Republic. This was another attempt to conciliate the Most Serene Prince, which was the polite way of addressing the ruling body of Venice. Casanova knew all the forms of diplomacy. He went to Turin to get the Refutation printed, and presented himself to Giovanni Berlendis, the Venetian minister at Sardinia, who harboured him pending the result of his application to the Three. The result was not what Casanova anticipated. Flamineo Corner, Barbarigo, and Alvise Renier recommended Berlendis to have an eye on the author of the Refutation, and to show him no special courtesy, as one still under the ban of the Tribunal.

Presently Berlendis informed the Three that his subject has gone to Leghorn to join the Russian Fleet there, and to solicit the good offices of his friend Orloff. Casanova had actually offered his services to the Russians, with the reservation that in the event of a Russian incursion on Venetian territory, he was to be 'counted out.' The entente between the Russian and the Venetian was, however, not complete—Orloff would not give Casanova an official position, but treated him as an amusing guest—and the disappointed adventurer went to Rome, where he met his old friend, de Bernis.

De Bernis was fifty-five, and in disgrace. The Pompadour had ruined him. Like his friend Casanova, he had been obliged to subir du temps l'irréparable outrage, and he was sad and lack-lustre. 'I look all right,' he said, 'but the truth is, I am not what I was. I am still the slave of the ladies, but the humblest slave of all!'

Casanova was then only forty-seven, and counted his life over. The Mémoires are not carried far beyond this date, 1774; but the history of this period of his life is continued in his other book, The Flight.

'On the 12th September of the year 1774, Signor de Monti, Consul of the Venetian Republic at Trieste, gave me a note from the State Inquisitors, in which they ordered me to present myself within a month to the circospetto, Marc Antonio Businello, their secretary, to learn their good will and pleasure. I went within the twenty-four hours!'

After nineteen years of exile, he was permitted to re-enter Venice, 'and I began to enjoy the pleasure of showing myself openly in the great city, where I had become the talk of the day. I went to thank the Three. They received me graciously, and invited me to dinner, eager to hear from my own lips the story of my escape. This I told them, keeping nothing back.'

Had Casanova only realised the insulting indifference, so like De Choiseul's and Maria Theresa's, as to his capabilities for good or evil, implied by the good-humoured tolerance of these gentlemen! But he had all the obtuseness of vanity, and considered himself a very big man indeed. 'Whether it was self-love, or love of my country,' he says ingenuously, 'I do not know, but the first moments of my return were the happiest of my life. . . . The extraordinary plenitude of my pardon proclaimed me innocent in the eyes of all Europe. . . . Every one expected to see me provided with some suitable employment which would enable me to live at my ease. Every one was mistaken, except myself.'

A post was given him: it was that of a spy in the service of the Government, and he did not prove a very good spy. He has even been accused of treason to Venice, and took, it was said, pay from both sides. But it is a fact that the inquisitors had to complain that his reports contained too much philosophy, and too little information. There are even contemptuous marginal annotations in their own hand discoverable. 'Read, and judged of no importance,' or else 'Wait for better and more practical information.' In a very short while he was virtually dismissed, but continued to send in unofficial communications. Socially his facile and libellous pen got him into more trouble: he perpetrated an insulting satire on a patrician, Grimani, and was 'advised to leave Venice.'

He did so in 1782. We have his own reasons for the step—

'"I am not made for Venice," I said, "or Venice is not made for me, either one or the other!" . . . I left my country as one leaves a house which one likes, but which has grown insupportable because of an unpleasant fellow-visitor. . . . At the age of forty-seven, which was mine then, I realised thoroughly that Fortune had no more to say to me. She is merciless towards men of a certain age.'

From Vienna, where he took refuge, an anonymous letter, predicting an earthquake, threw all Venice into a panic, and is confidently attributed to the firebrand Venetian. At Spa he met Pachiarotti, Browning's famous musician, and in Paris

Count Waldstein. His last fourteen years were spent at Dux, whence he dated his other serious production, the Iocosameron, a 'strange and indigestible' work of the nature of Gulliver's Travels, and of which the scene is laid in England. He also published The Dream, a metaphysical Dialogue between God and Me, in which we recognise our Casanova, whose more salient characteristics, indeed, survived his living death at Dux.

The Italian Da Ponte, Mozart's librettist, several times mentions Casanova in his memoirs. Finding himself one day in the neighbourhood of Dresden and Dux, he remembered that the count's librarian owed him some hundred florins. So he visits Casanova and received, naturally, a warm welcome but no money. Casanova was always poor, in spite of his salary of a thousand florins. He moreover offered to accompany Da Ponte as far as Toeplitz, where the latter sold his chaise and horse for sixty piastres, considering it, for some reason or other, unsafe for travelling. Casanova kindly conducted the negotiations, and two sequins were retained by him for his homeward journey.

'As I can never repay you these, any more than the others I owe you, I will give you three pieces of advice which will be of more use to you than all the treasures of this earth. My dear Da Ponte, if you want to make a fortune, don't go to Paris but to London. But when you are there, never enter the doors of the Café des Italiens in that city, and, lastly, never give your signature.'

Da Ponte admits that the advice was good, and that he had cause to rue his infringement of the two last prohibitions. That he did not grudge his lost money is a proof of the influence exerted over every one by the extraordinary old man. It is the wife of Da Ponte who speaks for Casanova and extols 'his sincerity, eloquence, and knowledge of the world.'

The reader will remember Costa, Casanova's rascally secretary, who ran off with the diamonds, jewels, and money, with which Madame d'Urfé had charged him for Casanova, who did not, in this case, secure the wages of sin. In the Mémoires is the phrase with regard to this Costa, 'I met the rogue again at Vienna in 1785,' and Da Ponte actually gives an account of the meeting, the assurance of the one thief, and the delightful bonhomie of the other:

> 'I was one day walking on the Graben with Casanova, when I suddenly saw him knit his brows, grind his teeth, and twist himself about. Flinging his hands into the air, he rushed up to a man, and catching hold of him, cried out, "Assassin! I have got you at last!" A crowd gathered. I took Casanova by the hand and led him away. He then told me with many ejaculations and gestures the story of the old lady and this man. Costa was then valet to the Comte de Hardegg. While I was walking about with Casanova, Costa went into a café, and wrote these lines in Italian and sent them to him by a small boy. Their significance is as follows:—
> "Casanova, don't make a scene!
> We are both rogues together,
> Thou the master, I the man.
> I learned the trade from thee.
> Thou hast given me bread, I gave thee cake.[1]
> Thy best course is to keep silence."
> 'Casanova began to laugh, and whispered in my ear. "The scoundrel is right." He went into the café, and I made a sign to Costa, who came out, and they walked up and down together as if nothing had happened, and parted after shaking hands several times. When Casanova came back he showed me a ring, a cameo cut in the likeness of Mercury, the protecting god of thieves. This was all that remained of the immense plunder of the poor old dead marquise.'

The admiring Da Ponte gives another instance of the mother-wit that inspired Casanova to repartees that either made or marred him in the minds of his hearers. His retort to the swashbuckler at La Haye in defence of the Venetian Republic, his really dignified rebuke of De la Tour d'Auvergne, who pays his debts with a non-negotiable security—his word of honour—are all instances of the little gems of verbal riposte scattered through his book.

The object of his blunt impertinence was as often as not a crowned head, if we are to believe his version of his famous retort to Joseph II. 'I have no opinion of those who are ready to buy honours,' says the king. 'And what about those who are willing to sell them, sire?' Da Ponte says this retort could never in the nature of things have been made. But the monarch was not averse from trifling amiably with the witty conversationalist. On one occasion, when the emperor was in immediate need of money, Casanova suggested an expedient analogous to that which he had proposed with success to the advisers of the French king—a Lottery. This project was a Chinese fête, which was to amuse the Viennese and profit the promoter. His memorandum on the subject ended with the phrase: Cur, quia, quomodo, quando?

'After the presentation of this memorandum,' says Da Ponte, 'he paid me a visit, and putting a pen in my hand, said—

'"Da Ponte, are we friends?"

'"Certainly."

'"I admit your strict sense of honour, you admit mine."

'Here I was discreetly silent, and he continued—

'I smiled. The Abbé Della Lena and young Foscari were great friends of Casanova, and yet——

'"For the execution of my project," he went on, "I only need one thousand piastres. Sign a bill for me for this sum, payable two months from date, and I will see that it is duly met."

'I laid down the pen, excused myself as well as I could, and went out of the room. In the course of a few days I heard that Foscari, who had already lost heavily to him, had given him a bill by which he hoped to raise the money necessary for his Chinese fête.

'One morning when I was with the emperor, Giacomo requested an audience. He came in, bowed low, and presented the memorandum. The emperor took it, but on seeing its length, folded it up again, and asked him what he wanted. He exposed his project, and Joseph asked his name. "Giacomo Casanova [illegible] the humble person who asks this favour from your Majesty," he answered.

'After a moment's silence, the emperor said with his accustomed affability that Vienna did not care for such spectacles, then turning his back he began to write. Casanova withdrew with a crestfallen air, and I should have followed him, but the emperor retained me, and after repeating three times the name "Casanova," he began to talk about the theatre to me.

'I met my friend shortly afterwards; he was perfectly furious; it is impossible to imagine all the things he said of the sovereign!'

Casanova was of a highly irascible, but yet placable, disposition. The grounds of the long quarrel with the steward Faulkircher which embittered his last years is set forth in his letters to that gentleman found among his papers, and never sent or intended to be sent. It was a mere expenditure of gall on paper that gave relief. He was very miserable. He resented affronts where none were intended, and even the sincere regard of the Prince de Ligne and others could not dissipate the clouds of melancholy that came over him latterly. Yet it would seem that some of the glamour cast by dazzled posterity over legendary heroes had gathered round his name, like Holger Dansk or Barbarossa. It is asserted that he lived till 1811. The matter-of-fact reason for this misapprehension is the confusion between him and his more legitimately famous brother, François, the painter. He really expired, as the register of Oberlestendorp, in the diocese of Leineritz, where lies the seignory of Dux, proves, on the 4th of June 1798, at the age of seventy-eight.

He died in the odour of sanctity, in the presence of several witnesses, with, it would seem, a faint attempt at epigram. This characteristic utterance, according to the Prince de Ligne, who was present at this strange deathbed, ran as follows—

'I have lived, a philosopher, and I die, a Christian!'

INTRODUCTION

Every interested reader of the Memoirs of Jacques Casanova, Venetian, must deplore the untimely death which stilled the pen of the great Adventurer before he had reported the events of the last twenty-four years of his life. The Memoirs terminate abruptly with January, 1774.

Certain it is that the memoirs as written cover the most adventurous part of Casanova's life, and the part during which trouble weighted lightest on his shoulders; and that, after 1774, his circumstances were less in harmony with his peculiar talents. He was the more fascinating figure when his purse was full of money.

"My readers shall hear more of my sufferings later on, if I do not die before I write them down," he wrote (II, 10). But it may be assumed that he would not have spoiled the picture with too sombre a tone and that, if death had not intervened, he could have written several more volumes which would have been none the less piquant in the necessary substitution of more sedate subjects for the recital of the amorous exploits of his earlier years. On the other hand, however, we may believe that the story of his renewed acquaintance with Leah and others, his long liaison with Francesca Buschini, and his autumnal passion for the unknown "young, thoughtless girl", would not have lacked abundance of high flavor.

Scholars, mainly Continental, interested in Casanova, have long since, by patient and exhaustive investigations, satisfied themselves of the truth of his statements and descriptions and have found in the Memoirs, as M. Mayinal remarks, "not the too-faithful portrait of a professional libertine, but one of those vivid, fresh, original documents which help to construct the history of a whole social epoch." These scholars have succeeded also in bringing to light much important material relating to the later years of Casanova's life, from 1774 until his death in 1798.

From this material, in connection with Casanova's anticipatory passages in the Memoirs themselves, we are now able to obtain a satisfactory view of his return to Venice and his relations with the Inquisitors, his later travels, his correspondence with friends of his youth, and his recreations and activities at Dux. To all "good Casanovists", these are matters of absorbing interest.

The essence of these researches may be found, in the chronological list of events prepared by M. J. F. H. Adnesse ("Casanova après ses Mémoires"). With the kind permission of M. Adnesse and of M. Mounastre, the freest use has been made of this work, in connection with the Sources given in the Index, in preparing the present monograph, the intention of which is to set out, briefly and in as "readable" a form as possible under the circumstances, the main points of interest bearing on Casanova's later life, so that this information may be available to readers of English only, who may, nevertheless, know Casanova well through the English translation of the Memoirs by Arthur Machen, Esq. As they are not of general interest within these lines, no text references to Sources are given, other than to the Memoirs themselves, references to the English edition of which are given by Volume and Chapter. Readers may rest assured that all facts given are thoroughly substantiated and may, if they wish, refer to the volumes listed in the Bibliographical Index.

Thanks are due to Benjamin Alexander, Esq., for the use of his exhaustive collection of books by, and relating to, Casanova.

It might interest English readers who are unacquainted with the fact, to know that the Memoirs as originally written have never been published. The original Manuscript came into the possession of the publishing house of Brockhaus at Leipzig in 1820. It was translated from the French into German, in a much abridged form, and published in 1822-28. Before the Manuscript was published in French (in twelve volumes, 1826-28-32-38), it was edited by a Jean Laforgue, a French professor at Dresden, who recast Casanova's rather Italian French into more sedate form and who deleted some passages which, to the Publisher or Editor, appeared too outspoken, either from the view-point of morals or of politics. Although scholars plead for the publication of the text exactly as originally written by Casanova, to this day the firm of Brockhaus remains obdurate.

INTRODUCTION

Giacomo Casanova, who liked to be known as Jacques Casanova de Seingalt, was born in Venice, on April 2, 1725, and died at the Château of Dux in Bohemia, on June 4, 1798. The last fourteen years of his life were spent as Count Waldstein's librarian at Dux, and it was in that retreat that he wrote the Memoirs which were to make him famous, in spite of himself, for he seems to have written chiefly to beguile his premature old age rather than with any thought of posterity. The curious and complicated history of the manuscript shows this. There are references to it in the letters and memoirs of his contemporaries, notably the Prince de Ligne, who has left a vivid picture of the author, but its publication was as haphazard and adventurous as the life of the author himself.

In 1820 a certain Carlo Angiolini, who was the son-in-law of Casanova's younger sister, brought a manuscript entitled, "The Story of My Life to the Year 1797," to the firm of Brockhaus in Leipzig. The work was in twelve volumes and ended abruptly with the year 1774. Nobody seems to know how it came into Angiolini's possession, nor what happened to the concluding portion. Even the manuscript as left by Casanova has never been printed. It was first translated from the original faulty French into German and was published, with many omissions and alterations, from 1822 to 1828. At the same time, Herr Brockhaus had the French text revised by a French professor in Dresden, named Jean Laforgue, who polished Casanova's undoubtedly shaky French, but who also made various suppressions and alterations. In this form, the work also appeared in twelve volumes between 1826 and 1837. Meanwhile other editions began to appear, some of them pirated, all presenting variants upon the German and the French editions of Brockhaus, which were and are the nearest thing we have to the authentic Memoirs of Jacques Casanova.

The original manuscript still reposes in the safe of the Brockhaus firm and there is little chance of its being published in its entirety. Casanova used the crudest language in describing his amorous adventures and although certain admirers, such as Stefan Zweig, are most indignant at the withholding of the complete text, other devoted Casanovists are content to accept the German or the French versions as issued by Brockhaus. They argue that it would be a pity if a work of such intense human and historic interest should come to be classified as a mere piece of pornography. For many years poor Monsieur Laforgue and his pruderies were the object of much sarcastic comment, but recently men have risen up and called his name blessed since, but for his caution, the Memoirs would undoubtedly have been suppressed. As it was, they were not allowed to pass unchallenged by the moralists of the period when they were first issued.

"There are people," wrote Casanova, "who will say that I ought to have been ashamed to publish these Memoirs. It is quite possible that I should, but that is not my feeling. They will call me a pig. Should I be any the less so, if I pretended I were not? Moreover, when I look at a real pig I am inclined to congratulate it on not having Man's qualities of mind. I should be infinitely less disposed to pity a man who had the qualities of a pig." Elsewhere Casanova seems less concerned about what people will say, and declares that his sole purpose is to amuse himself with these memories of his gay past, as he sits in the library at Dux, alone, ailing, and cut off from the only activities which really interested him: the pursuit of women and of adventure.

The eighteenth century is peculiarly rich in memoirs of all kinds: Restif de la Bretonne, Rousseau, Madame Roland, Duclos, Hamilton—all are mirrors of an age whose gaiety, freedom and spontaneity made it possible for colorful lives to be related colorfully, without prudish fears. Of those memoir writers none assuredly took life more easily, more carelessly than Casanova, and his reward is immortality. The most diverse commentators have saluted his Memoirs as the most vivid and valuable picture extant of eighteenth-century life. He went everywhere: Rome, Turin, Naples, Genoa, Trieste, Corfu, Constantinople, London, Paris, Madrid, Petersburg, Berlin, Vienna, Warsaw. He encountered every type of person: Frederick II, Catherine the Great, Pope Benedict XIV, George III, the Marquise de Pompadour. He is as interested in seducing an innkeeper's daughter as in discussing Italian literature with Voltaire. Cardinals, statesmen, cardsharpers interest him; he would as soon relate his flight from the Piombi prison in a respectable drawing-room as engage in an amorous intrigue with two nuns simultaneously. The sequel to his conversations with Voltaire is like a chapter from Straparole or Boccaccio.

Havelock Ellis has said: "Casavona has been described as a psychological type of instability. That is to view him superficially. A man who adapts himself so readily and so effectively to any change in his environment or in his desires only exhibits the instability which marks the most intensely vital organisms. The energy and ability which Casanova displayed in gratifying his instincts would have sufficed to make a reputation of the first importance in any department, as a popular statesman, a great judge, a merchant prince, and enabled him to die worn out by the monotonous and feverish toil of the senate, the court, or the counting-house. Casanova chose to live. A crude and barbarous choice it seems to us, with our hereditary instinct to spend our lives in wasting the reasons for living."

Nobody has written with more perfect appreciation of Casanova than the author of "The Dance of Life," a title which so aptly describes the spirit of these Memoirs. Casanova was quintessentially of that eighteenth century which was swept away by the French Revolution, whose distant noise scarcely disturbed him in his retirement at Dux; that life was behind him and it mattered little to him that it would never return. The world in which he had lived well, if not wisely, "seemed none the worse," says Havelock Ellis, "for the apparent subsidence of Christianity; in the opinion of many it seemed to be very much better. The tolerant paganism of classic days appeared to be reasserting itself, robustly in England, with a delicate refinement in France,—setting the paganism of Watteau against the paganism of Fielding—while Goethe and the Germans generally were striving to rescue and harmonize the best of Christianity with the best of antiquity. European civilization was fully expanded; for a long time no great disturbing force had arisen, and though on every side the tender buds of coming growths might have been detected, they could not yet reveal their strength. Such a period certainly has its terrible defects; mellowness is not far from rottenness. But then youth also has its defects, and its crude acidity is still further from perfection."

In his delightful portrait of Casanova, whose name he strikingly couples with those of Stendhal and Tolstoy, Stefan Zweig presents the Venetian adventurer as representing the first and most primitive stage of self-portraiture: the naïve and ingenuous delight in life for life's sake, untroubled by psychological or religious introspection. That, in effect, is the singular fascination of these Memoirs, their complete freedom from moral or intellectual inhibitions. The exterior world alone exists for Casanova; he sees it as an adventure, a gamble, and pays the price of his follies with the same unconcern as he accepts his good fortunes. In all his travels he never once notes a landscape, or pauses to admire the effects of Nature. Human nature is his exclusive pleasure; the more people there are about him the happier he feels; the town rather than the country is his hunting ground. A dilettante of the arts and sciences, museums and picture galleries do not detain him, for art, to him, is the servant of life, and exists only in so far as it enhances the charm of living.

This absence in him of introspective scruples coupled with the physical glamour and audacity of the man doubtless explain why recriminations never followed his encounters with women. He treated them all alike, and they all liked him. For this we have the evidence not only of the Memoirs themselves, which might be open to suspicion, but of the letters of the women, and the undeniable fact that he maintained the friendliest relations with so many of them after he had accomplished his purpose with them. He was not a libertine but a skilled lover. To quote Havelock Ellis again: "He sought his pleasure in the pleasure, and not in the complaisance, of the women he loved, and they seemed to have gratefully and tenderly recognized his skill in the art of love-making. Casanova loved many women, but broke few hearts. . . . That he knew himself well enough never to take either wife or mistress must be counted as a virtue, such as it was, in this incomparable lover of so many women. A man of finer moral fiber could scarcely have loved so many women; a man of coarser fiber could never have left so many women happy."

"My story," said Casanova, "is that of a bachelor whose chief business in life was to cultivate the pleasures of the senses," and he added his belief that people would be "curious to see what happened to a man who surrendered to his nature and whose great system consisted in not having any." Amongst his papers in the library at Dux many fragments were found in which he essayed to expound his philosophy of life and to justify his Memoirs. It is evident that, while he wrote primarily for his own amusement, he realized that his life offered a spectacle of universal interest and that it must be judged for what it was rather than what conventional morality would expect it to be. He quite frankly admitted and hoped that his delight in his own sins of the flesh would be shared by his readers. "People will say that a book which offends virtue is bad. I admit it; and I confess that those whose favorite virtue is chastity, who shudder at the thought of the pleasure they had in love when young, who are revolted by amorous ecstasy and believe that it defiles the soul, had better refrain from reading me."

Casanova obviously understood human nature as the fascinating story of his life proves, and the enduring success of his Memoirs.

EDITOR'S NOTE

THE twelve-volume Aventuros edition of Casanova's MEMOIRS (New York, 1925), which the present editor assisted in preparing for publication, has been used, with due consent of the publishers, as a basis for the present edition. Where clarity or correct rendering required emendation of the English text, the eight-volume French edition (Paris, Garnier) has been employed. Also, for purposes of general publication, some excisions and paraphrasing have been found necessary, but these slight modifications have not altered the character or the essential content of this uniquely interesting and informative revelation of a life and a social period.

TRANSLATOR'S NOTE

In the years 1888-1889 I was very busy indeed. My days and nights were spent in translating from the French; and there was a curious diversity in the books that I was rendering and in the manner of the two operations.

At that time I was employed by a firm of second-hand booksellers, whose shop was somewhere in the neighbourhood of Leicester Square. They dealt in the more precious and curious books; in books bound by the great masters of the art of bookbinding, in books illustrated by Fragonard and his fellows of the eighteenth century, in books known only to the elder school of collectors. I was the unworthy cataloguer of this firm of Cheeryble Brothers, and in the course of my calling I came upon a queer little duodecimo, bearing (I think) the date 1610. This was the first edition of Le Moyen de Parvenir, by Bervalde de Verville; and something queer, bizarre, fantastic in the text enchanted me. I resolved to translate it, and, having bought a modern edition at Nutt's in the Strand, there where the street grew narrow between St. Mary-le-Strand and St. Clement Dane's—all vanished now, alas!—I set about turning the most difficult book in the French language into English; all just for fun and the joy of the adventure. At twenty-six one has the oddest notions of amusement.

This was the business—rather, the pleasure—of the evenings in my rooms—or was it room?—in Great Russell Street. But my serious occupation, that by which I lived, was carried on in the daytime, in a strange place in the bowels of the earth beneath the shop of the Brothers Cheeryble. There I translated Casanova day after day, and lived by these labours for more than a year.

It was, probably, all to the good, both for me and my work, that the two books were in such violent contrast. The one, Le Moyen de Parvenir, a very spider-web puzzle and labyrinth both in thought and in language; the other, Casanova's Memoirs, lucidity itself. And, accordingly, I attacked the two labours very differently. Casanova's French, as I say, was all clarity. There was no doubt as to the sense of a single phrase; there were no shades of meaning to be considered. It was simply an affair of rendering the clear and lively French into the easiest English that I could summon to my pen. And I found the best way of keeping up the brisk current of language was to put my watch on the table and see how fast I could turn a page of French into a page of English. I think I beat down the record from ten minutes to seven or even to six and a half; and the faster the pen sped the better the task was done. At night, everything was different; painful, slow, laborious schemes and works and contrivances—this giving of the French scholar-clown of the seventeenth century a fitting English dress.

Each labour had its peculiar joys. I need not speak now of Bervalde de Verville; as to Casanova, the parts of him which I recall with the greatest pleasure are the small adventures and the back alley business rather than the meetings with kings and popes and philosophers. I like to hear of little things; of the supper of pork chops that the scopatore santissimo provided for his guests; of the ways of Italian strolling players in the eighteenth century "fit-ups"; of that magic figure that the witch was to bathe in blood; of the significant salad prepared in the Casino at Venice; of the Italian scholar correcting proofs of the Decameron in a London coffee-house. There are some people who prefer the small talk in the dressing-room to the larger speech of the stage, and I am one of them. The Cabala of Casanova, which cost Madame d'Urfé so dearly, is, at all events, much more entertaining than the Cabala of Knorr von Rosenroth.

TRANSLATOR'S PREFACE

A SERIES of adventures wilder and more fantastic than the wildest of romances, written down with the exactitude of a business diary; a view of men and cities from Naples to Berlin, from Madrid and London to Constantinople and St. Petersburg; the vie intime of the eighteenth century depicted by a man, who to-day sat with cardinals and saluted crowned heads, and to-morrow lurked in dens of profligacy and crime; a book of confessions penned without reticence and without penitence; a record of forty years of "occult" charlatanism; a collection of tales of successful imposture, of bonnes fortunes, of marvellous escapes, of transcendent audacity, told with the humour of Smollett and the delicate wit of Voltaire. Who is there interested in men and letters, and in the life of the past, who would not cry, "Where can such a book as this be found?"

Yet the above catalogue is but a brief outline, a bare and meagre summary, of the book known as "THE MEMOIRS OF CASANOVA"; a work absolutely unique in literature. He who opens these wonderful pages is as one who sits in a theatre and looks across the gloom, not on a stage-play, but on another and a vanished world. The curtain draws up, and suddenly a hundred and fifty years are rolled away, and in bright light stands out before us the whole life of the past; the gay dresses, the polished wit, the careless morals, and all the revel and dancing of those merry years before the mighty deluge of the Revolution. The palaces and marble stairs of old Venice are no longer desolate, but thronged with scarlet-robed senators, prisoners with the doom of the Ten upon their heads cross the Bridge of Sighs, at dead of night the nun slips out of the convent gate to the dark canal where a gondola is waiting, we assist at the parties fines of cardinals, and we see the bank made at faro. Venice gives place to the assembly rooms of Mrs. Cornely and the fast taverns of the London of 1760; we pass from Versailles to the Winter Palace of St. Petersburg in the days of Catherine, from the policy of the Great Frederick to the lewd mirth of strolling-players, and the presence-chamber of the Vatican is succeeded by an intrigue in a garret. It is indeed a new experience to read this history of a man who, refraining from nothing, has concealed nothing; of one who stood in the courts of Louis the Magnificent before Madame de Pompadour and the nobles of the Ancien Régime, and had an affair with an adventuress of Denmark Street, Soho; who was bound over to keep the peace by Fielding, and knew Cagliostro. The friend of popes and kings and noblemen, and of all the male and female ruffians and vagabonds of Europe, abbé, soldier, charlatan, gamester, financier, diplomatist, viveur, philosopher, virtuoso, "chemist, fiddler, and buffoon," each of these, and all of these was Giacomo Casanova, Chevalier de Seingalt, Knight of the Golden Spur.

And not only are the Memoirs a literary curiosity; they are almost equally curious from a bibliographical point of view. The manuscript was written in French and came into the possession of the publisher Brockhaus, of Leipzig, who had it translated into German, and printed. From this German edition, M. Aubert de Vitry re-translated the work into French, but omitted about a fourth of the matter, and this mutilated and worthless version is frequently purchased by unwary bibliophiles. In the year 1826, however, Brockhaus, in order presumably to protect his property, printed the entire text of the original MS. in French, for the first time, and in this complete form, containing a large number of anecdotes and incidents not to be found in the spurious version, the work was not acceptable to the authorities, and was consequently rigorously suppressed. Only a few copies sent out for presentation or for review are known to have escaped, and from one of these rare copies the present translation has been made strictly and solely for private circulation.

In conclusion, both translator and éditeur have done their utmost to present the English Casanova in a dress worthy of the wonderful and witty original.

I have stated that Wendell Holmes was once heard defending Casanova. When challenged for my authority for that statement by Dr. Tage Bull, the chief of living Casanovists, I had to acknowledge that it was only a second-hand authority, and that I could positively state only that C. G. Leland remarks, in his Memoirs, that at one of the weekly dinners of the Atlantic Club in 1861 or 1862, when Emerson, Lowell, Agassiz, and other distinguished men were present, no one (except Leland) knew the Mémoires of Casanova save only Holmes. But what Holmes thought of them remains, so far as I am aware, unrevealed.

If I were to enlarge—which would not be to change—this book, it is precisely to the study of Casanova, and to the earlier study of Nietzsche, that my attention would be turned.

During the past ten years Casanova has at last come to his own place. The serious interest of his unique record of his age and of the problem presented by his own unique personality are now undisputed. At the same time, since he has been subjected to microscopical investigation, both the record and the personality are found to possess at various points numerous puzzling difficulties. In this way Casanova's reputation may be said to have entered on its third stage. At first he was a disreputable adventurer who had written a discreditable and probably fictitious narrative of his own unmentionable experiences. Then by a natural reaction from that extreme view, as his significance became clear, he was promoted to a position of undisputed credit. Now he is viewed with more critical discrimination. His essential veracity cannot be questioned, and is at innumerable points demonstrable. But we cannot take for granted that he exerted in the narration of his life a scrupulosity which, on his own showing, he failed to exert in the living of it. Numerous details of the narrative cannot be verified where we should expect to find them verified; various episodes have, rightly or wrongly, been regarded by some critics as imaginary interpolations; and it has been suspected that the creditable motive of protecting persons who were still living induced Casanova to change the character of some incidents. Every future study of Casanova must face these controverted points. It seems right that some mention should be made of this difficulty here, although the discussion of Casanova in the following pages is based on broader ground now scarcely in dispute.

CASANOVA.

THERE are few more delightful books in the world than Casanova's Mémoires.—That is a statement I have long vainly sought to see in print. It is true, one learns casually that various eminent literary personages have cherished a high regard for this autobiography, have even considered it the ideal autobiography, that Wendell Holmes was once heard defending Casanova, that Thackeray found him good enough to steal from. But these eminent personages — and how many more we shall never know — locked up the secret of their admiration for this book in some remote casket of their breasts; they never confided it to the cynical world. Every properly constituted "man of letters" has always recognised that any public allusion to Casanova should begin and end with lofty moral reprobation of his unspeakable turpitude.

No doubt whatever—and this apart from the question as to whether his autobiography should be counted as moral or immoral literature—Casanova delivered himself bound into the hands of the moralists. He recognised this; his autobiography, as he himself truly said, was "a confession, if ever there was one." But he wrote at the end of a long and full life, in the friendly seclusion of a lonely Bohemian castle, when all things had become indifferent to him save the vivid memories of the past. It mattered little to him that the whirlwind of 1789 had just swept away the eighteenth century together with the moral maxims that passed current in that century. We have to accept these facts at the outset when we approach Casanova. And if a dweller in the highly respectable nineteenth century may be forgiven a first exclamation of horror at Casanova's wickedness, he has wofully failed in critical insight if he allows that exclamation to be his last word concerning these Mémoires.

There are at least three points of view from which Casanova's Mémoires are of deep and permanent interest. In the first place they constitute an important psychological document as the full and veracious presentation of a certain human type in its most complete development. In the second place, as a mere story of adventure and without reference to their veracity, the Mémories have never been surpassed, and only equalled by books written on a much smaller scale. In the third place, we here possess an unrivalled picture of the eighteenth century in its most characteristic aspects throughout Europe.

I.

Casanova lived in an age which seems to have been favourable to the spontaneous revelation of human nature in literature. It was not only the age in which the novel reached full development; it was the age of diaries and autobiographies. Pepys, indeed, though he died in the eighteenth century, had written his diary long before; but during Casanova's lifetime Boswell was writing that biography which is so wonderful largely because it is so nearly an autobiography. Casanova's communicative countryman, Gozzi, was also his contemporary. Rousseau's Confessions only preceded Casanova's Mémoires by a few years, and a little later Restif de la Bretonne wrote Monsieur Nicolas, and Madame Roland her Mémoires Particulières. All these autobiographies are very unlike Casanova's. They mostly seem to present the shady sides of otherwise eminent and respectable lives. The highly-placed government official of versatile intellectual tastes exhibits himself as a monster of petty weaknesses; the eloquent apostle of the return to Nature uncovers the corroding morbidities we should else never suspect; the philanthropic pioneer in social reform exposes himself in a state of almost maniacal eroticism; the austere heroine who was nourished on Plutarch confesses that she is the victim of unhappy passion. We are conscious of no such discords in Casanova's autobiography. Partly it may be because we have no other picture of Casanova before our eyes. Moreover, he had no conventional ideals to fall short of; he was an adventurer from the first. "I am proud because I am nothing," he used to say. He could not boast of his birth; he never held high position; for the greatest part of his active career he was an exile; at every moment of his life he was forced to rely on his own real and personal qualities. But the chief reason why we feel no disturbing discord in Casanova's Mémoires lies in the admirable skill with which he has therein exploited his unquestionable sincerity. He is a consummate master in the dignified narration of undignified experiences. Fortified, it is true, by a confessed and excessive amour propre, he never loses his fine sense of equilibrium, his power of presenting his own personality broadly and harmoniously. He has done a few dubious things in his time, he seems to say, and now and again found himself in positions that were ridiculous enough; but as he looks back he feels that the like may have happened to any of us. He views these things with complete human tolerance as a necessary part of the whole picture, which it would be idle to slur over or apologise for. He records them simply, not without a sense of humour, but with no undue sense of shame. In his heart, perhaps, he is confident that he has given the world one of its greatest books, and that posterity will require of him no such rhetorical justification as Rousseau placed at the head of his Confessions.

In the preface to the Mémoires, Casanova is sufficiently frank. He has not scrupled, he tells us, to defraud fools and rascals, "when necessary," and he has never regretted it. But such incidents have been but episodes in his life. He is not a sensualist, he says, for he has never neglected his duty—"when I had any"—for the allurements of sense; yet the main business of his life has ever been in the world of sense; "there is none of greater importance." "I have always loved women and have done my best to make them love me. I have also delighted in good cheer, and I have passionately followed whatever has excited my curiosity." Now in old age he reviews the joys of his life. He has learnt to be content with one meal a day, in spite of a sound digestion, but he recalls the dishes that delighted him: Neapolitan macaroni, Spanish olla podrida, Newfoundland cod, high-flavoured game, old cheese (has he not collected material for a Dictionnaire des Fromages?), and without any consciousness of abrupt transition he passes on to speak of the fragrant sweetness of the women he had loved. Then with a smile of pity he turns on those who call such tastes depraved, the poor insensate fools who think the Almighty is only able to enjoy our sorrow and abstinence, and bestows upon us for nought the gift of self-respect, the love of praise, the desire to excel, energy, strength, courage, and the power to kill ourselves when we will. And with the strain of Stoicism which is ever present to give fibre to his Epicureanism, he quotes the maxim which might well belong to both philosophies: "Nemo læditur nisi a seipso."

The fact that Casanova was on one side a Venetian must count for something in any attempt to explain him. Not indeed that Venice ever produced more than one Casanova; I would imply no such disrespect to Venice—or to Casanova—but the racial soil was favourable to such a personality. The Venetians are a branch of a more northern people who long since settled by the southern sea to grow mellow in the sunshine. It suited them well, for they expanded into one of the finest races in Christendom, and certainly one of the least Christian races there, a solid, well-tempered race, self-controlled and self-respecting. The Venetian genius is the genius of sensuous enjoyment, of tolerant humanity, of unashamed earthliness. Whatever was sane and stable in Casanova, and his instinctive distaste for the morbid and perverse, he owes to his Venetian maternal ancestry. If it is true that he was not a mere sensualist, it was by no means because of his devotion to duty—"when I had any,"—but because the genuine sensualist is only alive on the passive side of his nature, and in Casanova's nervous system the development of the sensory fibres is compensated and held in balance by the equal vigour of the motor fibres; what he is quick to enjoy he is strong and alert to achieve. Thus he lived the full and varied life that he created for himself at his own good pleasure out of nothing, by the sole power of his own magnificent wits. And now the self-sufficing Venetian sits down to survey his work and finds that it is good. It has not always been found so since. A "self-made" man, if ever there was one, Casanova is not revered by those who worship self-help. The record of his life will easily outlive the largest fortune ever made in any counting-house, but the life itself remains what we call a "wasted" life. Thrift, prudence, modesty, scrupulous integrity, strict attention to business—it is useless to come to Casanova for any of these virtues. They were not even in his blood; he was only half Venetian.

The Casanova family was originally Spanish. The first Casanova on record was a certain Don Jacobo, of illegitimate birth, who in the middle of the fifteenth century became secretary to King Alfonso. He fell in love with a lady destined to the religious life, and the day after she had pronounced her vows he carried her off from her convent to Rome, where he finally obtained the forgiveness and benediction of the Pope. The son of this union, Don Juan, killed an officer of the King of Naples, fled from Rome, and sought fortune with Columbus, dying on the voyage. Don Juan's son, Marcantonio, secretary to a cardinal, was noted in his day as an epigrammatic poet; but his satire was too keen, and he also had to flee from Rome. His son became a colonel, and, unlike his forefathers, died peacefully, in extreme old age, in France. In this soldier's grandson, Casanova's father, the adventurous impulsiveness of the family again came out; he ran away from home at nineteen with a young actress, and himself became an actor; subsequently he left the actress and then fell in love with a young Venetian beauty of sixteen, Zanetta Farusi, a shoemaker's daughter. But a mere actor could find no favour in a respectable family, so the young couple ran away and were married; the hero of these Mémoires, born on the 2nd April, 1725, was their first-born. There is probably no reason to doubt the substantial accuracy of this family history, but if one desired to invent an ancestry for Casanova he could scarcely better it.

His race helps to account for Casanova, but the real explanation of the man can only lie in his own congenital organisation. That he was a radically abnormal person is fairly clear. Not that he was morbid either in body or mind. On the contrary, he was a man of fine presence, of abounding health—always looking ten years younger than his age—of the most robust appetites, a great eater, who delighted to see others, especially women, eat heartily also, a man of indubitable sexual vigour; however great the demands he made upon his physical energy it seldom failed to respond, and his capacity for rest was equally great; he could sleep nineteen hours at a stretch. His mental health was not less sound. The most punctilious alienist, with this frank and copious history before him, could not commit Casanova to an asylum. Whatever offences against social codes he may have committed, Casanova can scarcely be said to have sinned against natural laws. He was only abnormal because so natural a person within the gates of civilisation is necessarily abnormal and at war with his environment. Far from being the victim of morbidities and perversities, Casanova presents to us the natural man in excelsis. He was a man for whom the external world existed, and who reacted to all the stimuli it presents to the healthy normal organism. His intelligence was immensely keen and alert, his resourcefulness, his sagacious audacity, his presence of mind, were all of the first order. He was equally swift to feel, to conceive, and to act. His mental organisation was thus singularly harmonious, and hence his success in gratifying his eager and immense appetite for the world, an appetite unsatiated and insatiable even to the last, or he would have found no pleasure in writing these Mémoires. Casanova has been described as a psychological type of instability. That is to view him superficially. A man who adapts himself so readily and so effectively to any change in his environment or in his desires only exhibits the instability which marks the most intensely vital organisms. The energy and ability which Casanova displayed in gratifying his instincts would have sufficed to make a reputation of the first importance in any department, as a popular statesman, a great judge, a merchant prince, and enabled him to die worn out by the monotonous and feverish toil of the senate, the court, or the counting-house. Casanova chose to live. A crude and barbarous choice it seems to us, with our hereditary instinct to spend our lives in wasting the reasons for living. But it is certain that Casanova never repented his choice. Assuredly we need not, for few judges, statesmen, or merchants have ever left for the joy of humanity any legacy of their toil equal to these Mémoires.

But such swift energy of vital action and reaction, such ardour of deed in keeping pace with desire, are in themselves scarcely normal. Casanova's abnormality is suggested by the tendency to abnormality which we find in his family. We have seen what men his ancestors were; in reading the Mémoires we gather incidentally that one of his brothers had married, though impotent, and another brother is described as a somewhat feeble-minded ne'er-do-well. All the physical and mental potency of the family was intensely concentrated in Casanova. Yet he himself in early childhood seems to have been little better than an idiot either in body or mind. He could recall nothing that happened before he was eight years of age. He was not expected to live; he suffered from prolonged hæmorrhages from the nose, and the vision of blood was his earliest memory. As a child he habitually kept his mouth open, and his face was stupid. "Thickness of the blood," said the physicians of those days; it seems probable that he suffered from growths in the nose which, as we now know, produce such physical and mental inferiority as Casanova describes. The cure was spontaneous. He was taken to Padua, and shortly afterwards began to develop wonderfully both in stature and intelligence. In after years he had little cause to complain either of health or intellect. It is notable, however, that when, still a boy, he commenced his ecclesiastical training (against his wishes, for he had chosen to be a doctor), he failed miserably as a preacher, and broke down in the pulpit; thus the Church lost a strange ornament. Moreover, with all his swift sensation and alert response, there was in Casanova an anomalous dulness of moral sensibility. The insults to Holy Religion which seem to have brought him to that prison from which he effected his marvellous escape, were scarcely the serious protests of a convinced heretic; his deliberate trickery of Mme. d'Urfé was not only criminal but cruel. His sense of the bonds of society was always somewhat veiled, and although the veil never became thick, and might be called the natural result of an adventurer's life, one might also, perhaps, maintain that it was a certain degree of what is sometimes called moral imbecility that made Casanova an adventurer. But while we thus have to recognise that he was a man of dulled moral sensibility, we must also recognise that he possessed a vigorous moral consciousness of his own, or we misunderstand him altogether.

The point to be remembered is that the threshold of his moral sensibility was not easily reached. There are some people whose tactile sensibility is so obtuse that it requires a very wide separation of the æsthesiometer to get the right response. It was so with Casanova's moral sensitiveness. But, once aroused, his conscience responded energetically enough. It seems doubtful whether, from his own point of view, he ever fell into grave sin, and therefore he is happily free from remorse. No great credit is thus due to him; the same psychological characteristic is familiar in all criminals. It is not difficult to avoid plucking the apples of shame when so singularly few grow on your tree.

Casanova's moral sensibility and its limits come out, where a man's moral sensibility will come out, in his relations with women. Women played a large part in Casanova's life; he was nearly always in love. We may use the word "love" here in no euphemistic sense, for although Casanova's passions grew and ripened with the rapidity born of long experience in these matters, so fresh is the vitality of the man that there is ever a virginal bloom on every new ardour. He was as far removed from the cold-blooded libertine typified in Laclos's Valmont, unscrupulously using women as the instruments of his own lust, as from Laura's sonneteering lover. He had fully grasped what the latest writer on the scientific psychology of sex calls the secondary law of courting, namely, the development in the male of an imaginative attentiveness to the psychical and bodily states of the female, in place of an exclusive attentiveness to his own gratification. It is not impossible that in these matters Casanova could have given a lesson to many virtuous husbands of our own highly moral century. He never sank to the level of the vulgar maxim that "all's fair in love and war." He sought his pleasure in the pleasure, and not in the complaisance, of the women he loved, and they seem to have gratefully and tenderly recognised his skill in the art of love-making. Casanova loved many women, but broke few hearts. The same women appear again and again through his pages, and for the most part no lapse of years seems to deaden the gladness with which he goes forth to meet them anew. That he knew himself well enough never to take either wife or mistress must be counted as a virtue, such as it was, in this incomparable lover of so many women. A man of finer moral fibre could scarcely have loved so many women; a man of coarser fibre could never have left so many women happy.

This very lack of moral delicacy which shuts Casanova off from the finest human development is an advantage to the autobiographer. It insures his sincerity because he is unconscious of offence; it saves us from any wearisome self-justification, because, for all his amused self-criticism, he sees no real need for justification. In Rousseau's Confessions we hear the passionate pleader against men at the tribunal of God; here we are conscious neither of opponent nor tribunal. Casanova is neither a pillar of society nor yet one of the moral Samsons who delight to pull down the pillars of society; he has taken the world as it is, and he has taken himself as he is, and he has enjoyed them both hugely. So he is free to set forth the whole of himself, his achievements, his audacities, his failures, his little weaknesses and superstitions, his amours, his quarrels, his good fortune and his bad fortune in the world that on the whole he has found so interesting and happy a place to dwell in. And his book remains an unending source of delightful study of the man of impulse and action in all his moods. The self-reliant man, immensely apt for enjoyment, who plants himself solidly with his single keen wit before the mighty oyster of the world, has never revealed himself so clearly before.

What manner of man Casanova seemed to his contemporaries has only been discovered of recent years; and while the picture which we obtain of him has been furnished by his enemies, and was not meant to flatter, it admirably supports the Mémoires. In 1755 a spy of the Venetian Inquisition reported that Casanova united impiety, imposture, and wantonness to a degree that inspired horror. It was in that same year that he was arrested, chiefly on the charge of contempt for religion, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment. Fifteen months later he had effected his famous escape, and was able to pursue his career as an assured and accomplished adventurer who had brilliantly completed his apprenticeship. It is not until many years later, in 1772, when his long efforts to obtain pardon from his country still remained unsuccessful, that we obtain an admirable picture of him from the Venetian agent at Ancona. "He comes and goes where he will," the agent reports, "with open face and haughty mien, always well equipped. He is a man of some forty years at most [really about forty-eight, thus confirming Casanova's statement that he was always taken for some ten years younger than his years], of lofty stature, of fine and vigorous aspect, with bright eyes and very brown skin. He wears a short, chestnut-coloured peruke. I am told that his character is bold and disdainful, but especially that he is full of speech, and of witty and well-instructed speech." Two years later Casanova was at last permitted to return to Venice. He there accepted the post of secret agent of the State Inquisition for service within the city. Like Defoe and Toland, who were also secret political agents, he attempted to justify himself on grounds of public duty. In a few years, however, he was dismissed, perhaps, as Baschet suggests, on account of the fact that his reports contained too much philosophy and not enough espionage; probably it was realised that a man of such powerful individuality and independence was not fitted for servile uses. Finally, in 1782, he was banished from Venice for an offence to which the blood of the Casanovas had always been easily inclined—he published an audacious satire against a patrician. From Venice he went to Trieste, and thence to Vienna. There he met Count Waldstein, a fervent adept of Kabbalistic science, a subject in which Casanova himself claimed to be proficient; he had found it useful in certain dealings with credulous people. In 1784 the count offered him the post of librarian, with a salary of one thousand florins, at his castle of Dux, in Bohemia. It is said to be a fine castle, and is still noted for its charming park. Here this prince of Bohemians spent the remainder of his life, devoting seven years to the Mémoires, on which he was still engaged at his death. A terra-cotta bust discovered at the castle (and etched some years ago for Le Livre) shows him in mature age, a handsome, energetic, and imposing head, with somewhat deep-set eyes; it is by no means the head of a scamp, but rather that of a philosopher, a philosopher with unusual experience of affairs, a successful statesman, one might say. A medallion portrait, of later date, which has also been reproduced, shows him at the age of sixty-three with lean, eager face, and lofty, though receding forehead, the type of the man of quick perception and swift action, the eagle type of man. The Prince de Ligne has also left a description of him as he appeared in old age, now grown very irritable, ready to flare up at any imagined insult, engaged in perpetual warfare with domestics, but receiving the highest consideration from those who knew how to appreciate the great qualities of the man and his unequalled experiences, and who knew also how to indulge his susceptibilities and smile at his antique fashions. Once he went off in a huff to Weimar, and was graciously received by the Duke, but he soon came back again; all the favours there were showered on a certain court favourite, one Goethe. It is clear, as we read the Prince de Ligne's detailed description, that the restless old adventurer had need, even in the peaceful seclusion of Dux, of all the consolation yielded by Socrates, Horace, Seneca, and Boethius, his favourite philosophers. Here, at Dux, on the 4th of June 1798, Casanova died. "Bear witness that I have lived as a philosopher and die as a Christian;" that, we are told, was his last utterance after he had received the sacraments.

From that moment Casanova with everything that concerned him was covered by a pall of oblivion. He seems to have been carelessly cast aside, together with the century of which he was so characteristic, and, as it now appears, so memorable a child. The world in which he had lived so joyously and completely had been transformed by the Revolution. The new age of strenuous commercialism and complacent philanthropy was in its vigorous youth, a sword in its right hand and a Bible in its left. The only adventurer who found favour now was he who took the glad news of salvation to the heathen, or mowed them down to make new openings for trade. Had he been born later, we may be well assured, Casanova would have known how to play his part; he would not have fallen short of Borrow, who became an agent of the Bible Society. But as it was, what had the new age to do with Casanova? No one cared, no one even yet has cared, so much as to examine the drawers and cupboards full of papers which he left behind at Dux. Only on the 13th of February, 1820, was the oblivion a little stirred. On that date a certain Carlo Angiolieri appeared at Leipzig in the office of the famous publisher, Brockhaus, carrying a voluminous manuscript in the handwriting (as we now know) of Casanova and bearing the title, Histoire de ma Vie jusqu'à l'an 1797.

But even the appearance of Carlo Angiolieri failed to dissipate the gloom. Fifty years more were to pass before the figure of Casanova again became clear. This man, so ardently alive in every fibre, had now become a myth. The sagacious world—which imparts the largest dole of contempt to the pilgrim who brings back to it the largest gifts—refused to take Casanova seriously. The shrewd critic wondered who wrote Casanova, just as he has since wondered who wrote Shakespeare. Paul Lacroix paid Stendhal the huge compliment of suggesting that he had written the Mémoires, a sufficiently ingenious suggestion, for in Stendhal's Dauphiny spirit there is something of that love of adventure which is supremely illustrated in Casanova. But we now know that, as Armand Baschet first proved, Casanova himself really wrote his own Mémoires. Moreover, so far as investigation has yet been able to go, he wrote with strict regard to truth. Wherever it is possible to test Casanova, his essential veracity has always been vindicated. In the nature of things it is impossible to verify much that he narrates. When, however, we remember that he was telling the story of his life primarily for his own pleasure, it is clear that he had no motive for deception; and when we consider the surpassingly discreditable episodes which he has recorded, we may recall that he has given not indeed positive proof of sincerity, but certainly the best that can be given in the absence of direct proof. It remains a question how far a man is able to recollect the details of the far past—the conversations he held, the garments he wore, the meals he ate—so precisely as Casanova professes to recollect them. This is a psychological problem which has not yet been experimentally examined. There are, however, great individual differences in memory, and there is reason to believe that an organisation, such as Casanova's, for which the external world is so vivid, is associated with memory-power of high quality. That this history is narrated with absolute precision of detail Casanova himself would probably not have asserted. But there is no reason to doubt his good faith, and there is excellent reason to accept the substantial accuracy of his narrative. It remains a personal document of a value which will increase rather than diminish as time goes by. It is one of the great autobiographical revelations which the ages have left us, with Augustine's, Cellini's, Rousseau's, of its own kind supreme.

II.

The Mémoires are authentic; they give us what they profess to give us—the true story of a man who unites (as it has been well said) the characters of Gil Blas and of Figaro. Thus Casanova was the incarnation in real life of the two most typical imaginative figures of his century. Yet even if the Mémoires had been the invention of some novelist of surpassing genius they would still possess extraordinary interest. We may forget that the book is an autobiography, and still find it, as a story of adventure, the apotheosis of the picaresque novel.

The picaresque novel—although a Frenchman brought it to perfection in Gil Blas—arose and flourished in Spain, Casanova's ancestral country, and its piquancy, variety, and audacity seem to have been very congenial to the Spanish spirit and the Spanish soil. Casanova's Mémoires carry this form of story on to a broader and in some respects higher plane. The old picaro never dared affront the world; he cringed before it and slunk behind its back to make grimaces. Casanova, too, was an adventurer living by his wits, but he approached the world with the same self-confidence as he approached a beautiful woman, and having won its favours treats it with the same consideration. Unlike the picaro whose delight it is to reveal the pettinesses of the men he has duped, Casanova shows his magnificence in adventure by regarding the world as a foeman worthy of all his courtesy; and with incomparable impartiality, as well as skill, he presents to us the narrative of all the perils he encountered or sought. Few old men sitting down in the evening of their days to chatter of old times have been so free as Casanova from the vices of senile literature. He never maunders of the things that are so dear to the aged merely because they are past; he introduces no superfluous reflections or comments. We recognise that the hand which keeps this pen so surely to the point is the hand of a man of action. Casanova's skill in narrative is conspicuously shown in the love-adventures which form so large and important a part of his book, as of his life. (Men usually regard love as a bagatelle, he says somewhere, but, for his own part, he adds, he has found no more important business in life.) There would seem to be nothing so difficult as to tell a long series of amours, unshrinkingly, from first to last, without drawing a curtain at any stage. Nearly every writer in fiction or in autobiography who has attempted this has only produced an effect of weary monotony or else of oppressive closeness. But Casanova succeeds. Partly this is due to the variety and individuality he is able to give, not only to every incident, but to every woman he meets; so that his book is a gallery of delightful women, drawn with an art that almost recalls his great contemporary, Goethe. Partly it seems he was aided by his vivid and sympathetic Venetian temperament; his swift, unliterary style finds time for no voluptuous languors. He was aided even by his immodesty, for in literature as in the plastic arts and in life itself, the nude is nearer to virtue than the décolleté. The firm and absolute precision of every episode in these Mémoires leaves no room for any undue dallying with the fringes of love's garments. Casanova tells his story swiftly and boldly, with no more delay than is needed to record every essential detail; he is the absolute anti-type to Sterne as a narrator; the most libertine of authors, he is yet free from prurience. Thus the man of action covers the romancer with confusion; this supreme book of adventures is a real man's record of his own real life.

But let us forget that it is an autobiography and take it merely as a story. Its immense range of human interest, its audacious realism, its freedom from perversity, entitle us to regard it as a typical story of adventure. And I ask myself: What is the relation of such a book to life? what is the moral worth of Casanova's Mémoires?

A foolish, superfluous question, I know, it seems to many. And I am willing to admit that there may possibly be things in life which it is desirable to do, and yet undesirable to moralise over; I would even assert that the moral worth of many of our actions lies precisely in their unconsciousness of any moral worth. Yet beneath the freest moral movements there must be a solid basis of social law, just as beneath the most gracious movements of the human body there lies the regulated play of mechanical law. When we find it assumed that there are things which are good to do and not good to justify we may strongly suspect that we have come across a mental muddle.

To see the matter rightly we must take it at the beginning. No one can rightly see the moral place of immoral literature—the literature of adventure—in the case of adults unless he sees it in the case of children. Of late years the people who write in newspapers and magazines have loudly abused all stories of the crudely heroic order, the stories of impossible virtue and unheard-of villainy in far-away lands, of marvellously brave bands under extravagantly reckless leaders, who march on through careless bloodshed to incredible victory or incalculable treasure. The hero of the average boy — magnificent sombrero on head, pistols in belt, galloping off on his mighty charger, a villain grasped by the scruff of the neck in each outstretched hand—has been severely mauled. The suggestions offered for the displacement of this literature furnish documents for the psychologist. Let us have cheap lives of Jesus and the Apostle Paul! let us flood the world with the sober romances licensed by religious societies!—say those good people in the newspapers and the magazines. If they have ever themselves been children, and if so, how they came into the world shrouded in an impenetrable caul which will for ever shut them out from insight into the hearts of the young, is not known, and perhaps is no matter. Putting aside these estimable persons, there is in every heart a chamber dedicated to the impossible, and the younger the heart the larger is this golden ventricle. For the child who can just read, Jack the Giant-killer, and the story of those human-souled swans which make the swan a mystic bird for all our lives, are better worth knowing than any fact of the visible world. Some day the Life of Jesus, and even perhaps the Life of Paul, will seem to be among the sweetest and strangest of the world's fairy-tales; but that day will hardly come until every church and chapel has been spiritually razed to the ground. It cannot come to the generation which has had the name of Jesus thrust down its throat in Sunday-schools and board-schools. We English are a practical, common-sense people, and we cure our children of any hearty taste for religion as confectioners are said to cure their assistants of any excessive taste for sweets, by a preliminary surfeit. No doubt we are very wise, but we postpone indefinitely the day when children will come to our religious tales in the pure gladness of their joy in the marvellous.

In the meantime there ought not to be any doubt that children should be fed on fairy-tales as their souls' most natural food. Nothing can make up for the lack of them at the outset, just as no later supply of milk can compensate for the starvation involved in feeding infants on starch. The power of assimilating fairy-tales is soon lost, and unless the child has a rarely powerful creative imagination its spiritual growth on this side at least remains for ever stunted.

If then childhood needs its pure fairy-land, and youth its fairy-land of impossible adventure, what fairy-land is left for adult age? Scarcely the novel. The modern novel in its finest manifestations, however engrossingly interesting, takes us but a little step from the passionate interests of our own lives. If I turn to the two recent novels which have most powerfully interested me—Huysmans' En Route and Hardy's Jude the Obscure—I find that their interest lies largely in the skill with which they present and concentrate two mighty problems of actual life, the greatest of all problems, religion and sex. In adult life we seek a fairy-land occupied by beings at once as real as ourselves, and yet far removed from the sphere of our own actual interests and the heavy burden of the atmosphere under which we live; only so can it fascinate the imaginations of those who have outgrown the simple imaginative joys of early life. Casanova's Mémoires is the perfected type of the books which answer these requirements. It is unflinchingly real, immensely varied, the audaciously truthful narrative of undeniably human impulses. And yet it carries us out of relation with the problems of our actual life; it leads us into the realm of fairy-land.

But—analysing the matter a little more closely—it may still fairly be asked whether a book which, in spite of its remoteness, represents a form of human life, must not have a certain bearing on morals. Is not a part of its attraction, and indeed that of all fairy-lands, the existence of a different code of morals? It seems to me that this is so. But precisely in that lies the moral value of such literature. Indeed the whole question of the moral value of art—that is to say, of æsthetic enjoyment—is really involved here. The matter is worth looking into.

It is one of Schopenhauer's unforgettable sayings, that whatever course of action we take in life there is always some element in our nature which could only find satisfaction in an exactly contrary course; so that, take what road we will, we yet always remain restless and unsatisfied in part. To Schopenhauer that reflection made for pessimism; it need not. The more finely and adequately we adjust ourselves to the actual conditions of our life the larger, no doubt, the unused and unsatisfied region within us. But it is just here that art comes in. Art largely counts for its effects on playing on these unused fibres of our organism, and by so doing it serves to bring them into a state of harmonious satisfaction—moralises them, if you will. Alienists have described a distressing form of insanity peculiar to old maids who have led honourable lives of abstinence and abnegation. After years of seeming content with the conditions of their lot they begin to manifest uncontrollable obsessions and erotic impulses; the unused elements of life, which they had shut down in the cellars of their souls and almost forgotten, have at last arisen in rebellion, clamouring tumultuously for satisfaction. The old orgies—the Saturnalian festival at Christmas and the Midsummer Festival on St. John's Day—bear witness that the ancients in their wisdom recognised that the bonds of the actual daily moral life must sometimes be relaxed lest they break from over-tension. We have lost the orgy, but in its place we have art. Our respectable matrons no longer send out their daughters with torches at midnight into the woods and among the hills, where dancing and wine and blood may lash into their flesh the knowledge of the mysteries of life, but they take them to Tristan, and are fortunately unable to see into those carefully brought-up young souls on such occasions. The moralising force of art lies, not in its capacity to present a timid imitation of our experiences, but in its power to go beyond our experience, satisfying and harmonising the unfulfilled activities of our nature. That art should have such an effect on those who contemplate it is not surprising when we remember that, to some extent, art has a similar influence on its creators. "Libertin d'esprit mais sage de mœurs," it was said of Watteau. Mohammed when he wrote so voluptuously of the black-eyed houris of Paradise was still young and the blameless husband of an aged woman.

"Singing is sweet; but be sure of this,

It has been said of Wagner that he had in him the instincts of an ascetic and of a satyr, and the first is just as necessary as the second to the making of a great artist. It is a very ancient observation that the most unchaste verse has often been written by the chastest poets, and that the writers who have written most purely have found their compensation in living impurely.[1] In the same manner it has always been found in Christendom, both among Catholics and Protestants, that much of the most licentious literature has been written by the clergy, by no means because the clergy are a depraved class, but precisely because the austerity of their lives renders necessary for them these emotional athletics. Of course, from the standpoint of simple nature, such literature is bad, it is merely a form of that obscenity which, as Huysmans has acutely remarked, can only be produced by those who are chaste; in Nature desire passes swiftly into action, leaving little or no trace on the mind. A certain degree of continence—I do not mean merely in the region of sex but in the other fields of human action also—is needed as a breeding-ground for the dreams and images of desire to develop into the perfected visions of art. But the point of view of society is scarcely that of unadulterated nature. In society we have not always room for the swift and free passage of impulse into action; to avoid the evils of repressed impulse this play of the emotions on a higher and serener plane becomes essential. Just as we need athletics to expand and harmonise the coarser unused energies of the organism, so we need art and literature to expand and harmonise its finer energies, emotion being, as it may not be superfluous to point out, itself largely a muscular process, motion in a more or less arrested form, so that there is here more than a mere analogy. Art from this point of view is the athletics of the emotions.

[1] I take the first example which comes to hand, for whatever it may be worth:—"Luttrell was talking of Moore and Rogers—the poetry of the former so licentious, that of the latter so pure; much of its popularity owing to its being so carefully weeded of everything approaching to indelicacy; and the contrast between the lives and the works of the two men—the former a pattern of conjugal and domestic regularity, the latter of all the men he had ever known the greatest sensualist" (Greville's Memoirs, vol. iii. p. 324).

The adventures of fairy-land—of which for our age I take Casanova's Mémoires as the type—constitute an important part of this athletics. It may be abused, just as we have the grosser excesses of the runner and the cyclist; but it is the abuse and not the use which is pernicious, and under the artificial conditions of civilisation the contemplation of the life and adventures of the heroically natural man is an exercise with fine spiritual uses. Such literature thus has a moral value: it helps us to live peacefully within the highly specialised routine of civilisation.

That is the underlying justification for Casanova's Mémoires as moral literature. But there is no reason why it should emerge into consciousness when we take up these Mémoires, any more than a man need take up a branch of physical athletics with any definite hygienic aim. It is sufficient to be moved by the pure enjoyment of it. And there must be something unwholesome and abnormal—something corrupt at the core—in any civilised man or woman who cannot win some enjoyment from this book.

III.

The more I contemplate the eighteenth century the more interesting I find it. In my youth it seemed to me unworthy of a glance. The books and the men, Shelley above all, who stirred my young blood belonged to the early nineteenth century. I was led to regard the last century as a dull period of stagnation and decay, a tomb into which the spirit of man sank after the slow death which followed the Renaissance. The dawn of the nineteenth century was an Easter Day of the human soul, rising from the sepulchre and flinging aside the old eighteenth century winding-sheet.

I have nothing yet to say against the early nineteenth century, which was indeed only the outcome of the years that went before, but I have gained a new delight in the men of the eighteenth century. It was in that age that the English spirit found its most complete intellectual expression, unaffected by foreign influence. When that spirit, reviving after the wars that lamentably cut short the development of Chaucer's magnificent song, again began its free literary development—no doubt with some stimulus from Humanism—it was suddenly smothered at birth by the Renaissance wave from Italy and France. We may divine how it would have developed independently if we think of John Heywood's dramatic sketches—pale as those are after the Miller's tale in which for the first and last time Chaucer perfectly mated English realism to the lyric grace of English idealism—and to some extent, also, when we turn to the later Heywood's plays, or Dekker's, and especially to the robust and tolerant humanity, the sober artistic breadth of the one play of Porter's which has come down to us. But the intoxicating melodies of Ronsard and his fellows were heard from over sea, and the men of the English Renaissance arose — Lyly and Lodge and Campion with their refinements, Greene and Nash with their gay and brilliant music, Marlowe with his arrogant, irresistible energy—and brought to birth an absolutely new spirit, which may have been English enough in its rich and virginal elements, but received the seminal principle from abroad. It needed a century and more for that magnificent tumult to subside, and for the old English spirit to reappear and reach at last full maturity, by happy chance again in association with France, though this time it is England that chiefly plays the masculine part and impregnates France. Thus the eighteenth century was an age in which the English spirit found complete self-expression, and also an age in which England and France joined hands intellectually, and stood together at the summit of civilisation, with no rivals, unless Goethe and Kant may suffice to stand for a whole people. In the great Englishmen of these days we find the qualities which are truly native to Britain, and which have too often been torn and distracted by insane aberrations. There is a fine sobriety and sagacity in the English spirit, a mellow human solidity, such as the Romans possessed always, but which we in our misty and storm-swept island have often exchanged, perhaps for better, but certainly for other qualities. It was not so in the eighteenth century, and by no accident the historian who has most finely expressed the genius of Rome was an eighteenth century Englishman. All the most typical men of that age possessed in varying degree the same qualities: Locke, Swift, Fielding, Hume, Richardson, Goldsmith, Hogarth, Johnson, God-win. Thus the eighteenth century should undoubtedly be a source of pride to the British heart. England's reputation in the world rests largely on our poetic aptitudes and our political capacity. Eighteenth century England is not obviously pre-eminent in either respect, although it was the great age of our political development and the seed-time of our second great poetic age; it produced scarcely more than a single first-class poet exclusively within its limits, and it lost America. Yet our greatest philosopher, our greatest historian, our greatest biographer, nearly all our greatest novelists, our great initiators in painting, who were indirectly the initiators of the greater art of France, belong wholly to this century, and an unequalled cluster of our greatest poets belongs to its close. And these men were marked by sanity and catholicity, a superb solidity of spirit; they became genuinely cosmopolitan without losing any of their indigenous virtues. Without the eighteenth century we should never have known many of the greatest qualities which are latent, and too often only latent, in our race. Landor and Wordsworth alone were left to carry something of the spirit of the English eighteenth century far on into the literature of our own wholly alien century.

And their brothers of France were their most worthy peers. This spirit, indeed, which we see so conspicuously in the finest men of their age in England and France, was singularly widespread throughout Europe, a cheerful sobriety, a solid humanity, little troubled by any of those "movements" which were to become so prolific and so noisy in the next century. Christianity, it seemed, was decaying. Diderot, well informed on English affairs, wrote to a friend that in a few years it would be extinct, and looking at the state of the English Church at that time, no one could reasonably have surmised that Zinzendorf in Germany, and after him Wesley in England on a lower plane and Law on a higher plane, had already initiated that revival of Christianity which in our own century was destined to work itself out so obstreperously. But the world seemed none the worse for the apparent subsidence of Christianity; in the opinion of many it seemed to be very much the better. The tolerant paganism of classic days appeared to be reasserting itself, robustly in England, with a delicate refinement in France,—setting the paganism of Watteau against the paganism of Fielding—while Goethe and the Germans generally were striving to rescue and harmonise the best of Christianity with the best of antiquity. European civilisation was fully expanded; for a long time no great disturbing force had arisen, and though on every side the tender buds of coming growths might have been detected, they could not yet reveal their strength. Such a period certainly has its terrible defects; mellowness is not far from rottenness. But then youth also has its defects, and its crude acidity is still further from perfection. The nineteenth century has a higher moral standard than the eighteenth, so at least we in our self-righteousness have been accustomed to think. But even if so, the abstract existence of a high moral standard is another thing from the prevalence of high moral living. Whatever the standard may be, it is a question whether the lives are much different. In the one case the standard is much above the practice, in the other only a little above it—that is the chief difference. And the advantages of winding the standard up to the higher pitch are not so unmixed as is sometimes assumed. One need not question these advantages, well recognised in the present century. But the advantages of a lower standard are less often recognised. There is especially the great advantage that we attain a higher degree of sincerity, and sincerity, if not itself the prime virtue, is surely, whatever the virtue may be, its chief accompaniment. A life that is swathed and deformed in much drapery is not so wholesome or so effective as one that can live nearer to the sun. And the unrecognisable villain is most pernicious; the brigand who holds a revolver at your head is better than the sleek and well-dressed thief who opens the proceedings with prayer. The eighteenth has been called a gross and unintelligent century. In the department of criticism, indeed, this century in England (for it was far otherwise in Germany) comes very short of our own century, and it is largely this failure to measure the precise value of things in æsthetic perception which now makes that age seem so shocking. From this point of view every great age—and not least our own greatest Elizabethan age—is equally defective. A period of energetic life cannot afford to spend much time on the solitary contemplation of its own bowels of æsthetic emotion. To produce a Pater is the one exquisite function of a spiritually barren and exhausted age. And still the eighteenth century redeems its critical grossness by making even this later development possible; it lifted the man of letters from the place of a dependent to the place of a free man boldly prophesying in his own right; and, moreover, it was the first century which dared to claim the complete equality of men and women with all which that involves.

If it has required a certain insight for the child of our own century to discover the great qualities of the last century, there cannot be much doubt about the final judgment of the most competent judges. The eighteenth was, as Renouvier has called it, the first century of humanity since Christ, while at the same time, as Lange has said, it was penetrated through by the search for the ideal, or, as a more recent thinker concludes, it was a century dominated by the maxim Salus populi suprema est lex, holding in its noble aspirations after general happiness the germs of all modern socialism. In art and literature it saw the fresh spring of those blossoms which opened so splendidly and faded so swiftly in our century; it was the century not only of Hogarth and Fielding and Voltaire, but of Blake and Rousseau, of Diderot, of Swedenborg and Mesmer, of the development of modern music with Mozart and Beethoven, of the unparalleled enthusiasm awakened by the discovery of the Keltic world. And as its crowning glory the eighteenth century claims Goethe. Men will scarcely look back to our own century as so good to live in. One may well say that he would have gladly lived in the thirteenth century, perhaps the most interesting of all since Christ, or in the sixteenth, probably the most alive of all, or the eighteenth, surely the most human. But why have lived in the nineteenth, the golden age of machinery, and of men used as machines?

Eighteenth century Europe, being what it was, formed a perfect stage for Casanova to play his part on. With his Spanish and Italian blood, he was of the race of those who had come so actively to the front in the last days of old classic Rome, and his immediate ancestors had lived in the centre of the pagan Rome of the Renaissance. Thus he carried with him traditions which consorted well with much in the eighteenth century. And he had that in him, moreover, which no tradition can give, the incommunicable vitality in the presence of which all tradition shrivels into nothingness.

Casanova knew not only Italy, France, England, Germany, and Holland; he had visited Spain, Russia, Poland, Greece, Turkey, and Asia Minor. He was received by Benedict XII., by Frederick II. of Prussia, by the Empress Catherine, by Joseph II. He was at home in Paris, in London, in Berlin, in Vienna; he knew Munich, Dresden, Moscow, St. Petersburg, Warsaw, Barcelona. His picture of London is of great interest. He spent much of the year 1763 there, and some of his most interesting experiences, romantic and psychological, occurred during that period. He even dated the close of what he calls the second act in the comedy of his life from that visit to London, the next and concluding act being one of slow declination. So profound was his depression at this time that one day he went towards the Thames at the Tower with the deliberate intention of drowning himself, having first filled his pockets with bullets to ensure sinking. Fortunately an English friend (to whom the world owes thanks) met him on the way, read his resolve in his face, and insisted on carrying him off to a very convivial party, whose indecorous proceedings, although Casanova only remained a passive witness, served to dissipate all thoughts of suicide. He is not, however, prejudiced against England; on the contrary, he finds that no nation offers so many interesting peculiarities to the attentive observer. As usual, in London Casanova mixed indiscriminately with the best and the worst society; his wit, his knowledge, his imperturbable effrontery, his charming conversation, served to open any door that he desired to open. He gives us curious glimpses into the lives of English noblemen of the day, and not less intimate pictures of the chevaliers d'industrie who preyed upon them. In the course of one adventure with people of the latter sort he was haled before the eminent blind magistrate Sir John Fielding, whom he seems to have mistaken, though this is not quite clear, for his yet more eminent brother Henry. He also met Kitty Fischer, the most fashionable cocotte of her day, whom we may yet see as Reynolds caught her in a well-inspired moment, dilating her sensitive nostrils, radiantly inhaling the joy of life, and he tells us anecdotes of her extravagance, of the jewels she wore, of the thousand guinea bank-note which she ate in a sandwich.[1]

Throughout Europe Casanova knew many of the most celebrated people of his time, though it is clear—as one would expect from a man of his impartial humanity—he seldom went out of his way to meet them. His visit to Voltaire is a distinct contribution to our knowledge of that sage; he admired Helvetius, and wondered how a man of so many virtues could have denied virtue; D'Alembert he thought the most truly modest man he had ever met, an interesting tribute from the most truly immodest man of that period. The value of Casanova's record of the eighteenth century lies, however, by no means in the glimpses he has given us of great personalities: that has been much better done by much more insignificant writers. It is as a picture of the manners and customs of the eighteenth century throughout Europe that the Mémoires are invaluable. Casanova saw Europe from the courts of kings to the lowest bas fonds. He lived in the castles of French and Italian nobles, in the comfortable homes of Dutch merchants, in his own house in Pall Mall, in taverns and inns and peasants' cottages anywhere. He had no intellectual prejudices, he had an immense versatility in tastes and practical aptitudes, he was genuinely interested in all human things. Thus he approached life with no stereotyped set of opinions, but with all the aloofness of an unclassed adventurer, who was at the same time a scholar and a man of letters. It can scarcely be that there is any record to compare with this as a vivid and impartial picture of the eighteenth century, in its robust solidity, its cheerful and tolerant scepticism, its serene and easy gaiety, its mellow decay. That is our final debt to this unique and immortal book.

[1] For another side of life we may read his description of the English Sunday:—"On Sunday one dares neither to play at cards nor to perform music. The numerous spies who infest the streets of this capital listen to the sounds which come from the parlours of the houses, and if they suspect any gaming or singing they conceal themselves and slip in at the first opportunity to seize those bad Christians who dare to profane the Lord's Day by amusements which everywhere else are counted innocent. In revenge the English may go with impunity to sanctify the holy day in the taverns and brothels which are so plentiful in this city." One may compare with this Mme. de Staël's almost Dantesque description—so at least it remains in the memory—of the gloom of the Scotch Sabbath in the days of Burns. This statement of the matter remained substantially accurate until almost yesterday. So long it remained for the English spirit to re-conquer Sunday! It must be remembered that Puritanism, while always a part of the English spirit, was not originally its predominant note; it only became so as an inevitable reaction against the exotic Renaissance movement. Mary Stuart made Knox, Charles I. made Cromwell, and both monarchs were intimately associated with the last wave of the Renaissance.

What should be our last word about Casanova? It is true that although—if indeed one should not say because—he was so heroically natural Casanova was not an average normal man. It is scarcely given to the average man to expend such versatile and reckless skill in the field of the world, or to find so large a part wherein to play off that skill. But neither are the saints and philosophers normal; St. Bernard was not normal, nor yet Spinoza. And surely it is a poor picture of the world which would show us St. Bernard and Spinoza and shut out Casanova. "Vous avez l'outil universel," Fabrice said to Gil Blas. Casanova's brain was just such a tool of universal use, and he never failed to use it. For if you would find the supreme type of the human animal in the completest development of his rankness and cunning, in the very plenitude of his most excellent wits, I know not where you may more safely go than to the Mémoires of the self-ennobled Jacques Casanova Chevalier de Seingalt.

POSTSCRIPTUM

Until a recent date, Casanova's letters and papers were preserved as he had left them, in the library of the castle at Dux. Referring to this, Mr. Horace Bleackley, the compiler of a work entitled, "Casanova in England" (London. 1923), remarks (page 217, note): "Until the Peace of Versailles, the Casanova MSS were preserved in the castle of Dux, near Teplitz in Bohemia, and, through the generosity of its owner, the Count Waldstein, the valuable library and collection of autograph letters were always accessible to the scholar. After the creation of that pinchbeck republic, Czecho-Slovakia, the castle was confiscated by the State, and its contents have disappeared."

It is unfortunate that Mr. Bleackley was unable to obtain more satisfactory information on this important matter. Official inquiry, instituted through the kindness of the Czechoslovak Legation at Washington, reports the facts as follows: "In the course of the Land Reform which is now being carried on in Czechoslovakia, the Castle of Count Waldstein at Duchcov (known as Dux, in German) was sold to the city of Duchcov. The collection of the Museum of the city was transferred to this castle. Many objects of art were donated to the Museum by (the present) Count Waldstein. The immense hall of the castle, together with its old portraits of the ancestors of Count Waldstein, has remained intact. The Castle is now being used for museum and educational purposes. As to the library of Count Waldstein, this library was transferred by the owner, Count Waldstein, in its original book-cases of the 18th Century, to his castle in Dosky (known as Hirschberg, in German), where it has been deposited by the owner and where scientific investigators and interresants have free access to the material contained therein, after receiving permission from Count Waldstein. The collection of Casanova autographs is also deposited in this library. It was very shortly after the establishment of the Czechoslovak Republic that the Czechoslovak Government gave Count Waldstein permission to transfer the Casanova autographs to his castle in Dosky."

CASANOVA AT DUX

An Unpublished Chapter of History, By Arthur Symons

I

THE Memoirs of Casanova, though they have enjoyed the popularity of a bad reputation, have never had justice done to them by serious students of literature, of life, and of history. One English writer, indeed, Mr. Havelock Ellis, has realised that 'there are few more delightful books in the world,' and he has analysed them in an essay on Casanova, published in Affirmations, with extreme care and remarkable subtlety. But this essay stands alone, at all events in English, as an attempt to take Casanova seriously, to show him in his relation to his time, and in his relation to human problems. And yet these Memoirs are perhaps the most valuable document which we possess on the society of the eighteenth century; they are the history of a unique life, a unique personality, one of the greatest of autobiographies; as a record of adventures, they are more entertaining than Gil Blas, or Monte Cristo, or any of the imaginary travels, and escapes, and masquerades in life, which have been written in imitation of them. They tell the story of a man who loved life passionately for its own sake: one to whom woman was, indeed, the most important thing in the world, but to whom nothing in the world was indifferent. The bust which gives us the most lively notion of him shows us a great, vivid, intellectual face, full of fiery energy and calm resource, the face of a thinker and a fighter in one. A scholar, an adventurer, perhaps a Cabalist, a busy stirrer in politics, a gamester, one 'born for the fairer sex,' as he tells us, and born also to be a vagabond; this man, who is remembered now for his written account of his own life, was that rarest kind of autobiographer, one who did not live to write, but wrote because he had lived, and when he could live no longer.

And his Memoirs take one all over Europe, giving sidelights, all the more valuable in being almost accidental, upon many of the affairs and people most interesting to us during two-thirds of the eighteenth century. Giacomo Casanova was born in Venice, of Spanish and Italian parentage, on April 2, 1725; he died at the Château of Dux, in Bohemia, on June 4, 1798. In that lifetime of seventy-three years he travelled, as his Memoirs show us, in Italy, France, Germany, Austria, England, Switzerland, Belgium, Russia, Poland, Spain, Holland, Turkey; he met Voltaire at Ferney, Rousseau at Montmorency, Fontenelle, d'Alembert and Crébillon at Paris, George III. in London, Louis XV. at Fontainebleau, Catherine the Great at St. Petersburg, Benedict XII. at Rome, Joseph II. at Vienna, Frederick the Great at Sans-Souci. Imprisoned by the Inquisitors of State in the Piombi at Venice, he made, in 1755, the most famous escape in history. His Memoirs, as we have them, break off abruptly at the moment when he is expecting a safe conduct, and the permission to return to Venice after twenty years' wanderings. He did return, as we know from documents in the Venetian archives; he returned as secret agent of the Inquisitors, and remained in their service from 1774 until 1782. At the end of 1782 he left Venice; and next year we find him in Paris, where, in 1784, he met Count Waldstein at the Venetian Ambassador's, and was invited by him to become his librarian at Dux. He accepted, and for the fourteen remaining years of his life lived at Dux, where he wrote his Memoirs.

Casanova died in 1798, but nothing was heard of the Memoirs (which the Prince de Ligne, in his own Memoirs, tells us that Casanova had read to him, and in which he found du dramatique, de la rapidité, du comique, de la philosophie, des choses neuves, sublimes, inimitables même) until the year 1820, when a certain Carlo Angiolini brought to the publishing house of Brockhaus, in Leipzig, a manuscript entitled Histoire de ma vie jusqu'à l'an 1797, in the handwriting of Casanova. This manuscript, which I have examined at Leipzig, is written on foolscap paper, rather rough and yellow; it is written on both sides of the page, and in sheets or quires; here and there the paging shows that some pages have been omitted, and in their place are smaller sheets of thinner and whiter paper, all in Casanova's handsome, unmistakable handwriting. The manuscript is done up in twelve bundles, corresponding with the twelve volumes of the original edition; and only in one place is there a gap. The fourth and fifth chapters of the twelfth volume are missing, as the editor of the original edition points out, adding: 'It is not probable that these two chapters have been withdrawn from the manuscript of Casanova by a strange hand; everything leads us to believe that the author himself suppressed them, in the intention, no doubt, of re-writing them, but without having found time to do so.' The manuscript ends abruptly with the year 1774, and not with the year 1797, as the title would lead us to suppose.

This manuscript, in its original state, has never been printed. Herr Brockhaus, on obtaining possession of the manuscript, had it translated into German by Wilhelm Schütz, but with many omissions and alterations, and published this translation, volume by volume, from 1822 to 1828, under the title, Aus den Memoiren des Venetianers Jacob Casanova de Seingalt. While the German edition was in course of publication, Herr Brockhaus employed a certain Jean Laforgue, a professor of the French language at Dresden, to revise the original manuscript, correcting Casanova's vigorous, but at times incorrect, and often somewhat Italian, French according to his own notions of elegant writing, suppressing passages which seemed too free-spoken from the point of view of morals and of politics, and altering the names of some of the persons referred to, or replacing those names by initials. This revised text was published in twelve volumes, the first two in 1826, the third and fourth in 1828, the fifth to the eighth in 1832, and the ninth to the twelfth in 1837; the first four bearing the imprint of Brockhaus at Leipzig and Ponthieu et Cie at Paris; the next four the imprint of Heideloff et Campé at Paris; and the last four nothing but A Bruxelles. The volumes are all uniform, and were all really printed for the firm of Brockhaus. This, however far from representing the real text, is the only authoritative edition, and my references throughout this article will always be to this edition.

In turning over the manuscript at Leipzig, I read some of the suppressed passages, and regretted their suppression; but Herr Brockhaus, the present head of the firm, assured me that they are not really very considerable in number. The damage, however, to the vivacity of the whole narrative, by the persistent alterations of M. Laforgue, is incalculable. I compared many passages, and found scarcely three consecutive sentences untouched. Herr Brockhaus (whose courtesy I cannot sufficiently acknowledge) was kind enough to have a passage copied out for me, which I afterwards read over, and checked word by word. In this passage Casanova says, for instance: Elle venoit presque tous les jours lui faire une belle visite. This is altered into: Cependant chaque jour Thérèse venait lui faire une visite. Casanova says that some one avoit, comme de raison, formé le projet d'allier Dieu avec le diable. This is made to read: Qui, comme de raison, avait saintement formé le projet d'allier les intérêts du ciel aux œuvres de ce monde. Casanova tells us that Thérèse would not commit a mortal sin pour devenir reine du monde; pour une couronne, corrects the indefatigable Laforgue. Il ne savoit que lui dire becomes Dans cet état de perplexité; and so forth. It must, therefore, be realized that the Memoirs, as we have them, are only a kind of pale tracing of the vivid colours of the original.

When Casanova's Memoirs were first published, doubts were expressed as to their authenticity, first by Ugo Foscolo (in the Westminster Review, 1827), then by Quérard, supposed to be an authority in regard to anonymous and pseudonymous writings, finally by Paul Lacroix, le bibliophile Jacob, who suggested, or rather expressed his 'certainty,' that the real author of the Memoirs was Stendhal, whose 'mind, character, ideas and style' he seemed to recognise on every page. This theory, as foolish and as unsupported as the Baconian theory of Shakespeare, has been carelessly accepted, or at all events accepted as possible, by many good scholars who have never taken the trouble to look into the matter for themselves. It was finally disproved by a series of articles of Armand Baschet, entitled Preuves curieuses de l'authenticité des Mémoires de Jacques Casanova de Seingalt, in Le Livre, January, February, April and May, 1881; and these proofs were further corroborated by two articles of Alessandro d'Ancona, entitled Un Avventuriere del Secolo XVIII., in the Nuova Antologia, February 1 and August 1, 1882. Baschet had never himself seen the manuscript of the Memoirs, but he had learnt all the facts about it from Messrs. Brockhaus, and he had himself examined the numerous papers relating to Casanova in the Venetian archives. A similar examination was made at the Frari at about the same time by the Abbé Fulin; and I myself, in 1894, not knowing at the time that the discovery had been already made, made it over again for myself. There the arrest of Casanova, his imprisonment in the Piombi, the exact date of his escape, the name of the monk who accompanied him, are all authenticated by documents contained in the riferte of the Inquisition of State; there are the bills for the repairs of the roof and walls of the cell from which he escaped; there are the reports of the spies on whose information he was arrested, for his too dangerous free-spokenness in matters of religion and morality. The same archives contain forty-eight letters of Casanova to the Inquisitors of State, dating from 1763 to 1782, among the Riferte dei Confidenti, or reports of secret agents; the earliest asking permission to return to Venice, the rest giving information in regard to the immoralities of the city, after his return there; all in the same handwriting as the Memoirs. Further proof could scarcely be needed, but Baschet has done more than prove the authenticity, he has proved the extraordinary veracity, of the Memoirs. F. W. Barthold, in Die Geschichtlichen Persönlichkeiten in J. Casanova's Memoiren, 2 vols., 1846, had already examined about a hundred of Casanova's allusions to well-known people, showing the perfect exactitude of all but six or seven, and out of these six or seven inexactitudes ascribing only a single one to the author's intention. Baschet and d'Ancona both carry on what Barthold had begun; other investigators, in France, Italy and Germany, have followed them; and two things are now certain, first, that Casanova himself wrote the Memoirs published under his name, though not textually in the precise form in which we have them; and, second, that as their veracity becomes more and more evident as they are confronted with more and more independent witnesses, it is only fair to suppose that they are equally truthful where the facts are such as could only have been known to Casanova himself.

II

For more than two-thirds of a century it has been known that Casanova spent the last fourteen years of his life at Dux, that he wrote his Memoirs there, and that he died there. During all this time people have been discussing the authenticity and the truthfulness of the Memoirs, they have been searching for information about Casanova in various directions, and yet hardly any one has ever taken the trouble, or obtained the permission, to make a careful examination in precisely the one place where information was most likely to be found. The very existence of the manuscripts at Dux was known only to a few, and to most of these only on hearsay; and thus the singular good fortune was reserved for me, on my visit to Count Waldstein in September 1899, to be the first to discover the most interesting things contained in these manuscripts. M. Octave Uzanne, though he had not himself visited Dux, had indeed procured copies of some of the manuscripts, a few of which were published by him in Le Livre, in 1887 and 1889. But with the death of Le Livre in 1889 the Casanova inédit came to an end, and has never, so far as I know, been continued elsewhere. Beyond the publication of these fragments, nothing has been done with the manuscripts at Dux, nor has an account of them ever been given by any one who has been allowed to examine them.

For five years, ever since I had discovered the documents in the Venetian archives, I had wanted to go to Dux; and in 1899, when I was staying with Count Lützow at Zampach, in Bohemia, I found the way kindly opened for me. Count Waldstein, the present head of the family, with extreme courtesy, put all his manuscripts at my disposal, and invited me to stay with him. Unluckily, he was called away on the morning of the day that I reached Dux. He had left everything ready for me, and I was shown over the castle by a friend of his, Dr. Kittel, whose courtesy I should like also to acknowledge. After a hurried visit to the castle we started on the long drive to Oberleutensdorf, a smaller Schloss near Komotau, where the Waldstein family was then staying. The air was sharp and bracing; the two Russian horses flew like the wind; I was whirled along in an unfamiliar darkness, through a strange country, black with coal mines, through dark pine woods, where a wild peasantry dwelt in little mining towns. Here and there, a few men and women passed us on the road, in their Sunday finery; then a long space of silence, and we were in the open country, galloping between broad fields; and always in a haze of lovely hills, which I saw more distinctly as we drove back next morning.

The return to Dux was like a triumphal entry, as we dashed through the market-place filled with people come for the Monday market, pots and pans and vegetables strewn in heaps all over the ground, on the rough paving stones, up to the great gateway of the castle, leaving but just room for us to drive through their midst. I had the sensation of an enormous building: all Bohemian castles are big, but this one was like a royal palace. Set there in the midst of the town, after the Bohemian fashion, it opens at the back upon great gardens, as if it were in the midst of the country. I walked through room after room, along corridor after corridor; everywhere there were pictures, everywhere portraits of Wallenstein, and battle-scenes in which he led on his troops. The library, which was formed, or at least arranged, by Casanova, and which remains as he left it, contains some 25,000 volumes, some of them of considerable value; one of the most famous books in Bohemian literature, Skála's History of the Church, exists in manuscript at Dux, and it is from this manuscript that the two published volumes of it were printed. The library forms part of the Museum, which occupies a ground-floor wing of the castle. The first room is an armoury, in which all kinds of arms are arranged, in a decorative way, covering the ceiling and the walls with strange patterns. The second room contains pottery, collected by Casanova's Waldstein on his Eastern travels. The third room is full of curious mechanical toys, and cabinets, and carvings in ivory. Finally, we come to the library, contained in the two innermost rooms. The book-shelves are painted white, and reach to the low-vaulted ceilings, which are whitewashed. At the end of a bookcase, in the corner of one of the windows, hangs a fine engraved portrait of Casanova.

After I had been all over the castle, so long Casanova's home, I was taken to Count Waldstein's study, and left there with the manuscripts. I found six huge cardboard cases, large enough to contain foolscap paper, lettered on the back: Gräfl.. Waldstein-Wartenberg'sches Real Fideicommiss. Dux-Oberleutensdorf: Handschriftlicher Nachlass Casanova. The cases were arranged so as to stand like books; they opened at the side; and on opening them, one after another, I found series after series of manuscripts roughly thrown together, after some pretence at arrangement, and lettered with a very generalised description of contents. The greater part of the manuscripts were in Casanova's handwriting, which I could see gradually beginning to get shaky with years. Most were written in French, a certain number in Italian. The beginning of a catalogue in the library, though said to be by him, was not in his handwriting. Perhaps it was taken down at his dictation. There were also some copies of Italian and Latin poems not written by him. Then there were many big bundles of letters addressed to him, dating over more than thirty years. Almost all the rest was in his own handwriting.

I came first upon the smaller manuscripts, among which I found, jumbled together on the same and on separate scraps of paper, washing-bills, accounts, hotel bills, lists of letters written, first drafts of letters with many erasures, notes on books, theological and mathematical notes, sums, Latin quotations, French and Italian verses, with variants, a long list of classical names which have and have not been francisés, with reasons for and against; 'what I must wear at Dresden'; headings without anything to follow, such as: 'Reflexions on respiration, on the true cause of youth—the crows'; a new method of winning the lottery at Rome; recipes, among which is a long printed list of perfumes sold at Spa; a newspaper cutting, dated Prague, 25th October 1790, on the thirty-seventh balloon ascent of Blanchard; thanks to some 'noble donor' for the gift of a dog called

'Finette'; a passport for Monsieur de Casanova, Vénitien, allant d'ici en Hollande, October 13, 1758 (Ce Passeport bon pour quinze jours), together with an order for post-horses, gratis, from Paris to Bordeaux and Bayonne.[1]

Occasionally, one gets a glimpse into his daily life at Dux, as in this note, scribbled on a fragment of paper (here and always I translate the French literally): 'I beg you to tell my servant what the biscuits are that I like to eat, dipped in wine, to fortify my stomach. I believe that they can all be found at Roman's.' Usually, however, these notes, though often suggested by something closely personal, branch off into more general considerations; or else begin with general considerations, and end with a case in point. Thus, for instance, a fragment of three pages begins: 'A compliment which is only made to gild the pill is a positive impertinence, and Monsieur Bailli is nothing but a charlatan; the monarch ought to have spit in his face, but the monarch trembled with fear.' A manuscript entitled Essai d'Égoïsme, dated, 'Dux, this 27th June, 1769,' contains, in the midst of various reflections, an offer to let his appartement in return for enough money to 'tranquillise for six months two Jew creditors at Prague.' Another manuscript is headed 'Pride and Folly,' and begins with a long series of antitheses, such as: 'All fools are not proud, and all proud men are fools. Many fools are happy, all proud men are unhappy.' On the same sheet follows this instance or application:

> Whether it is possible to compose a Latin distich of the greatest beauty without knowing either the Latin language or prosody. We must examine the possibility and the impossibility, and afterwards see who is the man who says he is the author of the dis-> tich, for there are extraordinary people in the world. My brother, in short, ought to have composed the distich, because he says so, and because he confided it to me tête-à-tête. I had, it is true, difficulty in believing him; but what is one to do? Either one must believe, or suppose him capable of telling a lie which could only be told by a fool; and that is impossible, for all Europe knows that my brother is not a fool.

Here, as so often in these manuscripts, we seem to see Casanova thinking on paper. He uses scraps of paper (sometimes the blank page of a letter, on the other side of which we see the address) as a kind of informal diary; and it is characteristic of him, of the man of infinitely curious mind, which this adventurer really was, that there are so few merely personal notes among these casual jottings. Often, they are purely abstract; at times, metaphysical jeux d'esprit, like the sheet of fourteen 'Different Wagers,' which begins:

> I wager that it is not true that a man who weighs a hundred pounds will weigh more if you kill him. I wager that if there is any difference, he will weigh less. I wager that diamond powder has not sufficient force to kill a man.

Side by side with these fanciful excursions into science, come more serious ones, as in the note on Algebra, which traces its progress since the year 1494, before which 'it had only arrived at the solution of problems of the second degree, inclusive.' A scrap of paper tells us that Casanova 'did not like regular towns.' 'I like,' he says, 'Venice, Rome, Florence, Milan, Constantinople, Genoa.' Then he becomes abstract and inquisitive again, and writes two pages, full of curious, out-of-the-way learning, on the name of Paradise:

> The name of Paradise is a name in Genesis which indicates a place of pleasure (lieu voluptueux): this term is Persian. This place of pleasure was made by God before he had created man.

It may be remembered that Casanova quarrelled with Voltaire, because Voltaire had told him frankly that his translation of L'Écossaise was a bad translation. It is piquant to read another note written in this style of righteous indignation:

> Voltaire, the hardy Voltaire, whose pen is without bit or bridle; Voltaire, who devoured the Bible, and ridiculed our dogmas, doubts, and after having made proselytes to impiety, is not ashamed, being reduced to the extremity of life, to ask for the sacraments, and to cover his body with more relics than St. Louis had at Amboise.

> A girl who is pretty and good, and as virtuous as you please, ought not to take it ill that a man, carried away by her charms, should set himself to the task of making their conquest. If this man cannot please her by any means, even if his passion be criminal, she ought never to take offence at it, nor treat him unkindly; she ought to be gentle, and pity him, if she does not love him, and think it enough to keep invincibly hold upon her own duty.

Occasionally he touches upon æsthetical matters, as in a fragment which begins with this liberal definition of beauty:

> Harmony makes beauty, says M. de S. P. (Bernardin de St. Pierre), but the definition is too short, if he thinks he has said everything. Here is mine. Remember that the subject is metaphysical. An object really beautiful ought to seem beautiful to all whose eyes fall upon it. That is all; there is nothing more to be said.

At times we have an anecdote and its commentary, perhaps jotted down for use in that latter part of the Memoirs which was never written, or which has been lost. Here is a single sheet, dated 'this 2nd September, 1791,' and headed Souvenir:

> The Prince de Rosenberg said to me, as we went down stairs, that Madame de Rosenberg was dead, and asked me if the Comte de Waldstein had in the library the illustration of the Villa d'Altichiero, which the Emperor had asked for in vain at the city library of Prague, and when I answered 'yes,' he gave an equivocal laugh. A moment afterwards, he asked me if he might tell the Emperor. 'Why not, monseigneur? It is not a secret.' 'Is His Majesty coming to Dux?' 'If he goes to Oberlaitensdorf (sic) he will go to Dux, too; and he may ask you for it, for there is a monument there which relates to him when he was Grand Duke.' 'In that case,

The Emperor asked me this morning, 6th October, how I employed my time at Dux, and I told him that I was making an Italian anthology. 'You have all the Italians, then?' 'All, sire.' See what a lie leads to. If I had not lied in saying that I was making an anthology, I should not have found myself obliged to lie again in saying that we have all the Italian poets. If the Emperor comes to Dux, I shall kill myself.

'They say that this Dux is a delightful spot,' says Casanova in one of the most personal of his notes, 'and I see that it might be for many; but not for me, for what delights me in my old age is independent of the place which I inhabit. When I do not sleep I dream, and when I am tired of dreaming I blacken paper, then I read, and most often reject all that my pen has vomited.' Here we see him blackening paper, on every occasion, and for every purpose. In one bundle I found an unfinished story about Roland, and some adventure with women in a cave; then a 'Meditation on arising from sleep, 19th May 1789'; then a 'Short Reflection of a Philosopher who finds himself thinking of procuring his own death. At Dux, on getting out of bed on 13th October 1793, day dedicated to St. Lucy, memorable in my too long life.' A big budget, containing cryptograms, is headed 'Grammatical Lottery'; and there is the title-page of a treatise on The Duplication of the Hexahedron, demonstrated geometrically to all the Universities and all the Academies of Europe.[1] There are innumerable verses, French and Italian, in all stages, occasionally attaining the finality of these lines, which appear in half a dozen tentative forms:

Sans mystère point de plaisirs,
Sans silence point de mystère.
Charme divin de mes loisirs,
Solitude! que tu m'es chère!

Then there are a number of more or less complete manuscripts of some extent. There is the manuscript of the translation of Homer's Iliad, in ottava rima (published in Venice, 1775-8); of the Histoire de Venise, of the Icosameron, a curious book published in 1787, purporting to be 'translated from English,' but really an original work of Casanova; Philocalies sur les Sottises des Mortels, a long manuscript never published; the sketch and beginning of Le Polémarque, ou la Calomnie démasquée par la présence d'esprit. Tragicomédie en trois actes, composée à Dux dans le mois de Juin de l'Année, 1791, which recurs again under the form of the Polémoscopé: La Lorgnette menteuse ou la Calomnie démasquée, acted before the Princess de Ligne, at her château at Teplitz, 1791. There is a treatise in Italian, Delle Passioni; there are long dialogues, such as Le Philosophe et le Théologien, and Rêve: Dieu-Moi; there is the Songe d'un Quart d'Heure, divided into minutes; there is the very lengthy criticism of Bernardin de Saint-Pierre; there is the Confutation d'une Censure indiscrète qu'on lit dans la Gazette de Iéna, 19 Juin 1789; with another large manuscript, unfortunately imperfect, first called L'Insulte, and then Placet au Public, dated 'Dux, this 2nd March, 1790,' referring to the same criticism on the Icosameron and the Fuite des Prisons. L'Histoire de ma Fuite des Prisons de la République de Venise, qu'on appelle les Plombs, which is the first draft of the most famous part of the Memoirs, was published at Leipzig in 1788; and, having read it in the Marcian Library at Venice, I am not surprised to learn from this indignant document that it was printed 'under the care of a young Swiss, who had the talent to commit a hundred faults of orthography.'

We come now to the documents directly relating to the Memoirs, and among these are several attempts at a preface, in which we see the actual preface coming gradually into form. One is entitled Casanova au Lecteur, another Histoire de mon Existence, and a third Preface. There is also a brief and characteristic Précis de ma vie, dated November 17, 1797. Some of these have been printed in Le Livre, 1887. But by far the most important manuscript that I discovered, one which, apparently, I am the first to discover, is a manuscript entitled Extrait du Chapitre 4 et 5. It is written on paper similar to that on which the Memoirs are written; the pages are numbered 104-148; and though it is described as Extrait, it seems to contain, at all events, the greater part of the missing chapters to which I have already referred, Chapters IV. and V. of the last volume of the Memoirs. In this manuscript we find Armelline and Scolastica, whose story is interrupted by the abrupt ending of Chapter III.; we find Mariuccia of Vol. VII., Chapter IX., who married a hairdresser; and we find also Jaconine, whom Casanova recognises as his daughter, 'much prettier than Sophia, the daughter of Thérèse Pompeati, whom I had left at London.'[1] It is curious that this very important manuscript, which supplies the one missing link in the Memoirs, should never have been discovered by any of the few people who have had the opportunity of looking over the Dux manuscripts. I am inclined to explain it by the fact that the case in which I found this manuscript contains some papers not relating to Casanova. Probably, those who looked into this case looked no further. I have told Herr Brockhaus of my discovery, and I hope to see Chapters IV. and V. in their places when the long-looked-for edition of the complete text is at length given to the world.

Another manuscript which I found tells with great piquancy the whole story of the Abbé de Brosses' ointment, the curing of the Princess de Conti's pimples, and the birth of the Duc de Montpensier, which is told very briefly, and with much less point, in the Memoirs (vol. iii., p. 327). Readers of the Memoirs will remember the duel at Warsaw with Count Branicki in 1766 (vol. x., pp. 274-320), an affair which attracted a good deal of attention at the time, and of which there is an account in a letter from the Abbé Taruffi to the dramatist, Francesco Albergati, dated Warsaw, March 19, 1766, quoted in Ernesto Masi's Life of Albergati, Bologna, 1878. A manuscript at Dux in Casanova's handwriting gives an account of this duel in the third person; it is entitled, Description de l'affaire arrivée à Varsovie le 5 Mars, 1766. D'Ancona, in the Nuova Antologia (vol. lxvii., p. 412), referring to the Abbé Taruffi's account, mentions what he considers to be a slight discrepancy: that Taruffi refers to the danseuse, about whom the duel was fought, as La Casacci, while Casanova refers to her as La Catai. In this manuscript Casanova always refers to her as La Casacci; La Catai is evidently one of M. Laforgue's arbitrary alterations of the text.

In turning over another manuscript, I was caught by the name Charpillon, which every reader of the Memoirs will remember as the name of the harpy by whom Casanova suffered so much in London, in 1763-4. This manuscript begins by saying: 'I have been in London for six months and have been to see them (that is, the mother and daughter) in their own house,' where he finds nothing but 'swindlers, who cause all who go there to lose their money in gambling.' This manuscript adds some details to the story told in the ninth and tenth volumes of the Memoirs, and refers to the meeting with the Charpillons four and a half years before, described in Volume V., pages 428-485. It is written in a tone of great indignation. Elsewhere, I found a letter written by Casanova, but not signed, referring to an anonymous letter which he had received in reference to the Charpillons, and ending: 'My handwriting is known.' It was not until the last that I came upon great bundles of letters addressed to Casanova, and so carefully preserved that little scraps of paper, on which postscripts are written, are still in their places. One still sees the seals on the backs of many of the letters, on paper which has slightly yellowed with age, leaving the ink, however, almost always fresh. They come from Venice, Paris, Rome, Prague, Bayreuth, The Hague, Genoa, Fiume, Trieste, etc., and are addressed to as many places, often poste restante. Many are letters from women, some in beautiful handwriting, on thick paper; others on scraps of paper, in painful hands, ill-spelt. A Countess writes pitifully, imploring help; one protests her love, in spite of the 'many chagrins' he has caused her; another asks 'how they are to live together'; another laments that a report has gone about that she is secretly living with him, which may harm his reputation. Some are in French, more in Italian. Mon cher Giacometto, writes one woman, in French; Carissimo e Amatissimo, writes another, in Italian. These letters from women are in some confusion, and are in need of a good deal of sorting over and rearranging before their full extent can be realised. Thus I found letters in the same handwriting separated by letters in other handwritings; many are unsigned, or signed only by a single initial; many are undated, or dated only with the day of the week or month. There are a great many letters, dating from 1779 to 1786, signed 'Francesca Buschini,' a name which I cannot identify; they are written in Italian, and one of them begins: Unico Mio vero Amico ('my only true friend'). Others are signed 'Virginia B.'; one of these is dated, 'Forli, October 15, 1773.' There is also a 'Theresa B.,' who writes from Genoa. I was at first unable to identify the writer of a whole series of letters in French, very affectionate and intimate letters, usually unsigned, occasionally signed 'B.' She calls herself votre petite amie; or she ends with a half-smiling, half-reproachful 'good-night, and sleep better than I.' In one letter, sent from Paris in 1759, she writes: 'Never believe me, but when I tell you that I love you, and that I shall love you always.' In another letter, ill-spelt, as her letters often are, she writes: 'Be assured that evil tongues, vapours, calumny, nothing can change my heart, which is yours entirely, and has no will to change its master.' Now, it seems to me that these letters must be from Manon Baletti, and that they are the letters referred to in the sixth volume of the Memoirs. We read there (page 60) how on Christmas Day, 1759, Casanova receives a letter from Manon in Paris, announcing her marriage with 'M. Blondel, architect to the King, and member of his Academy'; she returns him his letters, and begs him to return hers, or burn them. Instead of doing so he allows Esther to read them, intending to burn them afterwards. Esther begs to be allowed to keep the letters, promising to 'preserve them religiously all her life.' 'These letters,' he says, 'numbered more than two hundred, and the shortest were of four pages.' Certainly there are not two hundred of them at Dux, but it seems to me highly probable that Casanova made a final selection from Manon's letters, and that it is these which I have found.

But, however this may be, I was fortunate enough to find the set of letters which I was most anxious to find: the letters from Henriette, whose loss every writer on Casanova has lamented. Henriette, it will be remembered, makes her first appearance at Cesena, in the year 1748; after their meeting at Geneva, she reappears, romantically à propos, twenty-two years later, at Aix in Provence; and she writes to Casanova proposing un commerce épistolaire, asking him what he has done since his escape from prison, and promising to do her best to tell him all that has happened to her during the long interval. After quoting her letter, he adds: 'I replied to her, accepting the correspondence that she offered me, and telling her briefly all my vicissitudes. She related to me in turn, in some forty letters, all the history of her life. If she dies before me, I shall add these letters to these Memoirs; but to-day she is still alive, and always happy, though now old.' It has never been known what became of these letters, and why they were not added to the Memoirs. I have found a great quantity of them, some signed with her married name in full, 'Henriette de Schnetzmann,' and I am inclined to think that she survived Casanova, for one of the letters is dated Bayreuth, 1798, the year of Casanova's death. They are remarkably charming, written with a mixture of piquancy and distinction; and I will quote the characteristic beginning and end of the last letter I was able to find. It begins: 'No, it is impossible to be sulky with you!' and ends: 'If I become vicious, it is you, my Mentor, who make me so, and I cast my sins upon you. Even if I were damned I should still be your most devoted friend, Henriette de Schnetzmann.' Casanova was twenty-three when he met Henriette; now, herself an old woman, she writes to him when he is seventy-three, as if the fifty years that had passed were blotted out in the faithful affection of her memory. How many more discreet and less changing lovers have had the quality of constancy in change, to which this life-long correspondence bears witness? Does it not suggest a view of Casanova not quite the view of all the world? To me it shows the real man, who perhaps of all others best understood what Shelley meant when he said:

> True love in this differs from gold or clay,
> That to divide is not to take away.

But, though the letters from women naturally interested me the most, they were only a certain proportion of the great mass of correspondence which I turned over. There were letters from Carlo Angiolini, who was afterwards to bring the manuscript of the Memoirs to Brockhaus; from Balbi, the monk with whom Casanova escaped from the Piombi; from the Marquis Albergati, playwright, actor, and eccentric, of whom there is some account in the Memoirs; from the Marquis Mosca, 'a distinguished man of letters whom I was anxious to see,' Casanova tells us in the same volume in which he describes his visit to the Moscas at Pesaro; from Zulian, brother of the Duchess of Fiano; from Richard Lorrain, bel homme, ayant de l'esprit, le ton et le goût de la bonne société, who came to settle at Gorizia in 1773, while Casanova was there; from the Procurator Morosini, whom he speaks of in the Memoirs as his 'protector,' and as one of those through whom he obtained permission to return to Venice. His other 'protector,' the avogador Zaguri, had, says Casanova, 'since the affair of the Marquis Albergati, carried on a most interesting correspondence with me'; and in fact I found a bundle of no less than a hundred and thirty-eight letters from him, dating from 1784 to 1798. Another bundle contains one hundred and seventy-two letters from Count Lamberg. In the Memoirs Casanova says, referring to his visit to Augsburg at the end of 1761:

> I used to spend my evenings in a very agreeable manner at the house of Count Max de Lamberg, who resided at the court of the Prince-Bishop with the title of Grand Marshal. What particularly attached me to Count Lamberg was his literary talent. A first-rate scholar, learned to a degree, he has published several much esteemed works. I carried on an exchange of letters with him which ended only with his death four years ago in 1792.

Casanova tells us that, at his second visit to Augsburg in the early part of 1767, he 'supped with Count Lamberg two or three times a week,' during the four months he was there. It is with this year that the letters I have found begin: they end with the year of his death, 1792. In his Mémorial d'un Mondain Lamberg refers to Casanova as 'a man known in literature, a man of profound knowledge.' In the first edition of 1774, he laments that 'a man such as M. de S. Galt' should not yet have been taken back into favour by the Venetian government, and in the second edition, 1775, rejoices over Casanova's return to Venice. Then there are letters from Da Ponte, who tells the story of Casanova's curious relations with Mme. d'Urfé, in his Memorie scritte da esso, 1829; from Pittoni, Bono, and others mentioned in different parts of the Memoirs, and from some dozen others who are not mentioned in them. The only letters in the whole collection that have been published are those from the Prince de Ligne and from Count Koenig.

Casanova tells us in his Memoirs that, during his later years at Dux, he had only been able to 'hinder black melancholy from devouring his poor existence, or sending him out of his mind,' by writing ten or twelve hours a day. The copious manuscripts at Dux show us how persistently he was at work on a singular variety of subjects, in addition to the Memoirs, and to the various books which he published during those years. We see him jotting down everything that comes into his head, for his own amusement, and certainly without any thought of publication; engaging in learned controversies, writing treatises on abstruse mathematical problems, composing comedies to be acted before Count Waldstein's neighbours, practising verse-writing in two languages, indeed with more patience than success, writing philosophical dialogues in which God and himself are the speakers, and keeping up an extensive correspondence, both with distinguished men and with delightful women. His mental activity, up to the age of seventy-three, is as prodigious as the activity which he had expended in living a multiform and incalculable life. As in life everything living had interested him, so in his retirement from life every idea makes its separate appeal to him; and he welcomes ideas with the same impartiality with which he had welcomed adventures. Passion has intellectualised itself, and remains not less passionate. He wishes to do everything, to compete with every one; and it is only after having spent seven years in heaping up miscellaneous learning, and exercising his faculties in many directions, that he turns to look back over his own past life, and to live it over again in memory, as he writes down the narrative of what had interested him most in it. 'I write in the hope that my history will never see the broad daylight of publication,' he tells us, scarcely meaning it, we may be sure, even in the moment of hesitancy which may naturally come to him. But if ever a book was written for the pleasure of writing it, it was this one; and an autobiography written for oneself is not likely to be anything but frank.

'Truth is the only God I have ever adored,' he tells us: and we now know how truthful he was in saying so. I have only summarised in this article the most important confirmations of his exact accuracy in facts and dates; the number could be extended indefinitely. In the manuscripts we find innumerable further confirmations; and their chief value as testimony is that they tell us nothing which we should not have already known, if we had merely taken Casanova at his word. But it is not always easy to take people at their own word, when they are writing about themselves; and the world has been very loth to believe in Casanova as he represents himself. It has been specially loth to believe that he is telling the truth when he tells us about his adventures with women. But the letters contained among these manuscripts shows us the women of Casanova writing to him with all the fervour and all the fidelity which he attributes to them; and they show him to us in the character of as fervid and faithful a lover. In every fact, every detail, and in the whole mental impression which they convey, these manuscripts bring before us the Casanova of the Memoirs. As I seemed to come upon Casanova at home, it was as if I came upon old friend, already perfectly known to me, before I had made my pilgrimage to Dux.

PREFACE

I BEGIN by declaring to my reader that, by everything good or bad that I have done throughout my life, I am sure that I have earned merit or incurred guilt, and that hence I must consider myself a free agent. The doctrine of the Stoics,[2] and of any other sect, on the power of Destiny is a figment of the imagination which smacks of atheism. I am not only a monotheist but a Christian whose faith is strengthened by philosophy, which has never injured anything.

I believe in the existence of an immaterial God, creator and lord of all forms; and what proves to me that I have never doubted it is that I have always counted upon his providence, turning to him through prayer in all my tribulations and always finding my prayer granted. Despair kills; prayer dissipates it; and after praying man trusts and acts. What means the Being of Beings employs to avert the evils which hang over those who implore his aid is a question above the power of human intelligence, which, even as it contemplates the incomprehensibility of Divine Providence, cannot but adore it. Our ignorance becomes our only resource; and the truly happy are they who cherish it. So we must pray to God and believe that we have obtained grace even when appearances tell us that we have not. As for the bodily position we should assume when we address our requests to the Creator, a line of Petrarch's[3] instructs us:

* Casanova was prevented by death from fulfilling this promise. His memoirs end with the summer of 1774.

Con le ginocchia della mente inchine.

("With the knees of the mind bent.")[4]

Man is a free agent; but he is not free if he does not believe it, for the more power he attributes to Destiny, the more he deprives himself of the power which God granted him when he gave him reason.

Reason is a particle of the Creator's divinity. If we use it to make ourselves humble and just, we cannot but please him who gave it to us. God does not cease to be God except for those who consider his nonexistence possible. They cannot suffer a greater punishment.

Though man is free, he must not believe that he is free to do whatever he pleases. He becomes a slave as soon as he decides to act when he is moved by some passion. Nisi paret imperat ("Unless it obeys, it commands").[5] He who has the strength to defer acting until he is calm again is the wise man. Such a being is rare.

The reader who likes to think will see in these memoirs that, since I never aimed at a set goal, the only system I followed, if system it may be called, was to let myself go wherever the wind which was blowing drove me. What vicissitudes in this independence from method and system! My ill fortune no less than my good proved to me that both in this physical world and in the moral world good comes from evil as evil comes from good. My errors will show thoughtful readers these opposite roads or will teach them the great art of straddling the ditch. The one thing necessary is courage, for strength without confidence is useless. I have often seen good fortune fall in my lap as the result of some incautious step which should have cast me into the abyss; and, though I blamed myself, I thanked God. On the other hand, I have also seen an overwhelming misfortune follow upon a course of conduct duly weighed by prudence; I was humiliated; but, sure that I had been right, I soon consoled myself.

Despite an excellent moral foundation, the inevitable fruit of the divine principles which were rooted in my heart, I was all my life the victim of my senses; I have delighted in going astray and I have constantly lived in error, with no other consolation than that of knowing I had erred. For this reason I hope, dear reader, that, far from finding my history mere impudent boasting, you will find that it has the tone suited to a general confession, though in the style of my narratives you will find neither a show of repentance nor the constraint of one who blushes to confess his escapades. My follies are the follies of youth. You will see that I laugh at them, and if you are kind you will laugh at them with me.

You will laugh when you discover that I often had no scruples about deceiving nitwits and scoundrels and fools when I found it necessary. As for women, this sort of reciprocal deceit cancels itself out, for when love enters in, both parties are usually dupes. But fools are a very different matter. I always congratulate myself when I remember catching them in my snares, for they are insolent and presumptuous to the point of challenging intelligence. We avenge intelligence when we deceive a fool, and the victory is worth the effort, for a fool is encased in armor and we do not know where to attack him. In short, deceiving a fool is an exploit worthy of an intelligent man. What has infused my very blood with an unconquerable hatred of the whole tribe of fools from the day of my birth is that I become a fool myself whenever I am in their company. They are, however, to be distinguished from the class of men whom we term stupid, for since the stupidity of the latter is due only to their lack of education, I rather like them. I have found some of them who were very decent and whose stupidity was almost a kind of wit. They are like eyes which, but for a cataract, would be extremely beautiful.

If you, my dear reader, will consider the nature of this preface, you will find it easy to see my purpose in it. I have written it because I want you to know me before you read me. It is only at coffeehouses and inns that we converse with strangers.

I have written my story, and no one can object to that. But am I wise to give it to a public of which I know nothing but what is to its discredit? No! I know that I am being unwise. But I need something to occupy me, something to make me laugh; so why should I deny myself?

> Expulit elleboro morbum, bilemque meraco.
> ("He drove out the disease and the bile with > pure hellebore.")[6]

An ancient author tells me, in lecture-hall tones: "If thou hast not done things worthy to be written, at least write things worthy to be read."[7] It is a precept as brilliant as a diamond of the first water cut in England,[8] but it does not apply to me, for I am writing neither the biography of a famous man nor a romance. Worthy or unworthy, my life is my subject, my subject is my life. Having lived it without ever thinking that I should take a fancy to write it, it may have an interest which it might not have if I had lived it intending to write it in my old age and, what is more, to publish it.

In this year 1797, at the age of seventy-two, when, though I am still breathing, I can say vixi ("I have lived"), I can find no pleasanter pastime than to converse with myself about my own affairs and to provide a most worthy subject for laughter to my well-bred audience, for such is the society which has always shown its friendship for me and which I have always frequented.

To write well, I have but to imagine that my readers will belong to it: Quaecumque dixi, si placuerint, dictavit auditor ("If what I have said has been pleasing, it is the reader who will have dictated it").[9] As for the uninitiated whom I cannot prevent from reading me, it will be enough for me to know that it was not for them that I wrote.

Remembering the pleasures I enjoyed, I renew them, and I laugh at the pains which I have endured and which I no longer feel. A member of the universe, I speak to the air and I imagine I am rendering an account of my stewardship as the majordomo does to his master, before vanishing. So far as my future is concerned, as a philosopher I have never thought it worth worrying over since I know nothing about it, and as a Christian, I know that faith must believe without arguing and that the purest faith keeps the deepest silence. I know that I have existed, and since I am sure of that because I have felt, I also know that I shall no longer exist when I have ceased to feel. If by any chance I continue to feel after my death, I shall have no more doubts; but I will give the lie to anyone who comes to tell me that I am dead.

Since my history should begin with the earliest fact which my memory can recall to me, it will begin when I had reached the age of eight years and four months. Before then, if it is true that vivere cogitare est ("to live is to think"),[10] I did not live, I vegetated. Since human thought consists only in comparisons drawn in order to examine relationships, it cannot precede the existence of memory. The organ of memory did not develop in my head until eight years and four months after my birth; it was only then that my soul began to be capable of receiving impressions. How an immaterial substance which can nec tangere nec tangi ("neither touch nor be touched")[11] can receive impressions no man on earth can explain.

A consoling philosophy maintains, in harmony with religion, that the dependence of the soul upon the senses and organs is only fortuitous and temporary and that the soul will be free and happy when the death of the body liberates it from their tyranny. This is all very fine but, religion apart, it is not certain. So, since I cannot be perfectly sure that I am immortal until after I have ceased to live, I may be forgiven if I am in no hurry to learn this truth. A knowledge purchased at the price of life is bought too dearly. Meanwhile, I worship God, I refrain from committing any injustice and shun those who are unjust, though I do nothing to harm them. I am content to abstain from doing them good. Snakes are not to be cherished.

I must also say something about my temperament and my character. Here the most indulgent among my readers will not be those who are least endowed with honesty and intelligence.

I have been of all the four temperaments: the phlegmatic in my childhood, the sanguine in my youth, then the bilious, and finally the melancholic, which would seem to be with me to remain. By adapting my diet to my constitution, I have always enjoyed good health, and having once learned that what impairs it is always excess, either in eating or in abstaining, I have never had any physician but myself. But I have found that abstinence is the more dangerous by far. Too much brings on indigestion, too little kills. At my present advanced age I find that, despite an excellent stomach, I should eat but once a day, but what makes up to me for this privation is sweet sleep and the ease with which I set down my thoughts on paper without any need to indulge in paradoxes or to weave a tissue of sophisms more apt to deceive me than my readers, for I could never bring myself to give them counterfeit coin if I knew it was counterfeit.

The sanguine temperament made me extremely susceptible to the seduction of any pleasurable sensation, always cheerful, eager to pass from one enjoyment to another and ingenious in inventing them. From it came my inclination to make new acquaintances as well as my readiness to break them off, though always for some good reason and never from mere fickleness. Defects arising from a temperament cannot be corrected, because our temperament is independent of our powers; but character is another matter. It is constituted by heart and mind and, since temperament has very little influence here, it follows that character depends on upbringing and that it can be altered and reformed.

I leave it to others to decide if my character is good or bad, but such as it is, anyone versed in physiognomy can easily read it in my face. It is only there that a man's character becomes visible, for the physiognomy is its seat. It is worth noting that men who have no physiognomy, and there are a great many such, are equally lacking in what is called a character. Hence the diversity of physiognomies will be equal to the diversity of characters.

Having observed that I have all my life acted more from the force of feeling than from my reflections, I have concluded that my conduct has depended more on my character than on my mind, after a long struggle between them in which I have alternately found myself with too little intelligence for my character and too little character for my intelligence. But enough of this, for it is a matter on which si brevis esse volo obscurus fio ("when I try to be brief, I become obscure").[12] I believe that, without offending against modesty, I can apply to myself these words from my beloved Vergil:

> Nec sum adeo informis: nuper me in litore vidi
> Cum placidum ventis staret mare.[13]
> ("I am not such a monster; lately I saw my reflection
> by the shore when the sea was calm.")

Cultivating whatever gave pleasure to my senses was always the chief business of my life; I have never found any occupation more important. Feeling that I was born for the sex opposite to mine, I have always loved it and done all that I could to make myself loved by it. I have also been extravagantly fond of good food and irresistibly drawn by anything which could excite curiosity.

I had friends who did me good turns, and I was so fortunate on all such occasions as to have it in my power to show them my gratitude; and I had execrable enemies who persecuted me and whom I did not destroy only because I could not. I would never have forgiven them if I had not forgotten the wrongs they did me. The man who forgets a wrong has not forgiven it, he has simply forgotten it; for forgiveness comes from a heroic sentiment in a noble heart and a magnanimous mind, whereas forgetting comes from weakness of memory or from an easy apathy natural to a pacific soul, and often from a need for peace and quiet; for hatred, in the end, kills the unfortunate man who fosters it.

If anyone calls me a sensualist he will be wrong, for the power of my senses never drew me from my duty when I had one. For the same reason Homer should never have been taxed with drunkenness: Laudibus arguitur vini vinosus Homerus ("Homer's praise of wine convicts him of having been given to wine").[14]

I have always liked highly seasoned dishes: macaroni prepared by a good Neapolitan cook, olla podrida,[15] good sticky salt cod from Newfoundland, high game on the very edge, and cheeses whose perfection is reached when the little creatures which inhabit them become visible. As for women, I have always found that the one I was in love with smelled good, and the more copious her sweat the sweeter I found it.

What a depraved taste! How disgraceful to admit it and not blush for it! This sort of criticism makes me laugh. It is precisely by virtue of my coarse tastes, I have the temerity to believe, that I am happier than other men, since I am convinced that my tastes make me capable of more pleasure. Happy they who know how to obtain pleasure without harming anyone; they are madmen who imagine that the Great Being can enjoy the griefs, the sufferings, the abstinences which they offer him in sacrifice, and that he loves none but fanatics who inflict them on themselves. God can demand of his creatures only that they practice the virtues whose seed he has sown in their souls, and he has given us nothing which is not meant to make us happy: self-esteem, desire for praise, emulation, vigor, courage, and a power which no tyranny can take from us: the power to kill ourselves if, after calculating, be it rightly or wrongly, we are unfortunate enough to find it our best recourse. It is the strongest proof of that moral freedom in us which sophism has so often argued against. Yet nature rightly holds it in abhorrence; and all religions cannot but forbid it.

A would-be freethinker told me one day that I could not call myself a philosopher and at the same time accept revelation.

If we do not doubt it in the physical world, why should we not accept it in religion? It is only a question of the form which it takes. Spirit speaks to spirit, not to the ears. The principles of all that we know must have been revealed to those who handed them down to us by the great and supreme principle which contains all principles. The bee making its hive, the swallow building its nest, the ant digging its hole, the spider weaving its web would never have done anything without a previous eternal revelation. We must either believe that this is so, or admit that matter thinks. Why not, Locke[16] would say, if God so willed? But we dare not do such honor to matter. So let us hold to revelation.

The great philosopher who, after studying nature, thought he could cry "Victory!" when he concluded that nature was God, died too soon. If he had lived a few more years he would have gone much further and his journey would not have been a long one. Finding himself in his author, he could no longer have denied him: in eo movemur, et sumus ("in him we move and have our being").[17] He would have found him inconceivable; and it would not have troubled him. Could God, the great principle of principles, and who never had a principle—could even he conceive himself if to conceive himself he had to know his own principle? O happy ignorance! Spinoza, the virtuous Spinoza, died without having attained to it. He would have died a wise man, with the right to expect the reward of his virtues, if he had supposed that his soul was immortal.

It is not true that an expectation of reward is unworthy of true virtue and impairs its purity, for, on the contrary, it helps to sustain virtue, since man is too weak to wish to be virtuous only for his own satisfaction. I believe that Amphiaraus,[18] who vir bonus esse quam videri malebat ("chose to be good rather than to seem good"),[19] is sheer fable. In short, I believe that there is not an honest man in the world without some sort of expectation. And now I will set forth mine.

I expect the friendship, the esteem, and the gratitude of my readers. Their gratitude, if reading my memoirs will have given them instruction and pleasure. Their esteem if, doing me justice, they will have found that I have more virtues than faults; and their friendship as soon as they come to find me deserving of it by the frankness and good faith with which I submit myself to their judgment without in any way disguising what I am.

They will find that I have always loved truth so passionately that I have often resorted to lying as a way of first introducing it into minds which were ignorant of its charms. They will not condemn me when they see me emptying my friends' purses to satisfy my whims. They were possessed by chimerical projects, and by making them hope for their success I at the same time hoped to cure them of their folly by opening their eyes. I deceived them to make them wise; and I did not consider myself guilty, because what I did was not prompted by avarice. I was simply paying for my pleasures with money allotted to acquiring possessions which nature makes it impossible to obtain. I should consider myself guilty if I were a rich man today. I have nothing; whatever I had, I have squandered; and this consoles and justifies me. It was money which was to be spent on follies; I merely changed its application by making it pay for mine.

If I am deceived in my hope of pleasing, I admit that I should be sorry, but not sorry enough to make me repent of having written, for nothing can change the fact that I have found it a pastime. The cruelty of boredom! It can only be because they had forgotten it that the inventors of the pains of hell did not include it among them.

Yet I will confess that I cannot rid myself of the fear of being hissed. It is too natural a fear for me to dare boast that I am above it; and I am far from consoling myself by hoping that when my memoirs are published I shall be no more. It horrifies me even to imagine myself contracting the slightest obligation to death, which I loathe. Happy or unhappy, life is the only treasure which man possesses, and they who do not love it do not deserve it. Honor is set above it only because dishonor blasts it. If a man faced with this choice kills himself, philosophy can have nothing to say. O death! cruel law of nature which reason cannot but condemn, for it operates only to destroy reason. Cicero[20] says that it frees us from our ills. That great philosopher records the expenditure, but does not include the receipts in his accounting. I do not remember if, when he wrote his Tusculans, his Tulliola was dead. Death is a monster which drives an attentive spectator from the great theater before the play in which he is infinitely interested is over. This alone is reason enough to hate it.

In these memoirs the reader will not find all my adventures. I have left out those which would have offended the people who played a part in them, for they would cut a sorry figure in them. Even so, there are those who will sometimes think me only too indiscreet; I am sorry for it. If I become wise before I die, and if I have time, I will burn my whole manuscript. At the moment I have not the strength of mind for that.

Those who think that I lay on too much color when I describe certain amorous adventures in detail will be wrong, unless, that is, they consider me a bad painter altogether. I beg them to forgive me if, in my old age, my soul is reduced to feeling no joys but those of memory. Virtue will skip all the pictures which may affright it; and I am glad to give it this warning in my preface. So much the worse for those who do not read it. The preface stands to the work as the bill does to the play. It is to be read. I have not written these memoirs for those young people who can only save themselves from falling by spending their youth in ignorance, but for those whom experience of life has rendered proof against being seduced, whom living in the fire has transformed into salamanders. Since true virtues are only habits, I can say that the truly virtuous are those happy people who practice them without any effort. Such people have no notion of intolerance. It is for them that I have written. I have written in French instead of in Italian because the French language is more widely known than mine. The purists who, finding turns of expression proper to my native country in my style, will criticize me on that score will be right if they are prevented from understanding me. The Greeks relished Theophrastus[21] despite his Eresian expressions, as the Romans did their Livy[22] despite his "Patavinity." If I succeed in interesting, I hope I may benefit by the same indulgence. All Italy relishes Algarotti[23] although his style is full of Gallicisms.

Yet it is worth observing that among all the living languages in the republic of letters,[24] French is the only one which its presiding judges[25] have sentenced not to enrich itself at the expense of the other languages, whereas these, though all richer than French, pillaged it not only of its words but also of its mannerisms as soon as they realized that these little thefts beautified them. Yet those who subjected it to this law at the same time admitted its poverty. They said that since it had reached the point of possessing all the beauties of which it was capable, the slightest foreign admixture would disfigure it. This judgment may have been handed down by prejudice. In Lully's[26] day the whole nation thought the same of its music, until Rameau[27] came to teach it better. Today, under the Republican government, eloquent orators and learned writers have already convinced all Europe that they will raise French to a pitch of beauty and power which the world has not yet seen in any other language. In the short space of five years it has already acquired some hundred words which are amazing either for their sweetness or their majesty or their noble harmony. Is it possible, for example, to invent anything more beautiful in the realm of language than ambulance, Franciade,[28] monarchien, sansculottisme? Long live the Republic! A body without a head cannot possibly commit follies.

The motto which I have flaunted justifies my digressions and the commentaries in which I indulge, perhaps too often, on my exploits of various kinds: nequicquam sapit qui sibi non sapit.[29] For the same reason I always felt a need to hear myself praised in good company:

Excitat auditor studium, laudataque virtus
crescit, et immensum gloria calcar habet.

grows by praise, and fame is a powerful spur.")[30]

I should have liked to display the proud axiom Nemo leditur nisi a seipso ("No one suffers except by his own doing"),[31] had I not feared to offend the vast number of those who, whenever anything goes wrong for them, cry "It is not my fault." It is best to leave them this small consolation, for without it they would hate themselves; and self-hatred is soon followed by the thought of suicide.

For my part, since I have always admitted that I was the chief cause of all the misfortunes which have befallen me, I have rejoiced in my ability to be my own pupil, and in my duty to love my teacher.

CHAPTER I

IN THE year 1428 Don Jacobe Casanova, born at Saragossa, the capital of Aragon, natural son of Don Francisco, abducted Donna Anna Palafox from a convent on the day after she had taken her vows. He was secretary to King Alfonso.[2] He fled with her to Rome, where, after a year of imprisonment, Pope Martin III[3] gave Donna Anna a dispensation from her vows and the nuptial blessing, at the instance of Don Juan Casanova,[4] master of the sacred palace and uncle to Don Jacobe. All the offspring of this marriage died in infancy except Don Juan, who in 1475 married Eleonora Albini, by whom he had a son named Marcantonio.[5]

In the year 1481 Don Juan was obliged to leave Rome because he had killed an officer of the King of Naples.[6] He fled to Como with his wife and son, then he set out to seek his fortune. He died on a voyage with Christopher Columbus in the year 1493.[7]

Martial,[8] and was secretary to Cardinal Pompeo Colonna.[9] The satire against Giulio de' Medici[10] which can be found among his poems obliged him to leave Rome, and he returned to Como, where he married Abondia Rezzonica.

The same Giulio de' Medici, having become Pope Clement VII, pardoned him and summoned him back to Rome, where, after the city was taken and pillaged by the Imperial troops[11] in the year 1526, he died of the plague. Otherwise he would have died of poverty, for the soldiers of Charles V[12] had robbed him of all he possessed. Piero Valeriano[13] writes of him at some length in his book De infelicitate litteratorum.

Three months after his death his wife gave birth to Giacomo Casanova, who died at an advanced age in France as a colonel in the army commanded by Farnese[14] against Henri, King of Navarre,[15] later King of France. He had left a son in Parma, who married Teresa Conti, by whom he had Giacomo, who married Anna Roli in the year 1680. Giacomo had two sons, of whom the elder, Giovanni Battista, left Parma in the year 1712; what became of him is not known. The younger son, Gaetano Giuseppe Giacomo, also forsook his family in the year 1715, at the age of seventeen.

This is all that I have found in a notebook of my father's. What follows I learned from my mother's lips:

Gaetano Giuseppe Giacomo left his family, enamored by the charms of an actress named Fragoletta[16] who played soubrette roles. In love and without means of support, he decided to earn his living by turning his personal advantages to account. He took up dancing and, five years later, turned actor, becoming even more highly regarded for his probity than for his talent.

Whether from fickleness or because she had given him cause for jealousy, he abandoned Fragoletta and went to Venice, where he joined a troop of actors which played at the Teatro San Samuele.[17] Across the way from the house where he lodged there lived a shoemaker named Girolamo Farussi with his wife Marzia and their only daughter Zanetta, a perfect beauty at the age of sixteen. The young actor fell in love with the girl, succeeded in awakening her heart, and persuaded her to elope with him. Being an actor, he could not hope to obtain her by gaining the consent of Marzia her mother, still less that of Girolamo her father, who thought an actor an abomination. Provided with the necessary certificates and accompanied by two witnesses, the young lovers presented themselves before the Patriarch of Venice,[18] who united them in marriage. Marzia, the girl's mother, protested loudly, and the father died of grief. I was born of this marriage[19] nine months later, on April 2 of the year 1725.

The following year my mother left me in the care of hers, who had forgiven her when she learned that my father had promised never to force her to appear on the stage. This is a promise which all actors make to the daughters of bourgeois families whom they marry, and which they never keep because their wives never hold them to it. As it turned out, my mother was very glad that she had learned to act, for, being left a widow with six children nine years later, she could not have brought them up.

I was one year old, then, when my father left me in Venice to go to London to act. It was in that great city that my mother made her first appearance on the stage, and it was there that, in the year 1727, she gave birth[20] to my brother Francesco, the celebrated painter of battle pictures, who has been living at Venice since the year 1783, practicing his profession.

My mother came back to Venice with her husband toward the end of the year 1728 and, having become an actress, she continued in that career. In the year 1730 she gave birth to my brother Giovanni, who died at Dresden toward the end of the year 1795, serving the Elector[21] as director of the Academy of Painting. In the course of the three following years, she gave birth to two girls,[22] of whom one died in infancy and the other was married in Dresden, where, in this year 1798, she is still living. I had another brother, born posthumously,[23] who became a priest and died at Rome fifteen years ago.

And now to come to the beginning of my own existence as a thinking being. In the beginning of August in the year 1733 my organ of memory developed. I was then eight years and four months old. I remember nothing of what may have happened to me before that time. This is the incident:

I was standing in the corner of a room, leaning against the wall, holding my head, and staring at the blood which was streaming to the floor from my nose. My grandmother Marzia, whose pet I was, came to me, washed my face with cold water, and, unknown to anyone in the house, boarded a gondola with me and took me to Murano. This is a densely populated island about half an hour from Venice.

Leaving the gondola, we enter a hovel, where we find an old woman sitting on a pallet, with a black cat in her arms and five or six others around her. She was a witch. The two old women had a long conversation, of which I must have been the subject. At the end of their dialogue in the Friulian language,[24] my grandmother gave the witch a silver ducat,[25] whereupon she opened a chest, took me up in her arms, put me into it, shut it, and locked the lid on me, telling me not to be afraid. It was just the way to make me afraid, if I had been able to think; but I was in a stupor. I kept quiet, holding my handkerchief to my nose because I was still bleeding and feeling quite unperturbed by the racket I heard being made outside. I heard alternate laughter and weeping, cries, singing, and sundry thumps on the chest. It was all one to me. Finally they took me out; my blood stops flowing. After giving me numberless caresses, this strange woman undresses me, lays me on the bed, burns simples, collects the smoke from them in a sheet, wraps me in it, recites spells over me, then unwraps me and gives me five very good-tasting sweetmeats. She next rubs my temples and the back of my neck with a sweet-smelling unguent, and dresses me again. She says that my bleeding will gradually diminish, provided I tell no one what she had done to cure me, but solemnly warns me that I will lose all my blood and die if I dare reveal her mysteries to anyone. After impressing this upon me she tells me that a charming lady will visit me the following night, and that my happiness will depend upon her, if I have the strength of mind to tell no one that I received such a visit. We left and returned home.

I had scarcely gone to bed before I fell asleep without even remembering the fine visitor I was to receive. But waking several hours later, I saw, or thought I saw, a dazzlingly beautiful woman come down by the chimney, wearing a huge pannier and a dress of magnificent material, with a crown on her head set with a profusion of stones which seemed to me to be sparkling with fire. She approached slowly, looking at once majestic and kindly, and sat down on my bed. From her pocket she drew several small boxes, which she emptied on my head, at the same time muttering words. After delivering a long discourse, of which I understood nothing, and kissing me, she left as she had entered, and I went back to sleep.

Coming to dress me the next morning, my grandmother was no sooner at my bedside than she commanded me to keep silence. She then impressed it on me that I would die if I dared to tell anyone what must have happened to me during the night. These solemn adjurations from the lips of the only woman whose influence over me was absolute, and who had accustomed me to obey her every command blindly, were why I have remembered this incident; they made me seal it away in the most secret corner of my budding memory. In any case, I felt no temptation to tell the story. I did not know whether anyone would find it interesting, or to whom I might tell it. My disease had made me dull, and very poor company; people felt sorry for me and left me alone; everyone supposed that I would not live long. My father and mother never spoke to me.

After the journey to Murano and my nocturnal visit from the fairy I still bled, but less and less; my memory developed, and in less than a month I learned to read. It would be ridiculous to attribute my cure to these two absurdities, but it would be a mistake to hold that they could not contribute to it. As for the appearance of the beautiful queen, I have always believed that it was a dream, unless it was a masquerade deliberately contrived; but the remedies for the worst diseases are not always found in pharmacy. One phenomenon or another demonstrates our ignorance to us every day. I believe it is for this reason that nothing is harder to find than a learned man whose mind is entirely free from superstition. There have never been wizards on this earth, but their power has always existed for those whom they have been able to cajole into believing them such.

Somnio, nocturnos lemures, portentaque Thessala rides ("In dreams you mock at nocturnal phantoms and Thessalian portents").[26] Many things become real which previously existed only in the imagination; hence many effects attributed to faith may not always be miraculous. They are miraculous for those who hold that the power of faith has no limits.

The second incident which I remember, and which concerns myself, happened to me three months after my journey to Murano, six weeks before my father's death. I record it in order to give my reader an idea of the way in which my character was developing.

One day about the middle of November I and my brother Francesco, who was two years younger than myself, were in my father's room watching him attentively as he worked at optics.

On the table I noticed a large round crystal cut in facets, and I was enchanted when, holding it before my eyes, I saw everything multiplied. Observing that no one was watching me, I seized the opportunity to slip it into my pocket.

Three or four minutes later my father rose, went to get the crystal, and, not finding it, said that one of us must have taken it. My brother assured him that he knew nothing about it and, though I was the culprit, I said the same. He threatened to search us and promised to give the liar a beating. After pretending to look for it in every corner of the room, I adroitly dropped it into my brother's coat pocket. I was instantly sorry, for I could have pretended to find it somewhere; but the crime was already committed. My father, exasperated by our fruitless efforts, searches us, finds the crystal in my innocent brother's pocket, and inflicts the promised punishment. Three or four years later I was stupid enough to boast to my brother that I had played this trick on him. He has never forgiven me and has taken every opportunity to avenge himself.

When I once related this crime in all its particulars in a general confession, my confessor rewarded me with a bit of recondite learning which I was glad to acquire. He was a Jesuit. He told me that, since I was named Giacomo, I had by this action verified the meaning of my name, for Jacob in Hebrew meant "supplanter." This was why God had changed the name of the ancient patriarch Jacob to Israel, which means "seeing." He had deceived his brother Esau.

Six weeks after this event my father was attacked by an abscess inside his head at the level of the ear, which brought him to the grave in a week. The physician, who had begun by giving the patient oppilative remedies, thought to repair his mistake by castoreum,[27] which brought on death in convulsions. The apostem[28] discharged through his ear one minute after he died; it left after killing him, as if it found nothing further to do in him. He was in the prime of life, at thirty-six years of age. He died regretted by the public, and particularly by the nobility, who conceded that he was superior to his station both by his probity and by his knowledge of mechanics. Two days before his death he sent for us all to appear at his bedside in the presence of his wife and of the Signori Grimani,[29] Venetian noblemen, as he wished to obtain their promise to become our protectors.

After giving us his blessing, he made our mother, who dissolved in tears, swear that she would bring none of his children up for the stage, on which he would never have appeared if he had not been driven to it by an unfortunate passion. She took the oath, and the three patricians gave him their words to see that it was not broken. Circumstances helped her to keep her promise.[30]

My mother, being six months gone with child, was excused from acting until after Easter. Beautiful and young as she was, she refused her hand to all who sued for it. Never losing courage, she believed that she could bring us up without assistance. She considered that her first duty was to me, not so much from any special fondness as because of my disease, which had reduced me to such a state that no one knew what to do with me. I was extremely weak, had no appetite, was unable to apply myself to anything, and looked like an idiot. The doctors argued among themselves over the cause of my disease. "He loses," they said, "two pounds of blood a week, and he can only have from sixteen to eighteen. Then where can such an abundant flow of blood come from?" One said that all my chyle turned to blood; another maintained that the air I breathed must increase the blood in my lungs by a certain amount at each respiration, and that this was why I always kept my mouth open. All this

I learned six years later from Signor Baffo, a great friend of my father's.

It was he who consulted the famous physician Macoppe,[31] of Padua, who gave him his opinion in writing. This document, which I have kept, says that "our blood is an elastic fluid, which can increase and diminish in density, but never in quantity," and that my hemorrhage "could only come from the density of the mass, which relieved itself naturally, in order to facilitate its circulation." He said that I should already be dead, "if Nature, which seeks to live, had not come to her own assistance." He concluded that "since the cause of this density could only be in the air" I breathed, those who were responsible for me must "either give me a change of air or be prepared to lose" me. According to him, the density of my blood was the reason for the stupidity which appeared on my countenance.

It was Signor Baffo,[32] then—a sublime genius, a poet in the most lascivious of all genres, but great and unrivaled—who was the cause of the decision that I should be sent to board in Padua, and to whom, in consequence, I owe my life. He died twenty years later, the last of his ancient patrician family; but his poems, though indecent, will never let his name perish. The State Inquisitors[33] of Venice have contributed to his fame by their piety. By persecuting his works in manuscript, they made them sought after; they should have known that spreta exolescunt ("things scorned are forgotten").[34]

Once Professor Macoppe's oracle was approved, it was the Abate Grimani who undertook to find me a decent house to board in at Padua, through a chemist of his acquaintance who lived in that city. His name was Ottaviani and he was also an antiquarian. Within a few days the boardinghouse was found. And on April 2, 1734, the day on which I completed my ninth year, I was taken to Padua in a burchiello[35] by way of the Brenta. We went on board two hours before midnight, after supping.

The burchiello may be considered a small floating house. It has a saloon with a cabin at either end, and quarters for servants at the bow and stern; it is a long rectangle, roofed by a deck and with glazed windows with shutters along the sides; the short journey is made in eight hours. Those who accompanied me were, besides my mother, the Abate Grimani and Signor Baffo. She took me to bed with her in the saloon, and the two friends slept in the camerino.[36]

As soon as it dawned she got up, then opened a window which was across from the bed, so that the rays of the rising sun falling on my face made me open my eyes. The bed was low. I did not see the ground. All that I saw through the same window was the tops of the trees which line the banks of the river. The boat was moving, but so smoothly that I did not know it; hence I was amazed to see the trees passing rapidly out of my sight. "Oh, dear Mother!" I cried, "what does this mean? The trees are walking."

At that moment the two noblemen entered and, seeing my amazement, they ask me what was puzzling me. "How is it," I answered, "that the trees are walking?"

They laughed, but my mother sighed and said in a pitying tone: "It is the boat that is moving, not the trees. Get dressed."

I instantly understood the reason for the phenomenon, forging ahead with my budding reason and thoroughly pleased with myself. "Then it is possible, Mother," I said, "that the sun does not move either, and that it is we who turn from West to East." My mother cries out at such stupidity, Signor Grimani pities my lack of intelligence, and I am taken completely aback and on the verge of tears. It is Signor Baffo who restores me to life. He rushes to me, kisses me tenderly, and says: "You are right, my child. The sun does not move, take courage, always reason logically, and let people laugh."

My mother asked him if he was out of his mind to give me such lessons; but the philosopher, without even answering her, proceeded to outline a theory adapted to my simple, unspoiled reason. This was the first real pleasure I enjoyed in my life. But for Signor Baffo, that moment would have been enough to corrupt my intelligence: the baseness of credulity would have taken root in it. The stupidity of the two others would certainly have blunted the edge of a faculty by which I do not know if I have progressed very far; but I do know that to it alone I owe all the happiness I enjoy when I commune with myself in solitude.

We reached Padua early and were soon at the house of Ottaviani, whose wife gave me many caresses. I saw five or six children, among them a girl of eight years named Maria and another of seven named Rosa, pretty as an angel. Ten years later Maria became the wife of the broker Colonda; and a few years afterward Rosa married the patrician Piero Marcello, who had a son by her and two daughters, one of whom was married to Signor Piero Moncenigo and the other to a nobleman of the Corraro family, whose marriage was later annulled. I shall have occasion to speak of all these persons. Ottaviani at once took us to the house where I was to board.

It was some fifty paces away, near Santa Maria in Vanzo, parish of San Michele, in the house of an old Slavonian woman who let her second floor to Signora Mida, the wife of a Slavonian colonel.[37] My little trunk was opened in her presence and she was given an inventory of all that it contained. That done, she received six zecchini[38] for six months' board for me in advance. For this small sum she was to feed me, keep me clean and neat, and send me to school. Her protestation that it was not enough went unheeded. I was kissed, told always to obey her in everything, and left standing where I was. So they got rid of me.

CHAPTER II

My grandmother comes to put me to board with Doctor Gozzi. My first love.

THE Slavonian woman at once took me up to the attic and showed me my bed, the last in a row with four others, three of which belonged to boys of my own age, who were then at school, and the fourth to the maidservant, who was charged with making us say our prayers and keeping an eye on us to prevent us from indulging in the mischief and lewdness usual among schoolboys. She then took me down to the garden and told me I might walk there until dinnertime. I felt neither happy nor unhappy; I said nothing; I experienced neither hope nor despair nor even curiosity; I was neither cheerful nor sad. The only thing that troubled me was my mistress's person. Though I had no settled notion of beauty or ugliness, her face, her look, her voice, her manner of speech repelled me; her masculine features unnerved me every time I raised my eyes to her face to listen to what she was saying to me. She was tall and as heavy-set as a soldier, with a yellow complexion, black hair, and long, shaggy eyebrows. She had several long hairs on her chin, hideous half-exposed breasts which hung, with a great cleft between them, halfway down her tall body, and her age appeared to be fifty. The maidservant was a peasant who did everything. The so-called garden was an open space measuring thirty or forty paces in either direction, the only pleasant thing about it being its green color.

Toward noon I saw three boys approaching me; they chattered away at me as if we were old acquaintances, saying all manner of things which assumed a background of experience I did not possess. I said nothing in reply, but this did not dash them at all; they made me join in their innocent pleasures. These consisted in running, playing horse-and-rider, and turning somersaults. I let them initiate me into all these pastimes without protesting, until we were called in to dinner. I sit down at the table and, seeing a wooden spoon before me, I push it away and demand my silver service, which I cherished as a present from my grandmother. The maid said that since her mistress insisted on equality, I must conform to the customs of the house. This annoyed me, but I submitted. Having learned that there must be equality in everything, I ate my soup from the tureen like the others, without complaining of the speed with which my fellow boarders ate, though I was much surprised that it was sanctioned. After the very bad soup we were given a small portion of dried cod, then an apple, and dinner was over. It was Lent. We had neither glasses nor cups; we all drank from the same earthenware jug, which contained a vile beverage called graspia.[1] It was water in which grape-stems stripped of their grapes had been boiled. From then on I drank nothing but water. This fare surprised me, because I did not know if I was allowed to consider it bad.

After dinner the maid took me to school to a young priest named Doctor Gozzi.[2] The Slavonian woman had agreed to pay him forty soldi[3] a month. This is the eleventh part of a zecchino. He was to begin by teaching me to write. I was put with the five-year-olds, who at once fell to jeering at me.

Supper, as might be expected, was even worse than dinner. I was astonished that I was not allowed to complain of it. I was then consigned to a bed, in which the three notorious insects would not let me shut my eyes. In addition, rats ran all over the attic and jumped up on my bed, filling me with fear which froze my blood. Thus did I begin to learn what it is to be unhappy and to bear misfortune patiently. Meanwhile, the insects that were eating me up diminished the terror that the rats inspired in me, and my terror in turn made me less conscious of the bites. My soul profited from the competition between my afflictions. The maidservant remained deaf to my cries.

At the first rays of morning I left the nest of vermin. After complaining a little of all the sufferings I had endured, I asked the maid for a shirt, since the one I had on was hideous with the stains from the lice. She told me that shirts were changed only on Sunday and laughed when I threatened to complain of her to her mistress. For the first time in my life, I wept with vexation and anger when I heard my companions mocking me. They were in the same state as I was; but they were used to it. I need say no more.

Profoundly depressed, I spent the whole morning at school in a heavy doze. One of my fellow boarders told the Doctor the reason, but only to ridicule me. The good priest, whom Eternal Providence had bestowed on me, took me into another room, where, having heard my story and confirmed it with his own eyes, he was distressed to see the welts which covered my innocent skin. He quickly put on his cloak, took me to my boardinghouse, and showed the Laestrygonian[4] giantess the state I was in. Feigning astonishment, she blamed the maid. She had to elle sert à la maintenir, l'homme étant trop faible pour ne vouloir 9 être vertueux que pour plaire uniquement à soi même. Je crois fabuleux cet Amphiaraus qui vir bonus esse quam videri malebat. Je crois enfin qu'il n'y a pas d'honnête homme au monde sans quelque espèce de prétention; et je vais parler de la mienne.

Je prétends à l'amitié, à l'estime, et à la reconnaissance de mes lecteurs: A leur reconnaissance, si la lecture de mes mémoires les aura instruits et leur aura fait plaisir. A leur estime, s'ils m'auront trouvé, me rendant justice, plus de qualités que de défauts; et à leur amitié d'abord qu'ils m'en auront trouvé digne par la franchise, et la bonne foi avec laquelle je me livre sans nul déguisement tel que je suis à leur jugement.

Ils trouveront que j'ai toujours aimé la vérité avec tant de passion, que souvent j'ai commencé par mentir pour la faire entrer dans des têtes qui n'en connaissaient pas les charmes. Ils ne me condamneront pas quand ils me verront vider la bourse de mes amis pour en servir à satisfaire à mes caprices. Ils avaient des projets chimériques, et leur en faisant espérer la réussite, j'espérais moi même de les guérir de leur folie les désabusant. Je les trompais pour les rendre sages; et je ne me croyais pas coupable, car ce qui me faisait agir n'était pas un esprit d'avarice. J'employais à payer mes plaisirs des sommes destinées à parvenir à des possessions que la nature rend impossibles. Je me croirais coupable, si aujourd'hui je me trouvais riche. Je n'ai rien; j'ai tout jeté, et cela me console, et me justifie. C'était un argent destiné à des folies; j'en ai détourné l'usage le faisant servir aux miennes.

Si dans l'espoir que j'ai de plaire je me trompe, j'avoue que j'en serais fâché, mais non pas assez pour me repentir d'avoir écrit, car rien ne pourra faire que je ne me sois amusé. Cruel ennui! Ce ne peut être que par oubli que les auteurs des peines de l'enfer ne l'y placèrent.

J'avouerai cependant que je ne peux pas me défendre de la crainte du sifflet. Elle est trop naturelle pour que j'ose me vanter d'y être supérieur; et je suis bien loin de me consoler espérant que quand mes yield to the priest's insistence upon seeing my bed, and I was as astonished as he to see the filthiness of the sheets between which I had spent that cruel night. The accursed woman, still stoutly laying the blame on the maid, assured him that she would discharge her; but the maid, entering just then and unable to stomach the reprimand, told her to her face that the fault was hers, at the same time uncovering the beds of my three fellow boarders, which were just as dirty as mine. The mistress then gave her a slap on the face, to which the maid replied with a more vigorous one, and instantly took to her heels. The Doctor then departed, leaving me there and telling the Slavonian woman that he could not admit me to his school again until she should send me there as clean as the other pupils. I was then treated to a violent scolding, which she ended by telling me that if ever I made such a fuss over nothing again, she would turn me out of the house.

I felt completely bewildered; I was scarcely entering on conscious existence, I knew only the house in which I had been born and brought up, where cleanliness and a decent sufficiency were the rule; I found myself being ill-treated and scolded; I could not conceive that I was guilty. She flung a shirt in my face; and an hour later I saw a new maid changing the sheets, and we ate dinner.

My schoolmaster took particular pains to teach me. He had me sit at his own table, where, to convince him that I deserved the distinction, I applied myself to studying with all my power. At the end of a month I was writing so well that he set me to grammar.

The new life I was leading, the hunger I was forced to endure, and, above all, the air of Padua brought me such health as I had never conceived of before; but this very health made my hunger even more unendurable; I was as ravenous as a dog. I was growing visibly taller; I slept nine hours of the deepest sleep untroubled by any dream, except one in which I always seemed to be seated at a big table satisfying my cruel appetite. Pleasing dreams are worse than nightmares.

This ravenous hunger would finally have wasted me away if I had not made up my mind to steal and swallow anything edible I could lay my hands on when I was sure I was not observed. In a few days I ate some fifty smoked herring I found stored in a cupboard in the kitchen, to which I made my way in the dark of night, and all the sausages which were hanging in the chimney, raw and utterly indigestible as they were; while all the eggs I could find in the poultry-yard, scarcely laid and still warm, provided me with exquisite food. I even went so far as to steal food from the kitchen of my schoolmaster the Doctor. The Slavonian woman, in despair because she could not catch the thieves, discharged maid after maid. However, since I could not always find a chance to steal I was thin as a skeleton, mere skin and bones.

In five or six months I had made such rapid progress that the Doctor appointed me proctor of the school. My duties were to examine the written lessons of my thirty schoolmates, correct their mistakes, and report on them to the master with whatever comments in praise or blame they deserved. But my strictness did not last long. The lazy boys easily discovered how to mollify me. When their Latin was full of mistakes they won me over with roast cutlets and chickens and often gave me money. But I was not content with imposing a tax on the ignorant; I let my greed turn me into a tyrant. I refused my approval even to those who deserved it, when they tried to escape paying the levy I demanded. No longer able to stomach my injustice, they accused me to the master. Seeing me convicted of extortion, he dismissed me from my office. But my destiny was already about to end my cruel apprenticeship.

Taking me into his private room with him one day, the Doctor asked me if I was willing to do as he would suggest in order to leave the Slavonian woman and come to board with him. Finding me delighted by his proposal, he had me copy out three letters, of which I sent one to the Abate Grimani, the second to my friend Signor Baffo, and the third to my good grandmother. My mother was not in Venice at this period, and since my half year was about to end, there was no time to lose. In these letters I described all my sufferings, and prophesied my death if I were not rescued from the clutches of the Slavonian woman and put to board with my schoolmaster, who was willing to take me but who asked two zecchini a month.

Signor Grimani, instead of answering me, sent his friend Ottaviani to reprimand me for having let myself be inveigled. But Signor Baffo talked with my grandmother, who did not know how to write, and wrote me that in a few days I would find myself better off.

A week later that excellent woman, who loved me unfailingly to the day of her death, appeared just when I had sat down to dinner. She came in with the mistress. As soon as I saw her, I flung myself on her neck, unable to hold back my tears, in which she instantly joined. She sat down and took me on her lap. Thus encouraged, I gave her a detailed account of all my sufferings, in the presence of the Slavonian woman. Then, first showing her the beggarly table at which I was expected to find adequate nourishment, I took her to see my bed. I ended by imploring her to take me to dine with her, after six months of hunger and weakness. Undaunted, the Slavonian woman said only that she could not do more for the money she received. It was true. But who obliged her to keep a boardinghouse and so become the murderess of boys whom avarice put in her care and who needed to be properly fed?

My grandmother calmly told her to pack all my clothes in my trunk, for she was going to take me away. Delighted to see my silver table-service again, I quickly put it in my pocket. My joy was beyond words. For the first time I felt that contentment which obliges the heart of him who feels it to forgive, and his mind to forget, all the vexations which have led to it.

My grandmother took me to the inn where she was lodging, and where she ate almost nothing in her astonishment at the voracity with which I ate. Doctor Gozzi, to whom she sent word, appeared, and his presence prepossessed her in his favor. He was a handsome priest twenty-six years of age, plump, modest, and ceremoniously polite. Within a quarter of an hour they agreed on everything and, after paying over twenty-four zecchini, she was given a receipt for a year in advance; but she kept me with her for three days in order to outfit me as an abate[5] and have a wig made for me, since the filthy state of my hair made it necessary to cut it off.

The three days over, she insisted on herself settling me in the Doctor's house, so that she could entrust me to the good offices of his mother, who at once told her to send me, or buy me, a bed; but the Doctor saying that I could sleep with him in his, which was very wide, my grandmother thanked him profusely for his kind condescension. She left, and we saw her off as far as the burchiello in which she returned to Venice.

Doctor Gozzi's family consisted of his mother, who deeply respected him because, being born a peasant, she did not think herself worthy of having a son who was a priest, let alone a Doctor. She was ugly, old, and ill-tempered. The father was a shoemaker who worked all day and never spoke to anyone, even at table. He grew sociable only on holidays, which he spent in a tavern with his friends, returning home at midnight so drunk that he could not stand up and singing Tasso;[6] in this condition he could not bear to go to bed and became savage when anyone tried to make him. He had no discernment and no reasoning power except what wine gave him, to such a point that when fasting he was incapable of dealing with the simplest family matter. His wife said that he would never have married her if he had not been given a good breakfast before he went to the church.

Doctor Gozzi also had a sister thirteen years of age named Bettina,[7] who was pretty, lighthearted, and a great reader of romances. Her father and mother were forever scolding her for showing herself at the window too much, and the Doctor because of her fondness for reading. The girl pleased me at once, though I had no idea why. It was she who little by little kindled in my heart the first sparks of a feeling which later became my ruling passion.

Six months after I entered his house, the Doctor found himself without pupils. They all left because I was the sole object of his attentions. In consequence he resolved to establish a small boarding school for young boys; but two years went by before it became possible. During those two years he taught me all that he knew, which, to tell the truth, was very little, but enough to initiate me into all the branches of learning. He also taught me to play the violin, an art which I was able to turn to advantage on an occasion of which the reader will learn in its proper place. Without even a smattering of philosophy himself, he taught me the logic of the Peripatetics,[8] as well as cosmography according to the ancient system of Ptolemy,[9] at which I did nothing but scoff, challenging him with theories to which he could find no answers. His conduct, however, was irreproachable and, though no bigot, he was extremely strict in matters of religion; since everything was an article of faith for him, nothing presented any difficulties to his understanding. The Flood had been universal; before the disaster men had lived for a thousand years, God talked with them, Noah had built the ark in a hundred years, and the earth, suspended in air, remained motionless at the center of the universe, which God had created out of nothing. When I said, and proved to him, that the existence of nothing was absurd, he cut me short by telling me I was a fool. He liked a good bed, a pint of wine, and a cheerful household. He disliked wits and epigrams, and criticism because it easily turned to slander, and he laughed at the stupidity of people who spent time over newspapers, which, according to him, never told the truth and always said the same thing. He would say that nothing was as uncomfortable as uncertainty, and so he condemned thinking because it bred doubt.

His great passion was preaching, for which he was well qualified both by his figure and his voice. Hence his audience was composed entirely of women, though he was their sworn enemy. He did not look them in the face when he had to speak with them. According to him, the sin of the flesh was the greatest of all sins, and he became very angry when I told him it could only be the least. His sermons were stuffed with passages drawn from Greek authors, whom he quoted in Latin, and I one day told him that he should quote them in Italian, for Latin was no more comprehensible than Greek to the women who listened to him, telling their beads. My objection angered him, and from then on I did not dare remonstrate with him. He praised me to his friends as a prodigy because I had learned to read Greek all by myself without any other help than a grammar.

In Lent of the year 1736 my mother wrote to him that he would do her a favor if he would bring me to Venice for three or four days, since she had to go to Petersburg and wanted to see me before she left. This invitation gave him cause for thought, for he had never seen Venice nor good society, and he did not want to appear a novice in any respect. So we set out from Padua by the burchiello, accompanied by his whole family.

My mother received him with the ease of perfect good breeding, but as she was marvelously beautiful my poor master found himself in the very uncomfortable situation of having to converse with her yet not daring to look her in the face. As soon as she noticed this, she thought she would have a little fun with him. For my part, I attracted the attention of the entire company, who, having seen me almost an imbecile, were astonished to find that I had become more than presentable in the short space of two years. The Doctor was elated to see that all the credit was given to him. The first thing that shocked my mother was my blond wig, which stood out against my dark complexion and made the most crying contrast with my eyebrows and my black eyes. Upon her asking the Doctor why he did not let me wear my own hair, he answered that it was far easier for his sister to keep me clean this way. This provoked a laugh, after which he was asked if his sister was married. The laughter redoubled when, answering for him, I said that Bettina was the prettiest girl in our street, though she was only fourteen. My mother told the Doctor that she wanted to give his sister a very fine present, but on condition that she would take care of my own hair for me, and he gave her his promise. She immediately sent for a wigmaker, who brought me a wig which matched my coloring.

Everyone having sat down to cards, with the Doctor looking on, I went to see my brothers in my grandmother's room. Francesco showed me some architectural drawings, which I pretended to consider passable, and Giovanni showed me nothing; he struck me as stupid. The others were still in frocks.

At supper the Doctor, who was seated next to my mother, was extremely awkward. He would not have said a word if an English man of letters had not addressed him in Latin. He modestly replied that he did not understand English, whereupon there was a great burst of laughter. Signor Baffo saved the situation by telling us that the English read Latin in accordance with the rules for reading English. I made bold to say that they were as wrong as we should be if we read English as if we were reading Latin. The Englishman, having declared that my reasoning was prodigious, wrote down the following ancient distich and gave it to me to read:

Discite grammatici cur mascula nomina cunnus
Et cur femineum mentula nomen habet.

And why mentula [penis] is feminine.")[10]

After reading it aloud, I said that this time it was Latin. "We know that," said my mother, "but you must construe it." I answered that, instead of construing it, I would answer the question it put. After thinking for a little time, I wrote this pentameter: Disce quod a domino nomina servus habet ("It is because the slave takes his name from his master"). It was my first literary exploit, and I can say that it was at this moment that the seeds of my desire for the fame which comes from literature were sown in my soul, for the applause of the company set me on the pinnacle of happiness. The astonished Englishman, after remarking that no boy of eleven years had ever done as much, first embraced me several times and then made me a present of his watch. My mother's curiosity was aroused and she asked Signor Grimani what the verses meant; but since he understood them no better than she did, it was Signor Baffo who whispered a translation of them to her. Surprised at my knowledge, she could not resist an impulse to go and fetch a gold watch and give it to my master, whose inability to express the extremity of his gratitude to her turned the scene into high comedy. My mother, to save him from searching for a compliment to pay her, offered him her cheek. All that was now required was two kisses, than which nothing is simpler and means less in good society; but the poor man was so embarrassed that he would rather have died than give them to her. He retired with his head hanging, and was left in peace until we went to bed.

He waited until we were alone in our room before pouring forth his heart. He said it was a pity that he could not publish either the couplet or my answer in Padua.

"Why?"

"Because they are obscene. But your answer is magnificent. Let us go to bed and say no more about it. Your answer is a miracle, for it is impossible that you should have any knowledge of the subject matter, to say nothing of composing verses."

So far as the subject matter was concerned, I knew it in theory from having already read Meursius[11] in secret, precisely because the Doctor had forbidden me to; but he was right to be astonished that I could compose a verse, for he himself, though he had taught me prosody, had never been able to compose one. Nemo dat quod non habet ("No one can give what he does not possess") is a false axiom in moral science.[12] When we left four days later my mother gave me a package containing a present for Bettina, and the Abate Grimani gave me four zecchini to buy books. A week later my mother left for Petersburg.

At Padua my good master did nothing but talk of my mother, in season and out of season, for three or four months. But Bettina became extraordinarily attached to me when she found that the package contained five ells of black sendal [13] of the sort known as "lustring," and twelve pairs of gloves. She took care of my hair so well that in less than six months I was able to leave off wearing my wig. She came to comb my hair every day, and often when I was still in bed, saying that she did not have time to wait for me to dress. She washed my face and neck and chest, and gave me childish caresses which, since I was bound to consider them innocent, made me chide myself for letting them trouble me. As I was three years her junior, it seemed to me that she could not love me with any evil intent, and this made me angry at the evil which I felt in myself. When, sitting on my bed, she told me that I was putting on flesh and, to convince me, convinced herself of it with her own hands, she roused the most intense emotion in me. I did not stop her, for fear she would become aware of my susceptibility. When she told me that I had a soft skin, the tickling made me draw away, and I was put out with myself for not daring to do as much to her, but delighted that she could not guess that I wanted to. After washing me, she gave me the sweetest kisses, all the while calling me her dear child; but despite my wanting to, I did not dare to return them. When, finally, she started making fun of my timidity, I began to return them, and even to better purpose; but I stopped as soon as I felt stimulated to go to greater lengths; I would turn my head away, pretending to look for something, and she would leave. After she left I was in despair over not having followed my natural inclination, and astonished that Bettina could do all that she did to me without producing any effect upon herself, whereas only by the utmost effort could I keep from going further. I kept promising myself that I would change my way of behaving.

At the beginning of that autumn the Doctor took three boarding pupils, one of whom was fifteen years of age and named Candiani. In less than a month he seemed to me to be on the best of terms with Bettina. This discovery caused me a feeling of which until then I had had no idea, and which I did not analyze until some years later. It was neither jealousy nor indignation but a noble disdain, which I saw no reason to condemn. For as the coarse, ignorant, stupid, ill-mannered son of a farmer that he was, unable to compete with me in anything and having the advantage of me only in having reached the age of puberty, Candiani did not seem to me to deserve being favored over me; my budding self-esteem told me that I was his superior. I was possessed by a mingled feeling of scorn and pride, directed against Bettina, whom I loved without knowing it. She divined it from the manner in which I received her caresses when she came to my bed to comb my hair; I pushed away her hands, I did not respond to her kisses, and one day, piqued because I would not answer when she asked me why I had changed, she said, as if pitying me, that I was jealous of Candiani. The reproach seemed to me an insulting calumny; I told her that I thought Candiani worthy of her as she was of him; she departed smiling, but already hatching the only plan which could secure her revenge: she must make me jealous; but since to do that, she had to make me fall in love with her, this is how she set about it.

One morning she came to my bed bringing me a pair of white stockings she had knitted herself; after dressing my hair, she told me that she had to try them on me to see if she had made any mistakes and so guide herself in knitting me more. The Doctor had gone to say his mass. Putting on the stockings, she said that my thighs were dirty and at once began washing them without asking my leave.

I was ashamed to let her see me ashamed, though I never imagined that what happened would happen. Seated on my bed, Bettina carried her zeal for cleanliness too far, and her curiosity aroused a voluptuous feeling in me which did not cease until it could not become greater. Thus calmed, it occurred to me that I had committed a crime and I felt that I should ask her forgiveness. Expecting nothing of the sort, Bettina thought for a moment and then said that the fault was entirely hers, but that she would make sure it would not happen again. With that she left me to my own reflections.

They were cruel. It seemed to me that I had dishonored her, had betrayed the trust of her family, had violated the law of hospitality, and had committed the most hideous of crimes, a crime for which I could not atone except by marrying her, always provided that she could bring herself to marry such a shameless creature, who was utterly unworthy of her.

These reflections were followed by the blackest melancholy, which became more intense with every passing day, for Bettina had entirely ceased to visit my bed. For the first week I thought this decision of hers perfectly justified; and in a few more days my melancholy would have become perfect love, if her behavior toward Candiani had not infected my soul with the poison of jealousy, though I was very far from believing her guilty of the same crime she had committed with me.

Some of my reflections having convinced me that what she had done with me had been deliberate, I imagined that an access of repentance was preventing her from returning to my bed; this idea was flattering to me, for it led me to conclude that she was in love. Sick of all this reasoning, I decided to encourage her by writing. I wrote her a short letter calculated to set her mind at rest, whether she believed herself guilty, or suspected me of feelings the opposite of those demanded by her self-esteem. I thought my letter a masterpiece, and more than enough to make her adore me and give me the preference over Candiani, whom I considered a brute beast unworthy of making her hesitate between him and myself for a single instant. She answered me by word of mouth a half hour later, saying that she would come to my bed the next morning, but she did not come. I was furious, but that noon at the dinner table she astonished me by asking me if I would like to have her dress me up as a girl and go with her to a ball which our neighbor the physician Olivo was giving five or six days later. The entire table applauded the idea, and I consented. I foresaw the moment when a mutual explanation would make us the closest of friends, safe from being waylaid by any sensual weakness. But Fate had decided otherwise: here is what happened to prevent the ball from taking place and to turn the occasion into a veritable tragicomedy.

One of Doctor Gozzi's godfathers, an elderly man of means who resided in the country, had suffered a long illness; believing that his end was near, he sent a carriage, with a message begging him to come at once, together with his father, to be present at his deathbed and commend his soul to God. The old shoemaker instantly emptied a bottle, dressed, and set off with his son.

The moment I saw that they had gone, not having the patience to wait until the night of the ball, I found an opportunity to tell Bettina that I would leave the door from my bedroom to the hall open and would expect her as soon as the household had gone to bed. She answered that she would not fail to come. She slept on the ground floor in a small room divided from her father's bedroom only by a partition; since the Doctor was away, I was sleeping alone in the large bedroom. The three boarding pupils lived in a room near the cellar. So I had no fear that anything would go amiss. I was very happy to be so close to the moment for which I had longed.

No sooner had I retired to my room than I bolted my door, then opened the one giving on to the hall, so that Bettina had only to push it to come in. That done, I put out my candle without undressing.

We think situations of this sort are exaggerated when we read them in romances, but such is not the case. What Ariosto[14] says of Ruggiero waiting for Alcina is a masterly depiction from nature.

I waited until midnight more or less patiently; but when I saw two and three and four hours pass without her appearing, I became furious. The snow was falling in great flakes, but I was more nearly dead from anger than from the cold. An hour before dawn I decided to go downstairs without shoes, for fear of waking the dog, and post myself at the foot of the stairway four paces from the door which should have been unlocked if Bettina had gone out by it. I found it locked. It could only be locked from inside; I thought she might have fallen asleep, but to wake her I should have had to knock loudly and the dog would have barked. From this door to the door of her room was another ten or twelve paces. Overwhelmed by disappointment and unable to settle on any course, I sat down on the bottom step. A little before dawn, chilled to the bone, numb, and shivering, I decided to go back to my room, for if the maid had found me there she would have concluded that I had gone mad.

I stand up; but at the same instant I hear a noise inside. Sure that Bettina would appear, I go to the door; it opens; but instead of Bettina I see Candiani, who gives me such a kick in the belly that I find myself stretched out flat, half buried in the snow. After which he goes and shuts himself up in the room in which his bed stood beside those of his Feltrinian[15] schoolmates.

I spring up and start off to strangle Bettina, for at that moment nothing could have saved her from my fury; but I find the door locked. I give it a great kick, the dog starts barking, and I go back upstairs to my room, shut myself in, and lie down to restore my soul and my body, for I was worse than dead.

Deceived, humiliated, wronged, become an object of scorn to the happy and triumphant Candiani, I spent three hours ruminating the direst schemes of vengeance. Poisoning them both seemed to me nothing in this moment of misery. I conceived the base plan of going to the country and telling the Doctor everything. As I was only twelve years old my mind had not yet acquired the cold ability to lay heroic plans of vengeance fathered by the factitious sentiment of honor. I was only just beginning my apprenticeship in matters of this sort.

In this state of mind, I hear at the inner door to my room the hoarse voice of Bettina's mother imploring me to come down because her daughter is dying.

Aggrieved that she should die before I killed her, I rise, go downstairs, and find her in her father's bed in frightful convulsions, surrounded by the whole family, partly undressed, and rolling from side to side. She twisted, she writhed, hitting out at random with fists and feet, and escaping by violent jerks first from one then from another of those who were trying to hold her still.

With this scene before me, and full of the events of the night, I did not know what to think. I knew neither nature nor artifices, and I was astonished to find myself a cold spectator able to maintain my self-possession in the presence of two persons one of whom I intended to kill and the other to dishonor. At the end of an hour Bettina fell asleep. A midwife and the physician Olivo arrived at the same moment. The woman said that the seizure was hysterical; the doctor that the womb had nothing to do with it. He prescribed rest and cold baths. I laughed up my sleeve at them both, but said nothing; I knew that the girl's illness could only be the result of her nocturnal labors or of the fright that my meeting with Candiani must have given her. I determined to put off my revenge until Doctor Gozzi should arrive. I was far from believing that Bettina's illness was feigned, for I thought it impossible that she could possess so much strength.

Passing through Bettina's room to return to my own and seeing her pockets on the bed there, I was suddenly tempted to secure their contents. I find a letter, I see Candiani's handwriting, I go to my room to read it, astonished at the girl's imprudence, for her mother might have found it and, being unable to read, have given it to her son the Doctor. I was now persuaded that she had gone out of her mind. But what did I not feel when I read the following words! "As your father is away, there is no need for you to leave your door open as you did the other times. When I leave the table I will go to your room; you will find me there." After reflecting for a little, I was moved to laugh and, realizing that I had been made a perfect dupe, I believed I was cured of my love. I thought Candiani deserved my forgiveness and Bettina my scorn. I congratulated myself on having learned an excellent lesson for my life to come. I even admitted that Bettina had good reason to prefer Candiani, who was fifteen whereas I was still a child. But when I remembered the kick he had given me, I continued to bear him a grudge.

At noon we were dining in the kitchen because of the cold when Bettina fell into convulsions again. Everyone went running to her except myself. I quietly finished my dinner, then returned to my studies. At suppertime I found Bettina's bed in the kitchen beside her mother's, but I paid no attention to it, any more than I did to the noise which went on all night and the confusion next morning when she went into convulsions again.

Toward evening the Doctor returned with his father. Candiani, who feared that I would take vengeance, came to ask me what I intended to do, but he fled when he saw me coming toward him knife in hand. It did not occur to me for an instant to tell the Doctor the sordid story; such a project could take shape in my nature only during a moment of wrath. Irasci celerem tamen ut placabilis essem ("I become angry quickly, even as I am quickly appeased").[16]

The following morning the Doctor's mother interrupted our schooling to tell her son, after much beating around the bush, that she believed Bettina's illness was the result of a spell which a witch whom she knew must have put on her.

"That may well be; but we must be sure we are not mistaken. Who is this witch?"

"It is our old maidservant; and I have just made certain."

"How?"

"I barred my door with two broomsticks in a cross so that she had to uncross them if she wanted to come in; but when she saw them she turned back and came in by another door. It is obvious that if she were not a witch she would have uncrossed them."

"It is not so obvious, my dear Mother. Have the woman come here."

"Why," he asked her, "did you not go into the room this morning by the usual door?"

"I don't know what you mean."

"Did you not see the St. Andrew's cross[17] on the door?"

"What kind of a cross?"

"It is no use your pretending not to know," said his mother. "Where did you spend last Thursday night?"

"With my niece, who has just had a baby."

"No, no. You went to the witches' Sabbath, for you are a witch. And you have bewitched my daughter."

At that the poor woman spat in her face, and the Doctor came running to hold his mother, who had raised her cane to give her a beating. But he had to run after the maid, who went down the stairs shouting to rouse the neighbors. He calmed her by giving her some money, then got together his ecclesiastical paraphernalia to exorcise his sister and find out if she was really possessed by a devil. The newness of these mysteries captured all my attention. I thought all these people either insane or idiots. I could not picture devils in Bettina's body without laughing. When we approached her bed, her breath seemed to fail, and her brother's exorcisms did not restore it. The physician Olivo appeared and asked if he was in the way; the Doctor answered that he was not if he had faith. The physician then departed, saying that he had faith only in the miracles of the Gospels. The Doctor returned to his room and when I was alone with Bettina, I whispered these words into her ear: "Take courage, get well, and count on my silence." She turned her head away without answering me, and spent the rest of the day without convulsions. I thought that I had cured her, but the next day the convulsions went to her brain. In her delirium she uttered words in Greek and Latin, after which no one doubted the nature of her illness. Her mother went out and returned an hour later with the most celebrated exorcist in Padua. He was an extremely ugly Capuchin[18] monk, named Fra Prospero da Bovolenta.

When he appeared, Bettina burst out laughing and assailed him with the most deadly insults, which delighted everyone present, since only the devil was bold enough to address a Capuchin in this fashion; but the Capuchin, hearing himself called an ignorant, stinking impostor, fell to hitting Bettina with a great crucifix, saying that he was beating the devil. He only stopped when he saw her ready to throw a chamberpot at his head, a thing which I would greatly have liked to see. "If he who has offended you with words," she said to him, "is the devil, strike him with yours, you donkey; and if it is I, learn to respect me, you clod; and be gone." At this I saw Doctor Gozzi blush.

But the Capuchin, armed from head to foot, after reading a terrible exorcism, commanded the evil spirit to tell him its name.

"My name is Bettina."

"No, for that is the name of a baptized girl."

"So you think a devil must have a masculine name? Know, ignorant Capuchin, that a devil is an angel without sex. But since you believe that he who speaks to you through my lips is a devil, promise to tell me the truth and I promise to yield to your exorcisms."

"Very well, I promise to tell you the truth."

"Do you think you are wiser than I am?"

"No; but I believe I am stronger in the name of the most holy Trinity and by the power of my sacred office."

"Then if you are stronger, stop me from telling the truth about you. You are vain of your beard; you comb it ten times a day and you would not cut half of it off to make me depart from this body. Cut it off and I swear I will depart from it."

"Father of lies, I will double your sufferings."

"I defy you to do that."

Bettina then burst out laughing so hard that I guffawed; but the Capuchin, seeing me, told the Doctor that I had no faith and he must put me out of the room. I left, telling him that he had guessed right; but I still had time to see Bettina spit on his hand when he held it out to her and told her to kiss it.

Here was this incredibly talented girl, confounding the Capuchin, yet no one was surprised because all her words were ascribed to the devil! I could not imagine what her purpose was.

After dining with us and uttering a hundred imbecilities, the Capuchin went back to the room to bestow his blessing on the possessed girl, who greeted him with a glass of some black liquid given her by the apothecary, which she flung in his face, and Candiani, who was standing beside the monk, received his share, which pleased me immensely. Bettina was right to take advantage of this moment when all that she did was attributed to the devil. As he left, Father Prospero told the Doctor that the girl was undoubtedly possessed, but that he must find another exorcist, since God did not see fit to grant him the grace of delivering her.

After he was gone Bettina spent four hours in perfect quiet and surprised us all by coming to the table to sup with us. After assuring her father, her mother, and her brother that she felt perfectly well, she told me that the ball was to take place the next day and that she would come in the morning to dress my hair like a girl's. I thanked her and told her that she had been very ill and ought to take great care of herself. She went off to bed, and we remained at table, talking of nothing but her.

When I went to my room I found the following note in my nightcap, which I answered when I saw that the Doctor was asleep. "Either come to the ball with me dressed as a girl, or I will show you a sight that will make you cry."

Here is my answer: "I will not go to the ball, for I have firmly resolved to avoid every chance of being alone with you. As for the unhappy sight with which you threaten me, I believe you have wits enough to keep your word; but I implore you to spare my heart, for I love you as if you were my sister. I have forgiven you, dear Bettina, and I wish to forget everything. Here is a note which you should be delighted to have in your hands again. You see what a risk you ran by leaving it in your pocket on your bed. My returning it to you must convince you of my friendship."

CHAPTER III

NOT knowing into whose hands her note had fallen, Bettina must have been in despair, so that I could not give her a surer proof of my friendship than to allay her anxiety; but my generosity, though it delivered her from one distress, was only to cause her a greater. She knew that her secret was out. Candiani's note showed that she received him every night: so her lying story, which she had perhaps invented to deceive me, was now useless. I wanted to free her from this embarrassing situation. In the morning I went to her bed; and I gave her Candiani's note with my answer.

The girl's intelligence had won her my esteem; I could no longer despise her. I regarded her as a creature led astray by her own temperament. She loved the male sex; the only harm in it was the consequences for her. Believing that I saw the matter in its true light, I had decided to act as a youth who could reason, not as a lover. It was her part to blush, not mine. The only thing I was still curious about was whether the Feltrinians had slept with her too. These were Candiani's two schoolmates.

Bettina pretended all day to be in the happiest frame of mind. In the evening she dressed for the ball; but suddenly an indisposition, whether feigned or real, made her take to her bed. The whole household was alarmed. For my part, since I knew everything, I expected new and even more lamentable scenes. I had gained an advantage over her which her self-esteem could not tolerate. Yet despite such excellent schooling before I reached adolescence, I continued to be the dupe of women until I was sixty years of age. Twelve years ago, if my guardian Genius had not intervened to help me, I would have married a silly girl with whom I had fallen in love in Vienna. Today I believe I am safe from such follies; but alas! I regret it.

The next morning the whole household was grief-stricken because the demon that possessed Bettina had conquered her reason. The Doctor told me that among her ravings were blasphemies, from which it followed that she must be possessed, for it was impossible that a girl who was merely insane would have attacked Father Prospero as she had. He resolved to put her in the hands of Father Mancia. This was a celebrated Jacobin,[1] or Dominican,[2] exorcist, who was said never to have failed with a bewitched girl.

It was a Sunday. Bettina had eaten a good dinner, and had been out of her head all day. Toward midnight her father arrived at the house, singing Tasso and so drunk that he could not stand. He went to his daughter's bedside and, after kissing her fondly, told her that she was not mad. She answered that he was not drunk.

"You are possessed, my dear daughter."

"Yes, Father; and only you can cure me."

"Very well! I am ready."

And he becomes the theologian; he reasons on the power of faith, and on the power of the paternal blessing; he throws off his cloak; he takes a crucifix in one hand, he puts the other on his daughter's head, and begins talking to the devil in such a style that even his stupid, gloomy, ill-tempered wife cannot but shout with laughter for once. Of all who were present, only the two actors in the scene did not laugh, and this was what made it so amusing. I admired Bettina, who, naturally inclined to laugh at anything and everything, managed to maintain the utmost gravity. Doctor Gozzi was laughing too, but trying to put an end to the farce, for he considered that his father's absurdities were so many profanations against the sacredness of exorcisms. The exorcist finally went off to bed, saying that he was sure the demon would leave his daughter in peace all that night.

The next morning, just as we were getting up from table, Father Mancia makes his appearance. The Doctor, followed by the entire family, conducted him to his sister's bedside. As for me, I was so absorbed in watching and studying the monk that I scarcely knew where I was. Here is his portrait.

His stature was tall and majestic, his age about thirty years, his hair was blond, his eyes blue. His features were those of the Apollo Belvedere,[3] except that they expressed neither triumph nor presumption. Dazzlingly white, his pallid complexion intensified the redness of his lips, which disclosed his fine teeth. He was neither thin nor fat, and the sadness of his countenance made it the sweeter. His movements were slow, his manner timid, which suggested an extreme modesty of mind.

When we entered, Bettina was, or was pretending to be, asleep. Father Mancia began by taking an aspergillum and sprinkling her with lustral water. She opened her eyes, looked at the monk, and instantly closed them; then she opened them again, looked at him more closely, turned over on her back, let her arms drop, and with her head prettily inclined, sank into a sleep than which nothing could have appeared sweeter. The exorcist, who was standing, produced his service book, a stole which he put round his neck, and a reliquary which he placed on the sleeping girl's bosom. Then, with a saintly look, he asked us to kneel and pray to God to tell him if the patient was possessed or was suffering from a natural illness. He left us kneeling for half an hour, during which he kept reading in a low voice. Bettina did not stir.

Tired, I suppose, of playing this role, he asked the Doctor to hear him in private. They entered the bedroom, from which they emerged a quarter of an hour later, summoned by a great burst of laughter from the demented girl, who no sooner saw them reappear than she turned her back on them. Father Mancia smiled, dipped the aspergillum in the holy water pot several times, sprinkled us all generously, and departed.

The Doctor said that he would come back the next morning, and that he had undertaken to deliver her within three hours if she was possessed, but that he promised nothing if she was insane. Her mother said she was sure he would deliver her, and she thanked God for having granted her the grace of seeing a saint before she died. Nothing was more charming than Bettina's madness the next morning. She began by saying the wildest things a poet could invent, and did not stop upon the appearance of the exorcist, who after enjoying them for a quarter of an hour armed himself from head to foot and asked us to leave the room. He was instantly obeyed. The door was left open, but that made no difference. Who would have dared to go in? For three hours we heard nothing but the most dismal silence. At noon he called us, and we went in. There was Bettina, dejected but perfectly quiet, while the monk picked up his gear. He left, saying that he had hope and asking the Doctor to send him news of her. Bettina dined in bed, ate supper at the table, and was well-behaved the next day; but now for what happened to make me certain that she was neither insane nor possessed.

It was the day before the eve of the Purification of Our Lady.[4] The Doctor always had us receive communion at the parish church; but for confession he took us to Sant'Agostino, a church in which the Jacobins of Padua officiated. At table he told us to prepare ourselves to go to confession there on the next morning but one. His mother said, "You should all go to confess to Father Mancia so that you can be absolved by such a holy man. I shall go to him too." Candiani and the Feltrinians agreed; I said nothing.

I was distressed by the plan; but I dissimulated, determined to prevent its execution. I believed in the secrecy of confession, and I could certainly not have made one that was false; but knowing that I was free to choose my confessor, I would never have been so stupid as to go and tell Father Mancia what had happened to me with a girl whom he would instantly have known could be none other than Bettina. I was certain that Candiani would tell him everything, and for this I was very sorry.

Early the next morning she came to my bed to bring me a neckband, and secretly handed me this letter:

"Hate me for living; but respect my honor, and a shadow of peace for which I hope. None of you must go to confession to Father Mancia tomorrow. You are the only one who can frustrate the plan, and you do not need to have me tell you how. I shall see if it is true that you feel some friendship for me."

It is beyond belief how sorry I felt for the poor girl when I read her note. Nevertheless, I replied as follows: "I understand that despite all the inviolable laws of confession your mother's plan cannot but alarm you; but I cannot see how, in order to frustrate it, you should count on me rather than on Candiani, who has declared his approval of it. All I can promise you is that I will not go with the others; but I have no power over your lover. It is you who must speak to him."

Here is the answer she handed me: "I have not spoken to Candiani again since the fatal night that made me wretched; I will not speak to him again, even if my speaking to him could restore my happiness. It is to you alone that I wish to owe my life and my honor."

I thought the girl more astonishing than any of those whom the romances I had read had portrayed as wonders. It seemed to me that she was deceiving me with unparalleled effrontery. I saw that she was trying to bind me in her chains again; and though I had no wish for them I resolved to perform the generous act of which she thought that I alone was capable. She felt sure she would succeed; but in what school had she learned to know the human heart so well? By reading romances. It may be that reading some romances causes the ruin of many girls; but it is certain that reading good ones teaches good manners and the practice of the social virtues.

So, having resolved to show the girl all the kindness of which she believed me capable, when we were about to go to bed I told the Doctor that my conscience obliged me to ask him to excuse me from going to confession to Father Mancia, and that I wished not to do differently from my schoolmates. He answered that he understood my reasons and that he would take us all to Sant' Antonio.[5] I kissed his hand. So the matter was settled, and at noon I saw Bettina come to the table with satisfaction painted on her countenance.

An open chilblain obliging me to stay in bed, and the Doctor having gone to church with all my schoolmates, leaving Bettina alone in the house, she came and sat on my bed. I was expecting this. I saw that the moment for having things out had come, and, all in all, I was not sorry.

She began by asking me if I minded her having seized the opportunity to speak to me. "No," I answered, "for you give me the opportunity to tell you that, since my feeling for you is only one of friendship, you can rest assured that from henceforth nothing I shall do can be of a nature to trouble you. So you may do whatever you please. For me to act otherwise, I should have to be in love with you; and I am that no longer. You stifled the seed of a beautiful passion in an instant. I was scarcely back in my room after the kick Candiani gave me, before I began to hate you, then I despised you, then you became indifferent to me, and finally my indifference vanished when I saw the powers of mind you possess. I have become your friend, I forgive your weaknesses, and having accustomed myself to thinking of you as you are, I have conceived the most extraordinary esteem for your intelligence. I was its dupe, but no matter: it exists, it is amazing, divine, I admire it, I love it, and it seems to me that the homage I owe it is to cherish the purest friendship for her who possesses it. Pay me in the same coin. Truth, sincerity, and no tricks. So put an end to all your nonsense, for you have already won from me all that you could ask. The mere thought of love is repugnant to me, for I can love only if I am sure of being loved without a rival. You are at liberty to attribute my stupid fastidiousness to my age; but it cannot be otherwise. You wrote me that you no longer speak to Candiani, and if I am the cause of your breaking off with him, I am sorry, believe me. Your honor demands that you try to patch things up with him; and in future I must be careful not to give him the slightest grounds for taking offense. Consider, too, that if you made him fall in love with you by seducing him in the same way, you have committed two wrongs, for it is possible that if he loves you, you have made him unhappy."

"All that you have said," Bettina answered, "is founded on a false assumption. I do not love Candiani, and I never loved him. I hated him, and I hate him, because he has deserved my hatred, and I shall convince you of it despite the appearances that speak against me. As for seduction, I beg you to spare me that base reproach. You, too, must consider that if you had not first seduced me I would never have done what I have deeply repented of doing for reasons which you do not know and which I will now explain to you. The sin I committed is great only because I did not foresee the harm it could do me in the inexperienced mind of a creature as ungrateful as yourself, who dares to reproach me with it."

Bettina wept. What she had just told me was plausible, and flattering; but I had seen too much. In addition, what she had shown me her mind was capable of made me sure that she intended to deceive me, and that her maneuver was only the consequence of her self-esteem, which would not allow her unprotestingly to accept a victory on my side which was too humiliating to her.

Not to be shaken from my idea, I answered that I believed all that she had just told me concerning the state of her heart before the little game which had made me fall in love with her; and so I promised that in future I would spare her the name of seducer. "But admit," I said, "that the violence of your flame was only momentary and that only a faint breath sufficed to put it out. Your virtue, which did not leave the path of duty except for a single hour, and which at once regained all its empire over your erring senses, is also worthy of some praise. In an instant you who adored me became insensible to all my sufferings, which I did not fail to communicate to you. It remains for me to learn how this virtue could be so precious to you, when Candiani shipwrecked it every night in his arms."

"You have now come," she said (giving me the triumphant look of one who is confident of victory), "to just the point to which I wanted to bring you. That is what I had no way of communicating to you, and what I could never tell you myself because you refused the meeting I asked of you for no other purpose than to acquaint you with the truth.

"Candiani," she went on, "declared his love to me a week after he entered our house. He asked me to consent to his father's asking my hand in marriage for him as soon as he should have finished his studies. I answered that I did not yet know him well and that I had no inclination in the matter, and I begged him not to speak of it again. He pretended to have calmed down; but soon afterward I saw that he was far from calm one day when he asked me to come and dress his hair sometimes. When I answered that I did not have time, he said that you were luckier than he was. I laughed at the reproach and at his suspicions, for everyone in the house knew that I looked after you.

"It was two weeks after I refused him the pleasure of dressing his hair that I found myself spending an hour with you in the trifling which I need not name and which, as was to be expected, kindled a fire which gave you ideas you had never had before. As for me, I was very happy; I loved you and, having abandoned myself to desires which were natural to my passion, no remorse could trouble me. I could not wait to be with you the next morning; but the same day after supper the first moment of my suffering arrived. Candiani slipped this note into my hands, together with this letter, which I later hid in a hole in the wall, intending to show them to you when occasion served."

Bettina then handed me the letter and the note. Here is the note: "Either let me visit you in your room no later than tonight by leaving the door onto the courtyard ajar, or consider how you can explain things tomorrow to the Doctor, to whom I shall give the letter of which you will find a copy enclosed."

The letter contained the statement of a base and enraged informer, and was such that it could have the most unfortunate consequences. It informed the Doctor that his sister spent the mornings with me in a criminal relationship while he was away saying mass, and promised to give him such details of the matter as would leave him no room for doubt.

"After giving it the consideration," Bettina continued, "which the situation demanded, I decided to grant the monster a hearing. I left the door ajar and waited for him with a stiletto of my father's in my pocket. Since my room is separated from my father's bedroom only by a partition, I waited for him at the door so that he could speak to me there.

"To my first question, concerning the calumny contained in the letter he threatened to give to my brother, he answered that it was not a calumny since he had himself seen our interview that morning through a hole which he had bored, directly above your bed, in the floor of the attic, and at which he stationed himself as soon as I entered your room. He concluded by saying that he would reveal all to my brother and my mother if I persisted in refusing him the same favors which he was sure I had bestowed upon you. After heaping the blackest insults upon him in my righteous anger, and calling him a coward, a spy, and a slanderer, for he could have seen nothing but childish trifling, I ended by swearing that he need not flatter himself that any threats of his could reduce me to showing him the same favor. He then fell to begging my pardon over and over and insisting that my coldness alone was responsible for the step he had taken, which he would never have resolved on except for the passion I had inspired in him, which made him wretched. He admitted that his letter might be slanderous and that he had played the part of a traitor, and he assured me that he would never use force to obtain favors which he wished to owe only to the constancy of his love. I felt obliged to tell him that I might love him later on and to promise him that I would no longer go to your bed when the Doctor was away, and I sent him away satisfied yet not daring to ask me for a single kiss, when I promised him that we could talk from time to time in the same place.

"I went to bed in despair at the thought that I could neither see you when my brother was away, nor explain the reason to you for fear of the consequences. Three weeks went by in this way, and what I suffered is beyond belief. For you kept urging me and I had to keep disappointing you. I even feared the moment when I should find myself alone with you, for I was certain that I could not help telling you the reason for the change in my behavior. Add that at least once a week I had to go to the door into the alley to talk with the scoundrel and calm his impatience with words!

"I finally resolved to end my martyrdom, when I found that you were threatening me too. I asked you to go to the ball dressed as a girl; I was going to reveal the whole intrigue to you and leave you to find a way of setting things right. Going to the ball with you was bound to offend Candiani, but I had made up my mind. You know how my plan miscarried. My brother's departure with my father gave you both the same idea. I had promised to go to your room before I received Candiani's letter in which he did not ask me to meet him but informed me that he would be in my room. I had time neither to tell him that I had reasons for forbidding him to go there, nor to warn you that I would not come to you until after midnight, as I expected to do, for I was sure that after an hour's talk I could send the wretch back to his room; but the plan he had conceived and which he insisted on telling me took much longer. I could not get rid of him. I had to listen and put up with him all night long. His complaints and his exaggerated account of his unhappiness were unending. He complained that I would not consent to a plan which, if I loved him, I should have welcomed. His scheme was that I should run away with him in Holy Week to Ferrara, where he has an uncle who would have taken us in and could easily have made his father listen to reason, whereupon we should be happy all the rest of our lives. My objections, his replies, the details of the plan, his explanations of how all difficulties could be smoothed away, took all night. My heart bled, thinking of you; but I have nothing to reproach myself with; and nothing happened which can make me unworthy of your regard. You can refuse it to me only if you believe that all I have just told you is a lie; but you will be wrong and you will be unjust. If I could have brought myself to make sacrifices which are due only to love, I could have got the traitor out of my room an hour after he entered it; but I would have chosen death rather than that horrible expedient. Could I guess that you were outside, exposed to the wind and the snow? We were both to be pitied, but I more than you. All this was written in the heavens to make me lose both my health and my reason, which I possess only from time to time, without ever being sure when the convulsions will seize me again. They say that I am bewitched and that demons have taken control of me. I know nothing about such things; but if it is true, I am the most wretched girl alive.''

Here she stopped speaking and gave free rein to her tears and moans. The story she had told me was possible, but it was not believable.

> Forse era vero, ma non, però credibile
> ("Perhaps it was true, but it did not seem > credible to anyone in his right mind")

and I was in my right mind. What caused my emotion was her tears, whose reality left me no room for doubt. I attributed them to the strength of her self-esteem. I needed to be convinced before I would yield; and what conviction requires is not the plausible but the obvious. I could not believe either in Candiani's restraint or in Bettina's patience or in its having taken seven hours to discuss a single subject. Nevertheless, I found a kind of pleasure in accepting as good coin all the counterfeit money she had passed off on me.

After drying her tears, she fixed her beautiful eyes on mine, thinking to read in them the visible tokens of her victory; but I surprised her by bringing up a point which she had cleverly glossed over in her defense. Rhetoric makes use of nature's secrets only as painters do who try to imitate her. Their most beautiful productions are false.

The girl's quick mind, unrefined by study, sought to have the advantage of being considered pure and artless; it was conscious of this, and it made use of this consciousness to further its ends; but such a mind had given me too strong an impression of its cleverness.

"Come now, my dear Bettina!" I said, "your whole story has touched me; but how can you expect me to believe that your convulsions and your wild ravings are natural, to say nothing of the demoniac symptoms you exhibited only too appropriately during the exorcisms, although you very sensibly admit that on this point you have doubts?"

At these words she remained silent for five or six minutes, during which she stared at me fixedly; then, casting down her eyes, she began to cry, interrupting her sobs from time to time only with the words, "Poor me!" Finding this situation trying, I finally asked her what I could do for her. She answered in a woebegone voice that if my heart did not prompt me she did not know what to ask of me. "I thought," she said, "that I could regain the power over your heart which I have lost. I am no longer an object of concern to you. Continue to treat me harshly and to believe that I am feigning sufferings which are real, of which you are the cause, and which you are now increasing. You will repent of it later, and when you repent you will not be happy."

She was about to leave; but the thought that she was capable of anything frightened me. I called her back and said that the only way in which she could regain my love was to spend a month without convulsions and without needing the ministrations of the handsome Father Mancia. "That does not depend upon me," she answered; "but what do you mean by calling the Jacobin handsome? Could you suppose—" "Not at all, not at all; I suppose nothing, for to suppose anything I should have to be jealous; but I will tell you that the way your devils prefer the handsome monk's exorcisms to those of the ugly Capuchin may well give rise to remarks which do you no honor. But you must act as you think best."

She left, and a quarter of an hour later the whole household returned. After supper the maid, without my questioning her, told me that Bettina had gone to bed with violent chills after having her bedstead moved into the kitchen beside her mother's. This fever might be natural, but I doubted it. I was certain that she would never have made up her mind to recover, for that would give me too good a reason for believing that she was also deceiving me in regard to the supposed innocence of her relations with Candiani. I decided that her having her bedstead taken to the kitchen was another artifice of the same sort.

The next morning the physician Olivo, finding a high fever, told the Doctor that it would bring on incoherence, but that her ravings would come from the fever, not from devils. And in fact Bettina was delirious all day; but the Doctor, having gone over to the physician's opinion, paid no attention to his mother's protests and did not send for the Jacobin. On the third day the fever was even higher, and spots on the skin suggested smallpox, which broke out on the fourth day. Candiani and the two Feltrinians, who had not had it, were immediately sent to lodge elsewhere, so that I, who had no need to fear it, was left alone. Poor Bettina was so covered with the pestilential spots that by the sixth day it was impossible to see her skin anywhere on her body. Her eyes closed, all her hair had to be cut off, and her life was despaired of when her mouth and throat were found to be so full of spots that nothing but a few drops of honey could be introduced into her esophagus. Her only visible movement was now her breathing. Her mother never left her bedside, and I was admired when I brought my table and my notebooks there too. The girl had become a frightful object; her head was bigger by a third; her nose had vanished, and her sight was feared for even if she should recover. What I found extremely unpleasant, but bore with firmness, was her stinking sweat.

On the ninth day the parish priest came and gave her absolution and extreme unction, then he said that he left her in the hands of God. Throughout this sad scene the dialogues between Bettina's mother and the Doctor made me laugh. She wanted to know if the devil that possessed her could even now give her a fit of madness, and what would become of the devil if Bettina should die, for she did not think him fool enough to remain in such a disgusting body. She asked if he could take possession of the poor girl's soul. The poor Doctor, whose theology was Ubiquitarian, answered all her questions by statements in which there was not even a glimmer of common sense and which only confused the poor woman more and more.

The tenth and eleventh days it was feared that she would die at any moment. All her pustules had turned black and were discharging with a stench which made the air unbreathable; no one could bear up under it except myself, who was distressed by the poor creature's condition. It was in this terrible state that she awoke in me all the affection which I showed her after her recovery.

On the thirteenth day, when her fever had completely subsided, she began thrashing about because of an intolerable itching, which no medicine could more effectively have soothed than these potent words, which I repeated to her from minute to minute: "Remember, Bettina, that you are going to get well; but if you dare scratch yourself, you will be so ugly that no one will ever love you again." I challenge all the physicians in the world to find a more powerful deterrent to itching than this in the case of a girl who knows that she has been beautiful and is in danger of becoming ugly through her own fault if she scratches.

At last she opened her beautiful eyes, her bed was changed, and she was carried to her room. An abscess which developed on her neck kept her in bed until Easter. She infected me with eight or ten pustules, three of which have left an indelible mark on my face; they stood me in good stead with Bettina, who now realized that only I deserved her affection. Her skin was left covered with red spots, which did not disappear until a year had passed. She loved me afterwards without any feigning, and I loved her without ever plucking a flower which fate, supported by prejudice, had reserved for marriage. But what a wretched marriage! Two years later she became the wife of a shoemaker named Pigozzo, a base scoundrel who brought her to poverty and misery. Her brother the Doctor had to take care of her. Fifteen years later he took her with him to Val San Giorgio,[7] of which he was appointed archpriest. When I went to see him eighteen years ago I found Bettina old, ill, and dying. She expired before my eyes in the year 1776, twenty-four hours after my arrival. I shall speak of her death in its proper place.

At this same time my mother came back from Petersburg, where the Empress Anna Ivanovna[8] did not find the Italian comedy sufficiently amusing. The whole troop was already back in Italy and my mother had made the journey with Carlino Bertinazzi, Harlequin,[9] who died at Paris in the year 1783. As soon as she reached Padua she sent word of her arrival to Doctor Gozzi, who at once took me to the inn at which she was staying with her traveling companion. We ate dinner there, and before leaving she presented him with a fur and gave me a lynx-skin to give to Bettina. Six months later she had me come to Venice, in order to see me again before she left for Dresden, where she had accepted a lifetime engagement in the service of the Elector of Saxony Augustus III, King of Poland. She took with her my brother Giovanni, who was then eight years old and who wept desperately when they left, which led me to suspect that he was not especially intelligent, for there was nothing tragic about the departure. He was the only one of us who owed all that he became in life to our mother, though he was not her favorite.

After this period I spent another year in Padua studying law, of which I became a Doctor at the age of sixteen,[10] my thesis in civil law having been "de testamentis" ("concerning wills") and in canon law utrum hebrei possint construere novas Synagogas ("whether Jews may build new synagogues"). My vocation was to study medicine so that I could practice the profession, for which I felt a strong inclination, but my wish was disregarded; I was forced to study law, for which I felt an unconquerable aversion. It was alleged that the only way I could make my fortune was to become an advocate and, still worse, an ecclesiastical advocate, because I was considered to be gifted in speaking. If the question had been given due consideration I should have been allowed to do as I wished and become a physician, in which profession quackery is even more effective than it is in legal practice. I practiced neither profession; and it could not be otherwise. Perhaps this is why I have never wished either to employ advocates when I happened to have legal claims to present in court or to call in physicians when I was ill. Legal squabbling ruins more families than it supports; and those who die killed by physicians are far more numerous than those who are cured. It follows that mankind would be far less wretched without these two breeds.

Having to attend the University—which is called the Bo[11]—to hear the professors lecture had made it necessary for me to go about alone, and I was delighted, for until then I had never considered myself a free man. Wanting to enjoy to the full the freedom of which I found myself in possession, I made as many undesirable acquaintances as possible among the notorious students. The most notorious cannot but be those who are the greatest libertines, gamblers, frequenters of places of ill repute, drunkards, debauchees, seducers of decent girls, given to violence, false, and incapable of entertaining the slightest virtuous feeling. It was in the company of fellows of this kind that I began to know the world by studying it in the harsh book of experience.

The theory of behavior is useful to the life of man only as the index is useful to him who goes through it before reading the book itself; when he has read it, all that he has learned is the subject matter. Such is the moral teaching which we receive from the discourses, the precepts, and the stories we are treated to by those who bring us up. We listen to it all attentively; but when we have an opportunity to profit by the various advice we have been given, we become possessed by a desire to see if the thing will turn out to be what we have been told it will; we do it, and we are punished by repentance. What recompenses us a little is that in such moments we consider ourselves wise and hence entitled to teach others. Those whom we teach do exactly as we did, from which it follows that the world always stands still or goes from bad to worse.

Actas parentum, pejor avis, tulit nos nequiores mox daturos progeniem vitiosiorem ("The generation of our parents, worse than that of our grandparents, has created us worse again and destined soon to bring forth yet more vicious progeny").[12]

So it was that Doctor Gozzi's permission to go out by myself put me in the way of learning several truths of which up to that time I was not only ignorant but of which I did not even suspect the existence. Upon my appearance the old hands descended on me and sounded me out. Finding me inexperienced in everything, they obliged me to learn by making me fall into every trap. They made me play cards, and when they had won the little money I had they made me lose on my word, and then taught me to engage in shady dealings in order to pay up. I began to know what it was to be in trouble. I learned to be wary of all those who praise a man to his face, and never to count on the offers of those who flatter. I learned to live with brawlers, whose company must be avoided if one is not to be forever on the verge of destruction. As for professional prostitutes, I did not fall into their snares because I found none of them as pretty as Bettina; but I could not keep myself from desiring the kind of glory whose source is a courage which contemns life.

In those days the students of Padua enjoyed very large privileges. They were abuses which their antiquity had made legal; this is the original nature of almost all privileges. They differ from prerogatives. The fact is that in order to keep their privileges in force the students committed crimes. The guilty were not punished according to the rigor of the law, for the interest of the State could not allow such severity to diminish the number of students who flocked to this famous University from every part of Europe. The principle of the Venetian government[13] was to pay very high stipends to professors of great renown and to let those who came to hear their lectures live in the utmost freedom. The students were responsible only to a head of the student body called the "Syndic."[14] He was a foreign gentleman who was obliged to maintain a registry and to answer to the government for the behavior of the students. He had to give them up to justice when they broke the laws, and the students accepted his decisions because when they had a shadow of justification he also defended them. They refused, for example, to allow the customs officers to search their luggage, and the ordinary sbirri[15] would never have dared to arrest a student; they carried whatever forbidden arms they pleased; they freely seduced girls of decent family whose parents could not keep them under supervision; they frequently disturbed the public peace with nocturnal pranks: in short, they were a set of unbridled youths who asked nothing but to satisfy their whims, amuse themselves, and laugh.

In those days it happened that a sbirro entered a coffeehouse where there were two students. One of them ordered him to leave, the sbirro disregarded the order, the student fired a pistol at him and missed, but the sbirro returned the fire and wounded the student, then took to his heels. The students gathered at the Bo and, dividing up into groups, went hunting for sbirri in order to avenge the insult by massacring them; but in one encounter two students were killed. The entire body of students then assembled and swore never to lay down their arms until there were no more sbirri in Padua. The government intervened, and the Syndic undertook to persuade the students to lay down their arms if atonement were made, since the sbirri were in the wrong. The sbirro who had wounded the student was hanged, and peace was made; but during the week before the peace, since all the students were going about Padua divided into patrols, I did not want to be less courageous than the rest, no matter what the Doctor said. Armed with pistols and a carbine I went out with my fellow students every day, searching for the enemy. I was extremely disappointed that the troop of which I was a member never came upon a single sbirro. When the war was over the Doctor laughed at me; but Bettina admired my courage.

Reluctant to appear poorer than my new friends in this new life, I began spending more than I could afford. I sold or pawned all that I possessed, and contracted debts which I could not repay. These were my first vexations, and the most painful that a young man can experience.

I wrote to my good grandmother for help; but instead of sending it she came to Padua herself to thank Doctor Gozzi and Bettina, and took me back to Venice on October 1st, 1739.

At the moment of my departure the Doctor wept and presented me with his most cherished treasure. He hung about my neck a relic of some saint whose name I no longer remember, which might still be in my possession if it had not been set in gold. The miracle it performed for me was to be of service to me at a moment of urgent need. Each time I returned to Padua to complete[16] my law studies I lodged in his house; but I was always unhappy to see the scoundrel who was to marry her hanging around Bettina, who seemed to me worthy of a better fate. I was sorry that I had spared her for him. It was a prejudice I had at the time, but of which I soon rid myself.

CHAPTER IV

The Patriarch of Venice confers minor order on me. My acquaintance with Senator Malipiero, with Teresa Imer, with the niece of my parish priest, with Signora Orio, with Nanetta and Marta, with La Cavamacchie. I become a preacher. My adventure at Pasiano with Lucia. Assignation on the fourth floor.

"'HE HAS just come from Padua, where he has been studying at the University,'' was the phrase used to introduce me everywhere, which was no sooner uttered than it gained me the silent observation of my equals in rank and age, the compliments of fathers, and the caresses of old women, among them some who were not really old but were willing to pass as such so that they could embrace me without impropriety. The parish priest of San Samuele,[1] whose name was Tosello, after inducting me into his church, presented me to Monsignor Correr, Patriarch of Venice, who gave me the tonsure and four months later, by special favor, conferred the four minor orders on me.[2] It was the greatest comfort to my grandmother. Good masters were immediately found so that I could continue my studies, and Signor Baffo chose the Abate Schiavo[3] to teach me to write a pure Italian and especially the language of poetry, for which I had a decided bent. I found myself most comfortably lodged with my brother Francesco, who had been set to study theatrical architecture. My sister and my posthumous brother were living with my grandmother in another house, one that belonged to her and in which she wished to die because her husband had died there. The house I lived in was the same one[4] in which I had lost my father and for which my mother continued to pay the rent; it was large and very well furnished.

Though the Abate Grimani was supposed to be my principal patron, I nevertheless saw him very seldom. The person to whom I attached myself was Signor Malipiero, to whom the priest Tosello immediately presented me. He was a Senator[5] who, not wishing to occupy himself with affairs of state at his age, which was seventy, led a pleasant life in his palace, eating well and every evening entertaining a most select company made up of ladies who had all gone the pace and of men of wit and intelligence who were sure to know of the latest happenings in the city. This old nobleman was a bachelor and rich, but subject three or four times a year to extremely painful attacks of gout which at each recurrence left him stiff first in one limb, then in another, so that his entire body was crippled. Only his head, his lungs, and his stomach had been spared. He was handsome, a connoisseur of wine, and an epicure; his mind was keen; with a vast knowledge of the world, he possessed the eloquence of the Venetians and the wisdom which is the portion of a senator who has not retired until he has spent forty years governing the Republic nor ceased to court the fair sex until he has had twenty mistresses and realized that he must give up all hope of pleasing even one. Though he was almost completely crippled, his condition was not apparent when he was seated, or talking, or at table. He ate only once a day, and always alone because, having lost all his teeth, he took twice as long to eat as another would have taken to eat the same meal and he was unwilling either to hurry himself in deference to his guests or to see them waiting while he chewed his food with his sound gums before swallowing it. For this reason alone he put up with the unpleasantness of eating in solitude, much to the displeasure of his excellent cook.

The first time that my parish priest did me the honor of presenting me to His Excellency, I most respectfully impugned this reasoning, which everyone considered unanswerable. I told him that he need only invite to his table those who naturally ate twice as much as other people.

"Where are they to be found?"

"It is a delicate matter. Your Excellency must try out table companions and, when you find them to be such as you want, must have the art to keep them without letting them know the reason. For there is not a well-bred person in the world who would have it said that he has the honor of eating with Your Excellency only because he eats twice as much as another."

Realizing all the cogency of my remarks, His Excellency told the priest to bring me to dinner next day. Having found that, if I was strong in precept, I was even stronger in practice, he had me share his table every day.

Despite his age and his gout this Senator who had renounced everything except himself still nurtured an amorous inclination. He loved Teresa, the daughter of the actor Imer,[6] who lived in a house near[7] his palace, its windows being across the way from the apartment in which he slept. The girl, then aged seventeen, and pretty, willful, and a flirt, who was studying music to make a career of it on the stage, who was forever showing herself at her window, and whose charms had already intoxicated the old man, treated him cruelly. She came almost every day to pay him a visit, but she was always accompanied by her mother, an old actress who had retired from the stage to pursue the salvation of her soul and who, naturally enough, had decided to see if she could not contrive an alliance between the devil and God. She took her daughter to mass every day and insisted on her going to confession every Sunday; but in the afternoon she took her to visit the amorous old man, whose fury terrified me when she refused him a kiss on the excuse that, having performed her devotions that morning, she could not stoop to offend the very God she had eaten and who was perhaps still in her stomach. What a spectacle for me, then aged fifteen, whom the old man allowed to be the only and silent witness of these scenes! The scoundrelly mother applauded her daughter's resistance, and even made bold to lecture the votary of pleasure, who in turn did not dare to refute her maxims, which were either too Christian or not Christian at all, and had to fight down the temptation to throw anything within reach at her head. He could think of nothing to say to her. Anger took the place of concupiscence, and after they were gone he relieved himself with philosophical reflections addressed to me. Compelled to answer him and not knowing what to say, I one day suggested marriage. He astonished me by answering that she refused to become his wife.

"Why?"

"Because she does not want to incur the hatred of my family."

"Offer her a large sum of money, a position."

"She says she would not commit a mortal sin to become queen of the world."

"You must violate her or send her packing, banish her from your house."

"I am incapable of the first, and I cannot make up my mind to the second."

"Kill her."

"That is what it will come to, if I do not die first."

"Your Excellency is to be pitied."

"Do you ever go to visit her?"

"No, because I might fall in love with her; and if she acted toward me as I see her act here, I should be miserable."

"You are right."

After witnessing these scenes and being honored with these conversations, I became the nobleman's favorite. He admitted me to his evening receptions, which, as I have already said, were frequented by superannuated women and by men of wit. He said that they were the place for me to acquire a knowledge far more important than the philosophy of Gassendi,[8] which I was then studying at his behest instead of the Peripatetic philosophy, which he ridiculed. He laid down certain rules of conduct by which, as he showed me, I must abide if I was to attend his receptions, since the company would be astonished to see a boy of my age admitted to them. He ordered me never to speak except in reply to direct questions, and above all never to express my opinion on any subject, for at the age of fifteen I was not entitled to have one. Faithfully obeying his commands, I gained his esteem and within a few days was the pet of all the ladies who visited him. In my character of a young abate of no importance, they insisted on my accompanying them when they went to see their daughters or their nieces in the visiting rooms of the convents in which they were being educated; I went to their houses at all hours, and entered unannounced; I was scolded when I let a week go by without putting in an appearance; and when I entered the young ladies' apartments, I heard them hurrying away; but they said they were silly as soon as they saw that it was only I. I was delighted with their trustfulness.

Signor Malipiero amused himself before dinner by questioning me on the advantages I gained from being received by the respectable ladies whom I had met at his receptions, telling me before I could answer, however, that they were propriety itself and that everyone would consider me a low scoundrel if I said anything about them which reflected on the estimable reputation they enjoyed in society. Thus he inculcated the sound precept of discretion in me. It was at his palace that I met Signora Manzoni, the wife of a notary public,[9] of whom I shall have occasion to speak further on. This worthy lady inspired the greatest devotion in me. She taught me much, and gave me very sound advice; which if I had only followed it my life would not have been stormy, and so I should not today have found it worth recording.

So many fine acquaintanceships among women of fashion, as they are called, gave me a desire to please by my person and by elegance in dress; but my parish priest objected, as did my good grandmother. Taking me aside one day he told me in honeyed words that in the condition which I had embraced I should think of pleasing God by my state of mind, not men by my person: he condemned my elaborate curls and the delicate perfume of my pomade; he told me that the devil had me by the hair and that I would be excommunicated if I continued to devote such care to it, citing the words of an ecumenical council, Clericus qui nutrit comam anathema sit ("An ecclesiastic who grows his hair shall be anathema").[10] I replied by citing the example of a hundred abati who were not regarded as excommunicated and were left in peace, though they put on three times as much powder as I who put on only a trace of it and who used a pomade scented with ambergris which would make a woman in childbirth faint, whereas mine, which was scented with jasmine, brought me compliments from every gathering I entered. I ended by telling him that if I had wanted to stink I should have become a Capuchin, and that I was very sorry but I could not obey his commands in this particular.

Three or four days later he persuaded my grandmother to let him into my room so early in the morning that I was still asleep. She swore to me afterward that if she had known what he was going to do she would not have opened the door for him. The presumptuous priest, who loved me, softly approached and, with a pair of good scissors, pitilessly cut off all my front hair from ear to ear. My brother Francesco, who was in the next room, saw him but did nothing to stop him. In fact he was delighted for, wearing a wig himself, he was jealous of the beauty of my hair. He has been envious of me all his life, yet combining, though I know not how, his envy with affection; today this vice of his must have died of old age, like all mine.

When I awoke the work was already done. After his crime the priest departed as if nothing had happened. It was my two hands which made me realize all the horror of this unexampled butchery.

What anger! What indignation! What projects of revenge as soon as, mirror in hand, I saw the state to which the audacious priest had reduced me! My grandmother came running at my cries, my brother laughed. The old woman calmed me somewhat by admitting that the priest had gone beyond the bounds of permissible punishment.

Resolved to take my revenge I dressed, brooding over a hundred dark plans. I considered that I had a right to avenge myself in blood, without fear of the law. Since the theaters were open, I set out masked[11] and went to see the advocate Carrara, whom I had met at Signor Malipiero's, to find out if I could bring a suit against the priest. He told me that a family had recently been ruined because the head of it had cut off a Slavonian merchant's mustache, which is far less than an entire forelock; hence I had but to command him if I wished to serve the priest on the spot with an extrajudiciary[12] which would make him tremble. I told him to do so, and to tell Signor Malipiero that evening why he had not seen me at his dinner table. It was clear that I could no longer go out unmasked so long as my hair had not grown back.

I ate a very bad dinner with my brother. My being obliged by this misfortune to forgo the delicate fare to which Signor Malipiero had accustomed me was not the least of the sufferings I had to bear because of the action of the high-handed priest whose godson I was. The fury that possessed me was so great that I shed tears. I was in despair because the insult I had suffered had a comic aspect and so put me in a ridiculous light, which I considered more prejudicial to my honor than any crime. I went to bed early, and a sound ten hours' sleep cooled my rage somewhat, but it left me no less determined to avenge myself by due legal process.

I was dressing to go to Signor Carrara's to read over the extrajudiciary, when I saw before me a skillful hairdresser whom I had encountered at Signora Contarini's. He told me that Signor Malipiero had sent him to dress my hair so that I could go out, for he wanted me to come and dine with him that same day. After looking over the damage, he laughed and said that I need only leave it to him, assuring me that he would make it possible for me to go out even more elegantly curled than before. This skillful young man made all my front hair the same length as the part which had been cut, and then dressed my hair en vergette to such effect that I found myself pleased, satisfied, and avenged.

I instantly forgot the insult, I went to the advocate and told him that I no longer wished for revenge, then I flew to Signor Malipiero's, where chance would have it that I found the priest, whom, despite my joy, I treated to a withering look. Nothing was said of what had happened, Signor Malipiero took in the whole scene, and the priest departed, certainly repenting of his action, for my hair was so elegantly curled that it really did deserve excommunication.

After my cruel godfather left, I did not dissemble with Signor Malipiero: I told him in so many words that I would look for another church, for I absolutely refused to remain connected with one whose priest was a man capable of going to such lengths. The wise old man told me that I was right. This was precisely the way to bring me to do what was wanted of me. That evening the entire company, who had already heard the story, complimented me, assuring me that my curls could not be more charming. I was the happiest of lads, and all the happier when two weeks had passed since the occurrence and Signor Malipiero had not said a word to me about going back to the church. Only my grandmother kept bothering me, insisting that I ought to go back.

But when I felt sure that my noble patron would not bring up the subject again, I was greatly surprised to hear him say that an opportunity had arisen which would make it possible for me to go back to the church and at the same time secure full satisfaction from the priest. "As president," he continued, "of the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament,[13] it falls to me to choose the orator to deliver the panegyric upon it on the fourth Sunday of this month, which happens to be the day after Christmas. The person I shall recommend to him is you, and I am sure that he will not dare to refuse you. What do you say to such a triumph? Does it please you?"

My surprise at his proposal was extreme, for it had never entered my head to become a preacher, still less that I had the ability to compose a sermon and deliver it. I told him I was certain he was joking; but as soon as he convinced me that he was speaking in earnest, it took him only a minute to persuade me and to make me sure that I was born to be the most famous preacher of the century as soon as I had put on flesh, for in those days I was extremely thin. I had no fear for my voice or my gestures, and so far as composition was concerned, I felt that I had more than ability enough to produce a masterpiece.

I told him that I was ready and that I could not wait to get home and begin writing the panegyric. "Though

I am no theologian," I said, "I am well versed in the subject. I shall say astonishing things, and they will be new." The next day he told me that the priest had been delighted by his choice and even more by my willingness to accept this sacred task, but that he insisted that I show him my composition as soon as I had finished it, because, since the subject lay in the domain of the most exalted theology, he could not permit me to enter the pulpit unless he was certain that I had said nothing heretical. I agreed to this, and during the course of the week composed and copied out my panegyric. I still have it, and, what is more, I consider it excellent.

My poor grandmother could do nothing but weep with satisfaction at seeing her grandson an apostle. She made me read it to her, she told her beads as she listened, and declared that it was beautiful. Signor Malipiero, who did not tell his beads as he listened, told me that the priest would not like it. I had taken my text from Horace: Ploravere suis non respondere favorem speratum meritis ("They lamented that their merits did not meet with the gratitude for which they had hoped").[14] I deplored the wickedness and ingratitude of mankind, which had brought to naught the plan the divine wisdom had conceived for its redemption. He did not approve of my having taken my text from a moralist; but he was delighted that my sermon was not stuffed with Latin quotations.

I went to the priest's house to read it to him; he was not at home; having to wait for him, I fell in love with his niece Angela, who was working at the embroidery frame, who told me that she wanted to know me, and who, wanting a good laugh, insisted on my telling her the story of the forelock that her reverend uncle had cut off. This love determined my fate; it was the cause of two others, which were the causes of several other causes which ended by obliging me to renounce being a churchman. But let us not go too fast.

When the priest arrived he did not seem displeased to see me being entertained by his niece, who was my own age. After reading my sermon he told me that it was a very pretty academic diatribe, but that it was not suitable for the pulpit.

"I will give you one," he said, "of my own composition, which no one has seen. You shall learn it by heart, and I give you permission to say that it is yours."

"Thank you, Your Reverence. But I will deliver my own or none at all."

"But you shall not deliver this one in my church."

"You may discuss that with Signor Malipiero. Meanwhile, I shall take my composition to the censors, then to Monsignor the Patriarch, and if it is rejected I will have it printed."

"Come, come, young man! The Patriarch will agree with me."

That evening I repeated my argument with the priest to Signor Malipiero in the presence of all his guests. I was forced to read my panegyric, which was applauded on all hands. I was praised for my modesty in quoting none of the Fathers, whom at my age I could not have read, and the ladies admired me for having included not a word of Latin except my text from Horace, who, though a great libertine, nevertheless said excellent things. One of the Patriarch's nieces, who was present, said that she would speak to her uncle, to whom I was determined to appeal. Signor Malipiero told me to come and discuss the matter with him in the morning before I did anything else.

I obeyed, and he sent for the priest, who came at once. After letting him talk his fill, I convinced him by telling him that either the Patriarch would approve my sermon and I would deliver it without his running any risk; or he would disapprove of it and I would yield.

"Do not go to him," he said, "and I will approve it;

I only ask you to change your text, for Horace was a villain."

"Why do you quote Seneca, Origen, Tertullian, Boethius, whom, since they were all heretics, you must consider more odious than Horace, who after all could not be a Christian?"

But I finally gave in to please Signor Malipiero, and I put in the text the priest wanted, despite the fact that it was out of keeping with my sermon. I then gave it to him, so that I should have an excuse, by calling for it the following morning, to talk to his niece.

But what really amused me was Doctor Gozzi. I sent him my sermon out of vanity. He sent it back to me, condemning it and asking me if I had gone mad. He told me that if I was allowed to deliver it in the pulpit I would bring dishonor not only on myself but also on him, who had educated me.

I delivered my sermon in the Church of San Samuele before a most select audience. I received great praise, after which it was unanimously predicted that I would become the greatest preacher of the century, since no one at the age of fifteen had ever played the role so well.

In the bag in which it is customary for the congregation to put their offerings for the preacher, the sexton who emptied it found nearly fifty zecchini, together with some love letters which scandalized the bigots. One, which was anonymous, though I thought I knew who had written it, led me into an awkward indiscretion which I think it best to spare the reader. This rich harvest when I was greatly in need of money made me think seriously of becoming a preacher, and I announced my vocation to the priest and asked him to help me. I thus gave myself the means of going daily to his house, where I fell more and more in love with Angela, who was willing to let me love her but who, showing herself to be a perfect dragon of virtue, obstinately refused to grant me the slightest favor. She wanted me to renounce my orders and marry her. I could not bring myself to do this. But hoping to make her change her mind, I persisted. Her uncle had commissioned me to compose a panegyric on St. Joseph which I was to recite on the 19th of March 1741. I composed it, and the priest himself spoke of it with enthusiasm; but it was fated that I should not preach more than once on this earth. Here is the story; sorry as it is, it is only too true, though there are those who are cruel enough to find it comic.

I thought I need not take much trouble to learn my sermon by heart. I was the author of it, I knew that I knew it; and the calamity of forgetting it did not seem to me within the realm of possible things. I might forget a sentence; but I must surely be able to substitute another; and just as I never found myself at a loss when I was discoursing to a group of well-bred people, I thought it beyond probability that I could find myself stricken dumb before an audience in which I knew no one who could abash me and make me lose my reasoning powers. So I amused myself as usual, doing no more than read my composition over night and morning in order to fix it in my memory, of which I had never had reason to complain.

So on the 19th of March, the day on which I was to enter the pulpit four hours after noon to deliver my sermon, I did not have the strength of mind to deprive myself of the pleasure of dining with the Count of Montereale,[15] who was staying in my house and who had invited the patrician Barozzi, who was to marry his daughter the Countess Lucia after Easter.

I was still at table with this distinguished company when a clerk came to tell me that I was awaited at the sacristy. With my stomach full and my head the worse for wine, I set out, I hurry to the church, I enter the pulpit.

I speak the exordium perfectly, I draw breath. But after a bare hundred words of the exposition, I no longer know what I am saying or what I have to say. Determined to go on at all costs, I beat around the bush, and what finishes me off completely is a low murmur from the restive audience, only too aware of my plight. I see several people leave the church, I think I hear laughter, I lose my head and all hope of retrieving the situation. I can assure my reader that I have never known whether I pretended to faint or fainted in good earnest. All I know is that I dropped to the floor of the pulpit, at the same time hitting the wall with my head and wishing that I had split my skull. Two clergymen came and led me back to the sacristy, where without a word to anyone I took my cloak and my hat and went home. Shutting myself in my room, I put on a short coat such as abati wear in the country, and after packing what I needed in my portmanteau I went and asked my grandmother for some money, then set out for Padua to obtain my terzarie.[16] I arrived there at midnight and immediately went to bed in the house of my good Doctor Gozzi, to whom I took care not to give an account of my disaster. After doing all that was necessary for my doctorate in the following year, I returned to Venice after Easter, to find my misfortune forgotten; but there was no longer any question of my preaching. I was encouraged to try again, but to no purpose. I completely renounced the profession.

On Ascension Eve Signora Manzoni's husband introduced me to a young courtesan who was then causing a great stir in Venice. She was known as La Cavamacchie,[17] which means "the cleaner," because her father had practiced the cleaning trade. She wanted to be called Preato, that being her family name; but her friends called her Giulietta; it was her Christian name, and pretty enough to be recorded in history.

Her celebrity was due to the fact that the Marchese Sanvitale,[18] of Parma, had spent a hundred thousand scudi on her in return for her favors. Her beauty was the talk of Venice. Those who could manage to speak with her considered themselves fortunate, and those who were admitted into her circle more than fortunate. As I shall have occasion to speak of her more than once in these memoirs, the reader may be glad to have her story in a few words.

In the year 1735, Giulietta, then fourteen years of age, took a coat which had been cleaned to a Venetian nobleman named Marco Muazzo. This nobleman, finding her charming despite her rags, went to see her at her father's house with a well-known advocate named Bastiano Uccelli.[19] Uccelli, even more struck by her fervid imagination and gaiety than by her beauty and her fine figure, set her up in a well-furnished apartment, gave her a music master, and made her his mistress. During the Fair[20] he took her walking with him on the Liston,[21] where she amazed all the connoisseurs. Within six months she thought herself musician enough to sign a contract with an impresario, who took her to Vienna to play a castrato role in an opera by Metastasio.[22]

At this point the advocate saw fit to leave her and turned her over to a rich Jew, who gave her some diamonds and then likewise left her. In Vienna her charms won her the applause for which she could not hope from her talents, which were less than mediocre. The crowd of worshipers who went to sacrifice to the idol, and which was renewed from week to week, determined the august Maria Theresa to destroy the new cult. She sent the new goddess a command to leave the capital of Austria instantly. It was Count Bonifazio Spada who brought her back to Venice, which she left to sing in Padua. It was there that her charms won her the love of Count Giacomo Sanvitale; nothing came of it, however, for the Marchesa, who stood very much on her dignity, slapped her face in her own box over a certain remark of the artist's which she considered insolent. The insult so disgusted Giulietta with the theater that she gave it up forever. She returned to her native city. Rejoicing in the reputation of having been sfrattata[23] from Vienna, she could not fail to make her fortune. It had become a title. To disparage a singer or a dancer, it was only necessary to say that she had been to Vienna and had been so little acclaimed that the Empress had not thought her worth banishing.

Signor Steffano Querini delle Papozze[24] immediately became her acknowledged lover, and her fancy man three months later when the Marchese Sanvitale made her his mistress in the spring of the year 1740. He began by giving her a hundred thousand ducati correnti.[25] To prevent anyone from attributing the gift of such an extravagant sum to weakness, he said that it was scarcely enough to avenge the artist for a slap his wife had given her. Giulietta, however, would never admit the slap, and she was right: by acknowledging the Marchese's magnanimity, she would have dishonored herself. The slap would have blighted charms of whose intrinsic value she prided herself upon seeing the world convinced.

In the following year, 1741, Signor Manzoni introduced me to this Phryne[26] as a young abate who was beginning to make a name for himself. She was living near San Paterniano,[27] at the foot of the bridge, in a house belonging to Signor Piai. I found her in the company of six or seven seasoned admirers. She was sitting at her ease on a sofa, beside Signor Querini. Her appearance surprised me; in the tone of a princess, and looking at me as if I were for sale, she told me that she was not sorry to have made my acquaintance. As soon as she had asked me to be seated, I began examining her too. I found it easy to do. The room was not large, but there were at least twenty candles.

Giulietta was a tall, beautiful girl of eighteen years; her dazzling whiteness, the crimson of her cheeks, the vermilion of her lips, and the blackness and the very narrow curved line of her eyebrows impressed me as artificial. Two fine rows of teeth made one overlook the fact that her mouth was too large. So she took care always to be smiling. Her bosom was simply a broad, beautiful table, on which a fichu was artfully disposed to make one imagine that the dishes one wishes to find in such a place were indeed there; but I did not admit it. Despite her rings and her bracelets, I observed that her hands were too big and too bony, and for all the care she took not to expose her feet, a slipper which lay at the bottom of her dress made it clear to me that they were as big as she was—a graceless proportion which is displeasing not only to Chinese and Spaniards, but to all connoisseurs. A tall woman should have small feet, and such was the taste of Lord Holofernes, who otherwise would not have found Lady Judith charming. "Et sandalia eius," says the Holy Spirit, "rapuerunt oculos eius" ("And her sandals ravished his eyes").[28] Comparing her, in the course of my careful examination, with the hundred thousand ducats which the nobleman from Parma had given her, I was astonished, for I would not myself have given a zecchino to look upon all those other beauties quas insternebat stola ("which her dress concealed").

A quarter of an hour after my arrival, the murmur of water struck by the oars of a gondola coming in to the landing announced the prodigal Marchese. We rose, and Signor Querini quickly left his place, blushing a little. Signor Sanvitale, who was old rather than young and who had traveled, sat down near her, but not on the sofa, which obliged the beauty to turn. I was now able to see her in full-face. I found her more beautiful so than in profile. The four or five times I paid court to her sufficed for me to tell the company at Signor Malipiero's that she could be attractive only to exhausted appetites, for she possessed neither the beauties of simple nature nor the sophistication of society nor any particular talent nor easy manners. My opinion pleased everyone present, but Signor Malipiero smiled and whispered in my ear that Giulietta would certainly be informed of the portrait I had just drawn of her and would become my enemy. He proved to be right.

I thought it strange in this notorious girl that she very seldom addressed me and that she never looked at me without peering through a concave lens to assist her myopic vision or squeezing her eyelids together, as if she did not want to give me the honor of a full view of her eyes, which were incontestably beautiful. They were blue, perfectly shaped, prominent, and illuminated by that unimaginable iridescence which nature gives only, and rarely, to youth, and which usually disappears at about the age of forty after having performed miracles. The late King of Prussia kept it until his death.

Giulietta learned of the portrait I had given of her at Signor Malipiero's. The informer was the Ragionato[29] Saverio Costantini. She said to Signor Manzoni in my presence that a great connoisseur had found some annoying faults in her, but she did not specify them. I saw that she was hitting at me indirectly, and I expected to be ostracized. However, she kept me waiting for a full hour. The conversation turned to a concert given by the actor Imer, at which his daughter Teresa had had a brilliant success. She asked me point-blank what Signor Malipiero was doing with her; I answered that he was giving her an education.

"He is quite capable of that," she replied, "for he is highly intelligent; but I should like to know what he is doing with you."

"Whatever he can."

"I am told he finds you a little stupid."

The laugh, of course, was on her side. Not knowing what to answer, I very nearly blushed and a quarter of an hour later I left, certain that I should never set foot in her house again. My account of this breach greatly amused my old Senator the next day at dinner.

I spent the summer going to indulge in Arcadian courtship with Angela at the school where she went to learn embroidering. Her parsimony in granting me favors irritated me, and I already found my love a torment. With my strong temperament, I needed a girl of Bettina's type, one who enjoyed appeasing the flame of love without quenching it. But I soon got rid of my taste for this shallow satisfaction. Having a kind of virginity myself, I felt the greatest reverence for a girl's. I thought it the Palladium[30] of Cecrops.[31] I would have nothing to do with married women. What stupidity! I was fool enough to be jealous of their husbands. Angela was recalcitrant in the highest degree, yet not a flirt. She was drying me up; I was growing thin. The pathetic and plaintive speeches I addressed to her at the embroidery frame at which she worked with two other girls, sisters and friends of hers, produced more effect on them than upon her heart, for that was too much the slave of the precept which was poisoning my life. If I had had eyes for anyone but her I should have realized that the two sisters had more charm than she did; but she had made me obstinate. She told me that she was ready to become my wife, and she believed that I could wish for nothing more. She exasperated me beyond measure when, as a mark of extreme favor, she told me that abstinence made her suffer as much as it did me.

At the beginning of the autumn a letter from the Countess of Montereale summoned me to her country place in Friuli, an estate named Pasiano.[32] She was to be entertaining a brilliant company, including her daughter, who had become a Venetian lady of patrician rank, who was intelligent and beautiful and had one eye so lovely that it made up for the other, rendered hideous by leucoma.

Finding gaiety at Pasiano, I had no difficulty in increasing it and for the time being forgetting the cruel Angela. I was allotted a room on the ground floor, giving on to the garden, where I found myself so comfortable that it did not occur to me to wonder next to whom I might be lodging. Upon my awaking the following morning my eyes were pleasantly surprised by the charming object which approached my bed to serve me my coffee. It was a very young girl, but already formed as city girls are at seventeen; she was only fourteen. White-skinned, with black eyes, her hair hanging loose, and covered only by a shift and a petticoat laced awry which exposed half of her bare leg to view, she looked at me as frankly and calmly as if I had been an old acquaintance. She asked me if I had found my bed comfortable.

"Yes. I'm sure you made it. Who are you?"

"I'm Lucia, the caretaker's daughter, I have neither brothers nor sisters, and I'm fourteen. I'm very glad you haven't a valet, for I will wait on you myself, and I am sure you will be satisfied."

Enchanted by this beginning, I sit up; she hands me my dressing gown, saying a hundred things of which I did not understand a word. I drink my coffee, as disconcerted as she was at ease, and amazed at a beauty to which it was impossible to remain indifferent. She had sat down on the foot of my bed, excusing herself for the liberty she was taking only by a laugh which expressed everything. Her father and her mother came in while I still had the coffee cup to my lips. Lucia does not budge; she looks at them as if pluming herself on the post she had assumed. They chide her gently and ask me to excuse her.

The good people say a hundred civil things to me; and Lucia goes off about her business. They praise her to me: she is their only child, their darling, the consolation of their old age; she obeys them in everything; she fears God; she is as fit as a fiddle; she has only one fault.

"What is that?"

"She's too young."

"A charming fault."

In less than an hour I am convinced that I have been conversing with probity, truth, the social virtues, and genuine honor.

Re-enter Lucia, laughing, freshly washed, with her hair done up in a way of her own, with shoes on her feet, and wearing a dress; after dropping me a rustic curtsy, she gives her mother several kisses, then goes and sits on her father's lap; I tell her to sit on the bed; but she says that such an honor is not for her when she is dressed.

The simple, innocent, and enchanting notion which I find in this answer makes me laugh. I consider if she is prettier now than she was an hour earlier, and I decide in favor of earlier. I put her above not only Angela but Bettina too.

The hairdresser enters, the respectable family departs, I dress, I go upstairs, and spend the day most amusingly, as one spends the day in the country in select company. The next morning I am scarcely awake before I ring, and once more Lucia appears before me, the same as the previous day, as astonishing in her words as in her ways. Everything in her shone under the charming varnish of frankness and innocence. I could not conceive how, being properly brought up and virtuous and not at all stupid, she did not know that she could not show herself to me in this way without risk of setting me on fire. "It must be," I told myself, "that, attaching no importance to certain little freedoms, she is not strait-laced." With this idea in mind, I decide to convince her that I appreciated her. I do not feel guilty toward her parents, for I suppose them to be as easygoing as herself. Nor do I fear to be the first to alarm her lovely innocence and to cast the dark light of evil into her soul. In short, unwilling either to be the dupe of feeling or to act unfeelingly, I decided to find out what was what. Without further ado, I extend a libertine hand toward her, and by what appears to be an involuntary movement she draws back, she blushes, her gaiety vanishes, and she turns, pretending to look for something or other, until she finds herself over her agitation. This took only a minute. She approaches again, delivered from all her uneasiness except the shame of having shown herself ill-natured and the fear of having misinterpreted an action which, on my part, might have been either completely innocent or common politeness. She was already laughing. I saw in her soul all that I have just set down, and I hastened to reassure her. Seeing that I was risking too much by acting, I resolved to devote the following morning to making her talk.

After drinking my coffee I interrupted what she was saying to me by remarking that it was cold and that she would not feel it if she came under the covers with me.

"Shan't I be in your way?"

"No, but it occurs to me that your mother might come in."

"She won't think any harm."

"Come here. But you know the risk we're running."

"Of course—I'm no fool; but you are good and, what's more, a priest."

"Then come, but first shut the door."

"No, no, for people would think I don't know what."

So she came into the place I made for her, telling me some long story of which I understood not a word, for in this position, not wishing to surrender to the movements of nature, I was the most torpid of men. Lucia's fearlessness, which was certainly not feigned, impressed me to such a point that I was ashamed to enlighten her. Finally she told me that it had just struck fifteen o'clock[33] and that if old Count Antonio came down and saw us as we then were, he would make jokes she would find annoying. "He is the kind of man," she said, "that, when I see him, I run away. I shall go now because I am not curious to see you get out of bed."

I stayed there for more than a quarter of an hour, motionless and in a condition to arouse pity for I was really in a state of violent excitement. The conversation into which I led her the next morning, without making her come into my bed, finally convinced me that she rightly deserved to be the idol of her parents, and that her freedom of mind and her uninhibited behavior had no other source than her innocence and the purity of her soul. Her artlessness, her vivacity, her curiosity, her constant blushes when she said things which provoked me to laughter and which, on her part, were wholly guileless —everything about her showed me that she was an angel incarnate who could not fail to become the victim of the first libertine who should take her in hand. I felt certain that it would not be I. The mere thought made me shudder. My own self-esteem answered for Lucia's honor to her respectable parents who, trusting in their good opinion of my morals, thus freely left her in my hands. I thought that I should become the most contemptible of men if I betrayed their confidence in me. So I chose the course of suffering and, certain of gaining the victory under any circumstances, I determined to fight, content that her presence should be the only reward of my desires. I had not yet learned the maxim that so long as the battle goes on, victory remains uncertain.

I told her that I should be glad if she would come earlier and wake me even if I was asleep, because the less I slept the better I felt. Thus our two hours of conversation became three, which passed like a flash. When her mother, coming to fetch her, found her sitting on my bed, she no longer scolded her but only exclaimed over my kindness in putting up with her. Lucia gave her a hundred kisses. The kind, innocent woman begged me to teach Lucia good behavior and to cultivate her mind. After her mother left, Lucia did not consider that she was any the more free. The company of this angel made me suffer the pains of hell. Though constantly tempted to deluge her face with kisses when she laughingly brought it within two inches of mine and told me that she wanted to be my sister, I scrupulously avoided taking her hands; for me to have given her a single kiss would have blown my edifice sky-high, for I felt that I had become as inflammable as straw. When she left I was always astonished that I had won the victory; but, my appetite for laurels being insatiable, I could scarcely wait for the next morning to come so that I might renew the sweet and perilous battle. It is shallow desires which make a young man bold; strong desires confound him.

After ten or twelve days, at the conclusion of which I felt obliged either to make an end or become a villain, I chose to make an end, since nothing assured me that I should obtain the due reward of my villainy in the consent of the object who would have led me into it. With Lucia turned dragon when I had put her in the position of having to defend herself, the open door of the room would have exposed me to disgrace and to dreary repentance. The thought terrified me. I must make an end, and I did not know how to go about it. I could no longer resist a girl who, at earliest dawn, and wearing only a petticoat over her shift, came running to me in pure gaiety of heart to ask me how I had slept, breathing her words upon my very lips. I drew back my head, and she laughingly reproached me for being afraid when she was not. I fatuously answered that she was wrong if she believed that I was afraid of her, who was no more than a child. She answered that two years' difference meant nothing.

Unable to bear any more, yet growing more amorous every day precisely because of the schoolboy's remedy, which disarms by exhausting potency at the moment but, irritating nature, provokes her to vengeance, which she takes by redoubling the desires of the tyrant who has subdued her, I spent the whole night with the phantom of Lucia haunting a mind already saddened by my decision to see her the next morning for the last time. My intention of asking her face to face to return no more seemed to me magnificent, heroic, unique, infallible. I believed that Lucia would not only help me to carry out my plan, but would also hold me in the highest regard all the rest of her life.

With the first light of day she appears, dazzling, radiant, laughing, her hair down, running to me with open arms, but suddenly downcast at seeing me pale, discomposed, wretched.

"Why, what is the matter?" she asks.

"I couldn't sleep."

"Why?"

"Because I have made up my mind to inform you of a plan which, though it will make me miserable, will gain me your highest regard."

"But if it will gain you my regard, it ought to make you happy. But tell me why, having talked to me fondly yesterday, you address me today as formally as if I were a young lady. What have I done to you, Signor Abate? I'm going to fetch your coffee, and you shall tell me everything when you've drunk it. I can hardly wait to hear what you have to say."

She goes, she comes back, I drink the coffee, I am serious, her artless talk sets me laughing, which delights her; she clears away, she goes and shuts the door, for it was a windy day; then, not wanting to lose a word of what I was to tell her, she asks me to make a little room for her. I do so fearing nothing, for I believed that I was like a dead man.

After giving her a true account of the state into which her charms had put me and of all that I had suffered from my determination to resist my inclination to give her unmistakable evidence of my tender feelings, I explain to her that, unable any longer to endure the torment which her presence caused my amorous soul, I am reduced to asking her to keep out of my sight from henceforth. The unbounded truth of my passion, my desire that she should consider the expedient I had adopted to be the utmost effort of a perfect love, lent me a sublime eloquence. I depicted the terrible consequences which could make us wretched if we acted in any other way than that which her virtue and my own had obliged me to propose to her.

At the conclusion of my sermon she wiped away my tears with the front of her shift, never dreaming that by this charitable act she exposed to my view two rocks eminently adapted to make the most skillful of pilots suffer shipwreck.

After this scene in dumb show, she told me sadly that my tears distressed her and that she could never have imagined she could give me cause to shed them. "All that you have told me," she said, "has shown me that you love me very much; but I do not understand how you can be alarmed by it, whereas your love gives me infinite pleasure. You banish me from your presence because your love makes you afraid. What would you do if you hated me? Am I guilty because I have made you fall in love? If that is a crime, I assure you that, since I had no intention of committing it, you cannot in conscience punish me for it. Yet it is true that I am rather glad of it. As for the risks people run when they love each other, and which I know perfectly well, we are free to defy them. I am astonished that, though I am ignorant, this does not seem so difficult to me, whereas you who, according to what everyone says, are so intelligent, feel afraid. What surprises me is that, though love is not a sickness, it has made you ill, whereas its effect on me is exactly the contrary. Is it possible that I am wrong and that what I feel for you is not love? You saw me so gay when I arrived, because I dreamed of you all the livelong night; but that didn't keep me from sleeping, except that I woke five or six times to find out if it was really you I was holding in my arms. As soon as I saw it was not you, I went back to sleep to find my dream again, and I succeeded. Didn't I have good reason to be gay this morning? My dear Abate, if love is a torture for you, I am sorry. Could it be that you were born not to love? I will do whatever you tell me to; except that, even if your cure depended on it, I could never stop loving you. Yet if your cure does depend on your no longer loving me, then do all that you can, for I would rather have you alive without love than dead from loving. Only see if you cannot find some other way, for the plan you have told me about makes me wretched. Think. It may be that there is more of a choice than you suppose. Suggest another. Trust in Lucia."

This truthful, artless, natural speech showed me by how much Nature's eloquence is superior to the eloquence of the philosophic mind. For the first time I clasped this heavenly creature in my arms, saying: "Yes, my dear Lucia; you can apply the most powerful palliative to the sickness which is devouring me; let me give a thousand kisses to that tongue of yours, to the heavenly mouth which has told me that I am happy."

We then spent a full hour in the most eloquent silence, except that from time to time Lucia cried out, "Oh, my God! Is it true that I am not dreaming?" Even so, I respected her in the matter of essential importance, and precisely because she offered me no resistance. This was my weakness.

"I am uneasy," she says suddenly; "I have a strange feeling." She jumps out of the bed, hurriedly sets it to rights, and sits down on the foot of it. A moment later her mother enters, shutting the door again behind her and remarking that I was right for there was a strong wind. She compliments me on my fine color, and tells her daughter she must go and get dressed to go to mass. Lucia came back an hour later to tell me that the miracle she had performed made her proud, for my present look of health made her a thousand times more certain of my love than the pitiful state in which she had found me that morning. "If your perfect happiness," she said, "depends only on me, be happy! I can refuse you nothing."

She then left me; and despite the fact that my senses were still reeling, I did not fail to reflect that I was on the very edge of the abyss and that only the greatest effort could keep me from falling into it.

After spending the whole month of September there in the country, I found myself in possession of Lucia for eleven successive nights, which, knowing that her mother was a sound sleeper, she came and spent in my arms. What made us insatiable was an abstinence which she did everything in her power to force me to renounce. She could not taste the sweetness of the forbidden fruit except by letting me eat it. She tried a hundred times to deceive me by saying that I had already gathered it, but Bettina had taught me too much for me to be taken in. I took my departure from Pasiano promising her that I would return in the spring, but leaving her in a state of mind which was to be the cause of her unhappy fate—a fate with which I sincerely reproached myself in Holland twenty years later, and with which I shall reproach myself to the day of my death.

Three or four days after my return to Venice I relapsed into all my old ways, falling in love with Angela again and hoping to achieve at least what I had achieved with Lucia. A fear which I no longer find in my nature today, a panic terror of consequences fatal to my future career, held me back from full enjoyment. I do not know if I have ever been a man of perfect probity; but I know that the sentiments I cherished in my early youth were far more delicate than those to which the course of my life has accustomed me. An evil philosophy too greatly diminishes the number of so-called prejudices.

The two sisters who worked at the embroidery frame with Angela were her bosom friends and the repositories of all her secrets. I had no idea, until after I had come to know them, that they condemned their friend's excessive severity. Not being conceited enough to suppose that the two girls could fall in love with me from listening to my complaints, not only did I not restrain myself in their presence, I confided my troubles to them when Angela was not there. I often spoke to them with an ardor far greater than that with which I addressed the cruel girl who quelled it in me. The genuine lover is always afraid that the object of his love will think he is exaggerating; and fear of saying too much makes him say less than is the case.

The mistress of the school, a sanctimonious old woman, who at first seemed quite indifferent to my unconcealed fondness for Angela, finally looked askance on my frequent visits and informed Angela's uncle, the priest Tosello, of them. In consequence he one day gently warned me that I should not frequent the house so much, since my assiduity might be wrongly interpreted and in a manner prejudicial to his niece's honor. This was a thunderbolt; but, receiving his warning without showing my emotion, I answered that I would find some other place to spend the time I was spending at the embroideress's house.

Three or four days later I paid her a polite visit, without stopping at the embroidery frame for even an instant; however, I managed to slip into the hands of the elder sister, whose name was Nanetta, a letter inside which was another for my dear Angela, in which I explained the reason which had obliged me to suspend my visits. I begged her to think of some means which might procure me the satisfaction of discoursing to her on my passion. I wrote to Nanetta that I would come the next day but one to receive the answer, which she would easily find means to give me.

The girl carried out my instructions to perfection; and on the second day following she handed me the answer as I was leaving the room, and in such way as to escape all notice.

In a brief note (for she disliked writing) Angela promised me eternal constancy and told me to do everything I should find in the letter Nanetta was writing me. Here is the translation of Nanetta's letter, which I have kept, as I have all those which will be found in these memoirs.

"There is nothing in the world, Signor Abate, that I am not prepared to do for my dear friend Angela. She comes to visit us every feast day, sups with us, and spends the night. I suggest a way for you to make the acquaintance of Signora Orio, our aunt; but if you succeed in gaining entrance to our house, I warn you not to show that you have a special liking for Angela, for our aunt would disapprove of your coming to her house to secure the opportunity of speaking to someone who is not in the family. So I suggest the following plan, which I will further as far as in me lies. Signora Orio, though a woman of station, is not rich and hence wishes to be entered in the list of noble widows who can aspire to the bounty of the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament, of which Signor Malipiero is president. Last Sunday Angela told her that you enjoy the affection of this nobleman, and that the best means of gaining his support would be to obtain your promise to ask him for it. She foolishly told her that you are in love with me and that you only went to our embroidery mistress's house to have an opportunity to talk with me, and that hence I could secure your interest on her behalf. My aunt answered that, since you were a priest, there was nothing to fear and that I might write to you to come to her house; but I refused. The Procuratore[34] Rosa, who is my aunt's very life, told her that I was right and that it was not proper for me to write to you, but that she herself should ask you to come and discuss an important matter with her.

He said that if it was true that you were taken with me, you would be sure to come, and he persuaded her to write you the note which you will find at home. If you wish to find Angela with us, put off your visit until day after tomorrow, Sunday. If you can persuade Signor Malipiero to grant the favor my aunt asks, you will become the pet of the house. You will forgive it if I treat you badly, for I said that I did not like you. You will do well to flirt a little with my aunt, even though she is sixty. Signor Rosa will not be jealous, and you will endear yourself to the whole household. I shall arrange an opportunity for you to speak with Angela alone. I will do everything in my power to convince you of my friendship. Farewell."

I found this plan thoroughly well contrived. I received Signora Orio's note that evening; I went to her house in accordance with Nanetta's instructions; she asked me to act in her interest, and entrusted me with all the certificates of which I might have need. I gave her my promise. I scarcely spoke to Angela; I made up to Nanetta, who treated me very badly; and I won the friendship of the old advocate Rosa, who was useful to me later on.

Considering how I could obtain this favor from Signor Malipiero, I saw that my best course would be to appeal to Teresa Imer, who turned everything to her own advantage and at the same time pleased the old man, who was still in love with her. So I paid her a surprise visit, even entering her room unannounced. I found her alone with the physician Doro,[35] who at once pretended to be there only for professional reasons. He then wrote out a prescription, took her pulse, and left.

This Doro was rumored to be in love with her, and Signor Malipiero, who was jealous of him, had forbidden her to receive him and she had promised not to. Teresa knew that I was not unaware of this, and she must have been annoyed at my discovering that she made light of the promise she had given the old man. She must also fear that I would be indiscreet. It was the moment when I could hope to obtain from her all that I wished.

I told her in a few words the business which brought me to see her, and at the same time assured her that she must never think me capable of a base action. After assuring me that she wanted nothing better than to seize this occasion to convince me of her desire to oblige me, Teresa asked me to give her all the necessary certificates for the lady for whom she was to interest herself. At the same time she showed me those of another lady on whose behalf she had undertaken to speak, but she promised to sacrifice her for me. She kept her word. Only two days later I had the decree, signed by His Excellency as president of the Fraternity of the Poor.[36] Signora Orio's name was immediately included in the list for the bounties which were drawn by lot twice a year.

Nanetta and her sister Marta were the orphan daughters of a sister of Signora Orio, whose entire property consisted in the house in which she lived, of which she rented out the second floor, and a pension from her brother, who was secretary to the Council of Ten.[37] She had living with her only her two charming nieces, of whom one was sixteen, the other fifteen. In place of a servant she had a woman water-carrier who, for four lire[38] a month, came every day to do the chores for the entire house. Her one friend was the advocate Rosa, who, like herself, was sixty and was only awaiting the death of his wife to marry her. Nanetta and Marta slept together on the fourth floor in a wide bed, in which Angela too slept with them every feast day. On weekdays they all went to school to the embroidery mistress.

As soon as I was in possession of the decree which Signora Orio wanted, I made a brief visit to the embroidery mistress to give Nanetta a note in which I told her the good news that I had obtained the favor, adding that I would take the decree to her aunt the next day but one, which was a feast day. I earnestly urged her to arrange a private meeting with Angela for me.

The next day but one Nanetta was on the watch for my arrival and handed me a note, at the same time telling me to find an opportunity to read it before I left the house. I enter, and I see Angela with Signora Orio, the old advocate, and Marta. Anxious to read the note, I decline a chair and give the widow her certificates and the decree of admission to the bounties; the only recompense I ask of her is the honor of saluting her hand.

"Oh, my dearest Abate, you shall kiss me, and no one will take it amiss since I am thirty years older than you."

She should have said forty-five.

I give her the two kisses, and she tells me to go and kiss her nieces as well, who instantly took to flight, only Angela remaining to brave my audacity. The widow asks me to be seated.

"Signora, I cannot."

"Why not? What behavior!"

"Signora, I will come back."

"I won't hear of it!"

"I am under a pressing necessity."

"I understand. Nanetta, go upstairs with the Abate and show him."

"Please excuse me, Aunt."

"What a prude! Marta, you go."

"Aunt, make Nanetta obey you."

"Alas, Signora, the young ladies are right. I am leaving."

"Not a bit of it; my nieces are downright fools. Signor Rosa will show you the way."

He takes me by the hand and leads me to the requisite place on the fourth floor, and leaves me there. Here is Nanetta's note:

"My aunt will ask you to supper but you will decline. You will leave when we sit down at table, and Marta will go to light you to the street door, which she will open; but you will not go out. She will close it and come back. Everyone will believe you gone. You will go up the stairs in the dark, and then up two more flights until you reach the fourth floor. The stairs are good. You will wait there for the three of us. We will come after Signor Rosa leaves and we put our aunt to bed. It will rest with Angela herself to grant you the private interview which you desire, and all night long if she so wishes; and I hope it will be a happy one for you."

What joy! What gratitude for the fortunate chance which brought me to read this note in the very place where I was to wait in darkness for the object of my flame! Sure that I should find my way without the least difficulty, and foreseeing no obstacle, I go downstairs to Signora Orio, rejoicing in my good fortune.

CHAPTER V

An untoward night. I fall in love with the two sisters, I forget Angela. A ball at my house. Giulietta humiliated. My return to Pasiano. Lucia's misfortune. A propitious storm.

AFTER expressing her thanks to me at great length, Signora Orio told me that in future I was to enjoy all the privileges of a friend of the family. We spent four hours laughing and joking. I made such good excuses for not staying to supper that she had to accept them. Marta was going to light the way for me; but a direct command from Signora Orio to Nanetta, whom she believed to be my favorite, obliged her to precede me, candlestick in hand. The sly vixen hurried down the stairs, opened the door, banged it shut, put out the candle and, leaving me there, ran back up to rejoin her aunt, who sharply reprimanded her for treating me so shabbily. I groped my way upstairs to the appointed place, and flung myself on a couch like a man who, having given his enemies the slip, awaits the moment of his happiness.

After spending an hour in the most pleasing reveries, I hear the street door being opened, then closed and double-locked, and ten minutes later I see the two sisters, followed by Angela. I disregard the others completely and spend two whole hours talking only with her. Midnight strikes; I am pitied for having gone supperless; but the tone of commiseration offends me; I answer that, in such happiness, it would be impossible for me to feel any lack. I am told that I am in prison, since the key to the house door is under Signora Orio's bolster, who will not open it until dawn, to go to the first mass. I am astonished that anyone should think I could consider this bad news; on the contrary, I am happy to have five hours before me and to be sure that I shall spend them with the object of my adoration. An hour later Nanetta laughs under her breath. Angela insists on knowing what she is laughing at; she whispers in her ear; Marta laughs too; I ask them to tell me why they are laughing; and finally Nanetta, looking chagrined, tells me that she has no other candle and that when this one burns out we shall be left in darkness. This news fills me with joy, but I hide it. I tell them that I am sorry on their account. I suggest that they go to bed and sleep in peace, assuring them of my respect; but this proposal sets them laughing again.

"What shall we do in the dark?"

"We'll talk."

There were four of us, we had been conversing for three hours, and I was the hero of the play. Love is a great poet: its matter is inexhaustible; but if the end at which it aims never arrives, it sinks like dough at the baker's. My dear Angela listened, but not being fond of talking, answered very little; she was not particularly clever; instead, she prided herself on showing sound common sense. To weaken my arguments she usually only launched a proverb, as the Romans fired a catapult. She drew away, or repulsed my poor hands with the most offensive gentleness, whenever love called them to its aid. Yet I continued to talk and use my hands without losing courage. But I became desperate when I saw that my too subtle arguments confused her instead of convincing her and, instead of softening her heart, troubled it. I was completely astonished to read on Nanetta's and Marta's faces the impression which the shafts I was shooting straight at Angela made on them. This metaphysical curve seemed to me out of the course of nature; it should have been an angle. Unfortunately I was studying geometry at that period. Despite the season, I was sweating great drops. Nanetta got up to carry out the candle, which would have made an unbearable stench if it had guttered out in our presence.

No sooner is it dark than my arms naturally rise to take possession of the object necessary to the state of my soul; yet I cannot but laugh when I find that Angela has seized the previous moment to make sure that she will not be caught. I spent a whole hour saying the most amusing things which love could invent to persuade her to come back and sit on the same seat. I thought it impossible that she could really be in earnest. "This joke," I said at last, "has gone on too long; it is against nature; I can't run after you, and it amazes me to hear you laughing; such strange behavior makes it seem that you are mocking me. So come and sit down. Since I have to talk to you without seeing you, at least my hands should assure me that I am not talking to the air. If you are making a mock of me, you must realize that you are insulting me, and love, I believe, should not be put to the test of insult."

"Very well! Calm yourself. I am listening to you and not losing a single word; but you must realize too that I cannot in decency permit myself to sit close to you in the dark."

"So you want me to stay here like this until dawn?"

"Lie down on the bed and sleep."

"You amaze me—how can you consider that possible, to say nothing of compatible with my passion? Come now! I am going to pretend I'm playing blindman's buff."

Upon that, I get up and vainly seek her all over the room. I catch someone; but it is always Nanetta or Marta, whose pride makes them name themselves at once; whereupon, stupid Don Quixote that I am, I consider it my duty to let them go. Love and prejudice prevent me from realizing the cowardice of such respect. I had not yet read the anecdotes of Louis XIII, King of France; but I had read Boccaccio.[1] I continue to hunt for her. I reproach her with her cruelty, I put it to her that she ought to let herself be found, and she answers that it is as hard for her to find me as it is for me to find her. The room was not large, and I began to be furious at never managing to catch her.

More disgusted than exhausted, I sit down and spend an hour telling the story of Ruggiero when Angelica disappeared from his sight by means of the magic ring which the lovelorn knight had all too guilelessly given her.

Così dicendo, intorno a la fontana
Brancolando n'andava come cieco
O quante volte abbraciò l'aria vana
Sperando la donzella abbracciar seco.[2]

("So saying he went stumbling around the fountain like a blind man. Oh, how often he embraced the empty air, hoping to embrace the damsel!")

Angela did not know Ariosto, but Nanetta had read him several times. She began defending Angelica and putting the blame on the simplicity of Ruggiero, who, if he had been sensible, should never have entrusted the coquette with the ring. Nanetta enchanted me; but I was too stupid in those days to make reflections which would have led me to change my conduct.

I had only an hour before me; nor could I wait for daylight, since Signora Orio would rather be dead than miss her mass. I spent this last hour talking only to Angela, trying first to persuade her, and then to convince her, that she should come and sit beside me. My soul passed through the whole scale of colors, in a crucible of which the reader can have no idea unless he has been in a similar situation. After using every conceivable argument, I had recourse to prayers, then (infandum [“unutterable”] [3]) to tears. But when I realized that they were useless, the feeling which took possession of me was the righteous indignation which ennobles anger. I believe I should actually have struck the proud creature who had been monster enough to keep me for five whole hours in the most cruel kind of distress, if I had not been in the dark. I showered her with all the insults which a scorned love can suggest to an enraged mind. I hurled fanatical curses at her; I swore that all my love had changed to hate, and ended by warning her to beware of me, for I should certainly kill her as soon as my eyes could see her.

My invectives ended with the darkness of night. At the first glimmerings of dawn and at the noise made by the great key and the bolt when Signora Orio opened the door to go out and put her soul in the state of repose which was a daily necessity to her, I made ready to leave, taking my cloak and hat. But, reader, I cannot depict the consternation of my soul, when, glancing at the faces of the three girls, I saw them melting into tears. In such shame and despair that I felt tempted to kill myself, I sat down again. I reflected that my brutality had driven those three beautiful souls to sobs. I could not speak. Feeling choked me; tears came to my rescue, and I indulged in them with delight. Nanetta rose and told me that her aunt must soon be back. I quickly wiped my eyes, and without looking at them or saying a word, I left and went straight home to bed, where I could not get a wink of sleep.

At noon Signor Malipiero, noticing that I was greatly changed, asked me the reason for it, and, feeling a need to unburden my soul, I told him all. The wise old man did not laugh. His very sensible remarks were balm to my soul. He knew that he was in the same situation in respect to Teresa. But he could not help laughing, nor could I, when he saw me eat with the appetite of a dog. I had not supped; but he complimented me on my excellent constitution.

Resolved not to return to Signora Orio's, about that time I defended a metaphysical thesis in which I maintained that "any being which can be conceived only abstractly can exist only abstractly." I was right; but it was easy to make my thesis look impious, and I was obliged to retract it. I went to Padua, where I was granted the degree of Doctor utroque jure.[4]

On my return to Venice I received a note from Signor Rosa in which he told me that Signora Orio wished me to come and see her. I went in the evening, when I was sure that I should not find Angela, whom I wanted to put out of my mind. Nanetta and Marta were so gay that they dispelled the shame I felt at appearing before them after two months; but my thesis and my doctorate substantiated my excuses to Signora Orio, whose only reason for wanting to see me was to complain of my never visiting her any more. As I left, Nanetta handed me a letter containing one from Angela. "If you have the courage," Angela's letter ran, "to spend another night with me, you will not have cause to complain, for I love you. I wish to know from your own lips if you would have continued to love me if I had consented to dishonor myself."

Here is the letter from Nanetta, who was the only intelligent one of the three girls. "Signor Rosa having undertaken to persuade you to return to our house, I wrote this letter beforehand to let you know that Angela is in despair over losing you. The night that you spent with us was cruel, I admit; but it seems to me that it should not have made you determine not to come again, at least to see Signora Orio. I advise you, if you still love Angela, to risk one more night. She will perhaps be able to justify herself, and you will leave happy. So come. Adieu."

These two letters delighted me. I saw that I could now avenge myself on Angela by treating her with the most open contempt. I went on the first feast day, with two bottles of Cyprus wine[5] and a smoked tongue in my pocket, and was surprised not to find the hardhearted vixen there. Turning the conversation to her, Nanetta said that Angela had told her that morning at mass that she could not come until suppertime. I saw no reason to doubt it, so when Signora Orio asked me to stay I did not accept. Just before the supper hour I pretended to leave, as I had the time before, and ensconced myself in the appointed place. I could not wait to play the delightful role I had planned. I felt sure that even if Angela had made up her mind to change her tactics, she would grant me no more than small favors, and these no longer interested me. My only remaining emotion was a great desire for revenge.

Three quarters of an hour later I hear the street door shut, and ten minutes after that I hear footsteps coming up the stairs, and I see before me—Nanetta and Marta.

"But where is Angela?" I ask Nanetta.

"She must have been unable either to come or to send word. Yet she must know that you are here."

"She thinks she has tricked me, and I admit I did not expect this; now you know her as she is. She is laughing at me in triumph. She used you to make me fall into the snare; and she is better off, for if she had come it would have been I who laughed at her."

"Permit me to doubt that."

"Never doubt it, my dear Nanetta; you shall be convinced of it by the delightful time we shall have tonight without her."

"In other words, as a sensible man you will make the most of second-best; but you shall go to bed here, and we will go and sleep on the couch in the other room."

"I shall not prevent you; but you would be playing a cruel trick on me, and in any case I should not go to bed."

"What! You would have the endurance to spend seven hours with us? I am sure that when you run out of things to say you will fall asleep."

"We shall see. In the meanwhile here is a tongue and here is some Cyprus wine. Can you be cruel enough to let me eat by myself? Have you some bread?"

"Yes, and we will not be cruel. We'll eat a second supper."

"It is you I ought to be in love with. Tell me, beautiful Nanetta, if you would make me unhappy as Angela does."

"Do you think I can answer such a question? Only a conceited fool could ask it. All I can tell you is that I haven't the least idea."

They quickly set three places, brought bread, Parmesan cheese, and water, and, laughing all the while, they ate with me and shared my Cyprus wine, which, as they were not used to it, went to their heads. Their gaicty became delightful. Looking at them, I was surprised at not having realized all their good qualities until that moment.

Sitting between them after our late supper, I took and kissed their hands and asked them if they were truly my friends and if they approved of the contemptible way in which Angela had treated me. They answered together that they had wept for me. "Then permit me," I said, "to feel the fondness of a true brother for you, and do you feel for me as if you were my sisters; let us exchange pledges of our affection in the innocence of our hearts; let us kiss each other and swear eternal fidelity."

The first kisses I gave them came neither from amorous desire nor from any intention to seduce them, and for their part they swore to me some days later that they returned them only to assure me that they shared my innocent feeling; but these harmless kisses soon became ardent and began to kindle a fire in the three of us which must have taken us aback, for we broke off and then looked at each other in grave astonishment. The two sisters made some excuse to move away, and I remained absorbed in thought. It is not surprising that the fire which these kisses had kindled in my soul, and which was even then creeping through all my limbs, made me fall invincibly in love with the two girls on the instant. They were both of them prettier than Angela, and Nanetta's quick intelligence and Marta's gentle and artless nature made them infinitely superior to her: I felt greatly surprised that I had not recognized their qualities before that moment; but they were well-born and utterly innocent girls, and the chance which had put them into my hands must not prove to be their ruin. Nothing but blind vanity could have made me believe that they loved me; but I could well suppose that the kisses had affected them even as they had me. On this assumption it was plain to me that, in the course of the long night I was to spend with them, I should not find it difficult to bring them to concessions whose consequences would be nothing short of crucial. This thought filled me with horror. I resolved to exercise the severest restraint, and I did not doubt that I should find the strength to observe it.

They reappeared, and when I saw that their faces expressed nothing but trust and contentment, I instantly cast mine in the same mold, firmly resolving that I would not expose myself to the fire of kisses again.

We spent an hour talking of Angela. I told them I was determined not to see her again, since I was convinced that she did not love me. "She loves you," said the artless Marta, "I am sure of it; but if you do not mean to marry her you had better break with her entirely, for she is resolved not to grant you the slightest favor so long as you are only her lover: so you must either leave her or reconcile yourself to her granting you nothing."

"Your reasoning is perfect; but how can you be sure that she loves me?"

"Nothing is surer. And now that we have promised to love each other like brother and sister, I can frankly tell you why. When Angela sleeps with us, she covers me with kisses and calls me her 'dear Abate.' "

Nanetta burst out laughing and put a hand over her sister's mouth; but this artlessness so set me on fire that I had the greatest difficulty in controlling myself. Marta said to Nanetta that, since I was so intelligent, I could not fail to know what two girls who were good friends did when they were in bed together.

"Certainly, my dear Nanetta," I added, "everyone knows about these little games, and I cannot believe that your sister has been too indiscreet in making this confession."

"Well, it is done now; but one does not talk about these things. If Angela knew—"

"She would be in despair, I am sure, but Marta has given me such a proof of her friendship that I shall be grateful to her until I die. It is over and done with. I loathe Angela, I shall never speak to her again. She is false-hearted, she wants to destroy me."

"But if she loves you she has every right to want you to marry her."

"True enough; but the tactics she employs have no other aim than her own advantage, and since she knows how I suffer she cannot behave as she does unless she does not love me. Meanwhile, by a make-believe as false as it is monstrous, she assuages her beastly desires with this charming Marta, who kindly serves as her husband."

At this Nanetta's laughter redoubled; but I did not change my serious expression and went on talking to Marta in the same style, praising her admirable sincerity with the most high-flown eloquence.

Finding that the subject was giving me the greatest pleasure, I told Marta that Angela ought to play the part of her husband too; whereupon she laughed and said that she only played husband to Nanetta, which Nanetta was obliged to admit.

"But by what name does Nanetta call her husband," I asked Marta, "in her transports?"

"Nobody knows."

"So then you love someone," I said to Nanetta.

"Yes, I do, but no one shall ever know my secret."

At this, I flattered myself that Nanetta might secretly be Angela's rival. But with all this charming talk, I lost any wish to spend the night in idleness with these two girls who were made for love. I said I was very glad that I entertained only friendly feelings toward them, for otherwise I should find it extremely hard to spend the night with them without wishing to give them proofs of my love and to receive proofs of theirs, "for," I added coolly, "you are both ravishingly beautiful and more than capable of turning the head of any man whom you will allow to know you as you are." After this speech I pretended I wanted to go to sleep. "Don't stand on ceremony," Nanetta said, "get into bed. We will go and sleep on the couch in the other room."

"If I did that, I should consider myself the most contemptible of men. Let us talk: my sleepiness will pass off. I am only sorry on your account. It is you who should get into bed, and I will go to the other room. If you are afraid of me, lock yourselves in, but you would be wrong, for I love you only with the heart of a brother."

"We will never do that," said Nanetta. "Please do as we say, and go to bed here."

"If I keep my clothes on, I shan't sleep."

"Then undress. We won't look at you."

"That doesn't worry me; but I could never get to sleep, with you obliged to stay up on my account."

"We'll go to bed too," said Marta, "but we won't undress."

"Such distrust is an insult to my integrity. Tell me, Nanetta, do you consider me a man of honor?"

"Yes, certainly."

"Well and good. Do you want to convince me of it? You must both lie down beside me completely undressed, and count on my word of honor, which I now give you, that I will not touch you. You are two and I am one—what have you to fear? Won't you be free to leave the bed if I do not behave myself? In short, if you will not promise to show me this proof of your confidence, at least when you see that I have fallen asleep, I will not go to bed."

I then stopped talking and pretended to fall asleep, and they whispered together; then Marta told me to get into bed and said they would do likewise when they saw that I was asleep. Nanetta made the same promise, whereupon I turned my back to them, took off all my clothes, got into the bed, and wished them good night. I pretended to fall asleep at once, but within a quarter of an hour I was asleep in good earnest. I woke only when they came and got into the bed, but I at once turned away and resumed my sleep, nor did I begin to act until I had reason to suppose that they were sleeping. If they were not, they had only to pretend to be. They had turned their backs to me and we were in darkness. I began with the one toward whom I was turned, not knowing whether it was Nanetta or Marta. I found her curled up and covered by her shift, but by doing nothing to startle her and proceeding step by step as gradually as possible, I soon convinced her that her best course was to pretend to be asleep and let me go on. Little by little I straightened her out, little by little she uncurled, and little by little, with slow, successive, but wonderfully natural movements, she put herself in a position which was the most favorable she could offer me without betraying herself. I set to work, but to crown my labors it was necessary that she should join in them openly and undeniably, and nature finally forced her to do so. I found this first sister beyond suspicion, and suspecting the pain she must have endured, I was surprised. In duty bound religiously to respect a prejudice to which I owed a pleasure the sweetness of which I was tasting for the first time in my life, I let the victim alone and turned the other way to do the same thing with her sister, who must be expecting me to demonstrate the full extent of my gratitude.

I found her motionless, in the position often taken by a person who is lying on his back in deep, untroubled sleep. With the greatest precautions, and every appearance of fearing to waken her, I began by delighting her soul, at the same time assuring myself that she was as untouched as her sister; and I continued the same treatment until, affecting a most natural movement without which I could not have crowned my labors, she helped me to triumph; but at the moment of crisis she no longer had the strength to keep up her pretense. Throwing off the mask, she clasped me in her arms and pressed her mouth on mine. After the act, "I am sure," I said, "that you are Nanetta."

"Yes, and I consider myself fortunate, as my sister is, if you are honorable and loyal."

"Even unto death, my angels! All that we have done was the work of love, and let there be no more talk of Angela."

I then asked her to get up and light some candles, but it was Marta who obliged. When I saw Nanetta in my arms on fire with love, and Marta holding a candle and looking at us, seeming to accuse us of ingratitude for not saying a word to her, when, by having been the first to yield to my caresses, she had encouraged her sister to imitate her, I realized all my good fortune.

"Let us get up," I said, "and swear eternal friendship and then refresh ourselves."

Under my direction the three of us made an improvised toilet in a bucket of water, which set us laughing and renewed all our desires; then, in the costume of the Golden Age, we finished the rest of the tongue and emptied the other bottle. After our state of sensual intoxication had made us say a quantity of those things which only love can interpret, we went back to bed and spent the rest of the night in ever varied skirmishes. It was Nanetta who joined in the last. Signora Orio having gone to mass, I had to leave them without wasting time on words. After swearing that I no longer gave a thought to Angela, I went home and buried myself in sleep until dinnertime.

Signor Malipiero remarked on my happy look and the dark circles around my eyes, and I let him imagine whatever he pleased but told him nothing. I went to Signora Orio's house the next day but one, and since Angela was not there I stayed for supper, then left with Signor Rosa. Nanetta found an opportunity to hand me a letter and a packet. The packet contained a piece of dough on which was the impression of a key, and the letter told me to have the key made and to come and spend the night with them whenever I wished. It also said that Angela had come and spent the next night with them and that, in the course of their usual practices, she had guessed all that had happened and that they had admitted it and reproached her with being the cause. She had treated them to the coarsest insults and sworn never to set foot in the house again. But they did not care.

A few days later, fate delivered us from Angela. She went to live in Vicenza with her father,[6] who spent two years there decorating a number of houses with frescoes. I was thus left in undisturbed possession of these two angels, with whom I spent at least two nights a week, always being expected and gaining entrance with the key they had found means to obtain for me.

About the end of the Carnival, Signor Manzoni told me that the famous Giulietta wanted to talk with me and that she had always been disappointed not to see me again. Wondering what she could have to say to me, I went there with him. After receiving me politely enough, she said that she had been told I had a splendid drawing room in my house and that she would like me to give a ball for her there at her expense. I consented at once. She gave me 24 zecchini and sent her servants to fit up my drawing room and the other rooms with chandeliers, so that I had only to see to the orchestra and the supper. Signor Sanvitale had already left, and the government of Parma had appointed a steward to manage his affairs. I saw him ten years later at Versailles, decorated with various royal orders as Grand Equerry to the eldest daughter of Louis XV, the Duchess of Parma, who, like all the French princesses, could not abide living in Italy.

My ball went well. The only guests were Giulietta's circle and, in a small room, Signora Orio with her two nieces and the advocate Rosa whom, as people of no importance, she had allowed me to invite.

After supper, when the company were dancing minuets, she took me aside and said, "Quick! take me to your room; I've just had an amusing idea, and we'll have a good laugh."

My bedroom was on the fourth floor, and thither we repair. I observe that she immediately locks the door; I did not know what to think. "I want you," she said, "to dress me up as an abate in one of your suits, and I will dress you as a woman in my dress. We will go downstairs in these disguises and dance the quadrilles. Come, hurry, my dear friend, we'll begin by doing our hair."

Sure of making a conquest, and delighted at the novelty of the adventure, I quickly coil up her long hair and then let her make me a chignon which she arranges very neatly under her own bonnet. She puts rouge and some patches on my face, I submit with good grace, at the same time frankly letting her see that I am enjoying it, and she is pleased to grant me a sweet kiss, on condition that I should not look for anything more; I answer that everything must depend upon her. Meanwhile, I warn her that I adore her.

I lay on the bed a shirt, a neckband, a pair of drawers, black stockings, and a coat and breeches. Faced with having to drop her skirt and petticoat, she adroitly puts on the drawers and says that they fit well, but when she tries to put on my breeches she finds that they are too tight in the waist and at the top of the thighs. There is nothing for it but to unsew them in the back and, if need be, to cut the material. I undertake to do all this; I sit down on the foot of the bed and she stands with her back toward me, but she says that I want to see too much, that I am going about it clumsily, that I am taking too long, and that I touch her where there is no need to; she loses patience, she leaves me, she rips open the breeches and fixes them herself. I put my stockings and shoes on her, then slip the shirt over her head, but as I arrange the ruffle and the neckband she finds my hands too curious, for her bosom was bare. She upbraids me, she calls me vile names, but I take no notice; I was determined that she should not make a dupe of me; then too, she was a woman for whom a hundred thousand scudi had been paid, and who could not but be of interest to a thinking man. At last she was dressed and it was my turn.

I quickly take off my breeches despite her insisting that I keep them on; she has to put her shift on me herself, and then her skirt; but, suddenly turning coy, she berates me for not concealing the too visible effect of her charms upon me, and she refuses me the relief which would have calmed me in an instant. I try to give her a kiss; she resists; it is my turn to lose patience and, despite her, the result of my incontinence visibly stains the shift. She insults me, I reply in kind, and tell her that she is entirely to blame; but it is no use, she continues to sulk; however, she had to finish what she had begun and put the rest of her clothes on me.

Obviously, any respectable woman who had got herself into such a situation with me would have had amorous intentions and would not have belied them just when she saw that I shared them; but women of Giulietta's sort are governed by a perversity which makes them their own enemies. Giulietta felt she was tricked when she saw that I was not timid. My readiness seemed to her a lack of respect. She would have liked me to steal a few favors, which she would have granted me without seeming aware of it. But I was not willing to flatter her vanity to that extent.

Wearing our disguises, we went down to the drawing room, where general applause instantly put us in a good humor. Everyone supposed that I had made the conquest which had escaped me; but I was well pleased to let it be believed. I joined a quadrille with my abate, whom I was chagrined to find charming. During the evening Giulietta treated me so well that, believing she had repented of her scurvy behavior, I likewise repented of mine; but this was a momentary weakness for which Heaven was to punish me.

After the quadrille all the men felt entitled to take liberties with Giulietta in her role of abate; and on my side I did not restrain myself with the girls, who would have feared to be thought stupid if they had objected to my proceedings. Signor Querini was fool enough to ask me if I had on breeches, and I saw him go pale when I answered that I had had to give them to the abate. He went and sat in a corner of the room, and would not dance again.

The entire company having in course of time become aware that I had on a woman's shift, no one any longer doubted my good fortune, except Nanetta and Marta, who could not believe that I would be unfaithful. Giulietta realized that she had done a very stupid thing, but there was no help for it now.

As soon as we returned to my room to undress, thinking that she had repented and having, in the meanwhile, become possessed by a desire for her, I thought I could venture to kiss her and at the same time take one of her hands to convince her that I was ready to accord her all the satisfaction she deserved; but she gave me such a violent box on the ear that I very nearly returned the compliment. After that I undressed without looking at her and she did likewise. We went downstairs together; but despite the cold water with which I washed my face, the whole company could see on it the mark of the heavy hand which had struck it.

Before she left, she took me aside and told me emphatically that if I had any wish to get myself thrown out of a window, I had only to come to her house, and that she would have me assassinated if what had happened between us became known.

I gave her no cause to do either, but I could not prevent people from telling the story of our exchanging shifts. Since I was not seen at her house again, everyone thought that my absence was an atonement demanded by Signor Querini. The reader will see, six years later in these memoirs, on what occasion this notorious woman was obliged to pretend she had forgotten the entire incident.

I spent a very happy Lent with my two angels, at Signor Malipiero's receptions, and studying experimental physics at the monastery of La Salute.[7]

After Easter, having to keep the promise I had made to the Countess of Montereale and impatient to see my dear Lucia again, I went to Pasiano. I found a very different set of people from those who had been there the previous autumn. Count Daniele, who was the oldest member of the family, had married a Countess Gozzi;[8] and a rich young tenant farmer, who had married a goddaughter of the old Countess, was suffered to be present with his wife and his sister-in-law. I found supper a very long affair. I had been given the same room, and I could not wait to see Lucia, for I had made up my mind that my days of behaving like a child with her were over. . . .

Not having seen her before I went to bed, I was certain that she would be there when I woke in the morning; but instead I see only an ugly peasant woman. I ask her for news of the family, but I learn nothing for she can speak only Friulian. This is the local dialect.

I feel uneasy. What can have become of Lucia? Has our relationship been discovered? Is she ill? Is she dead? I stop asking myself questions and get dressed. If she has been forbidden to see me I will have my revenge, for one way or another I will find means to see her, and my desire for vengeance will make me do what honor prevented me from doing despite my love.

Enter the caretaker, looking woebegone. I immediately ask him how his wife and his daughter are, and when I name the latter he bursts into tears.

"Is she dead?"

"Would to God that she were!"

"What has she done?"

"She has run away with L'Aigle, Count Daniele's courier, and we do not know where."

His wife arrives in time to hear these words, which renews her grief and she faints. The caretaker, seeing me sincerely sharing his sorrow, tells me it was only a week ago that this misfortune had befallen him. "I know L'Aigle," I said. "He is a famous scoundrel. Did he ask you for her hand in marriage?"

"No, for he was sure that we would not consent."

"I am amazed at Lucia."

"He seduced her, and we did not realize until after she was gone why she was getting fat."

"Then they had been seeing each other for a long time?"

"She got to know him a month after your departure. He must have put a spell on her, for she was a perfect angel, and I believe you can bear witness to it."

"And does nobody know where they are?"

As downcast as these decent people, I buried myself in the woods to ruminate my grief. I spent two hours in the most various reflections, some of them sound, others unsound, but all beginning with if. If I had arrived, as I might easily have done, a week earlier, my loving Lucia would have confided everything to me and I should have prevented this murder. If I had proceeded with her as I did with Nanetta and Marta, I should not have left her in the aroused state which must have been the chief cause of her yielding to the scoundrel's desires. If she had not known me before she met the courier, her still innocent soul would not have listened to him. I was in despair at being forced to admit that I was the agent of the infamous seducer, that I had worked on his behalf.

> El fior che sol potea pormi fra dei,
> Per non turbar, ohimé! l'animo casto
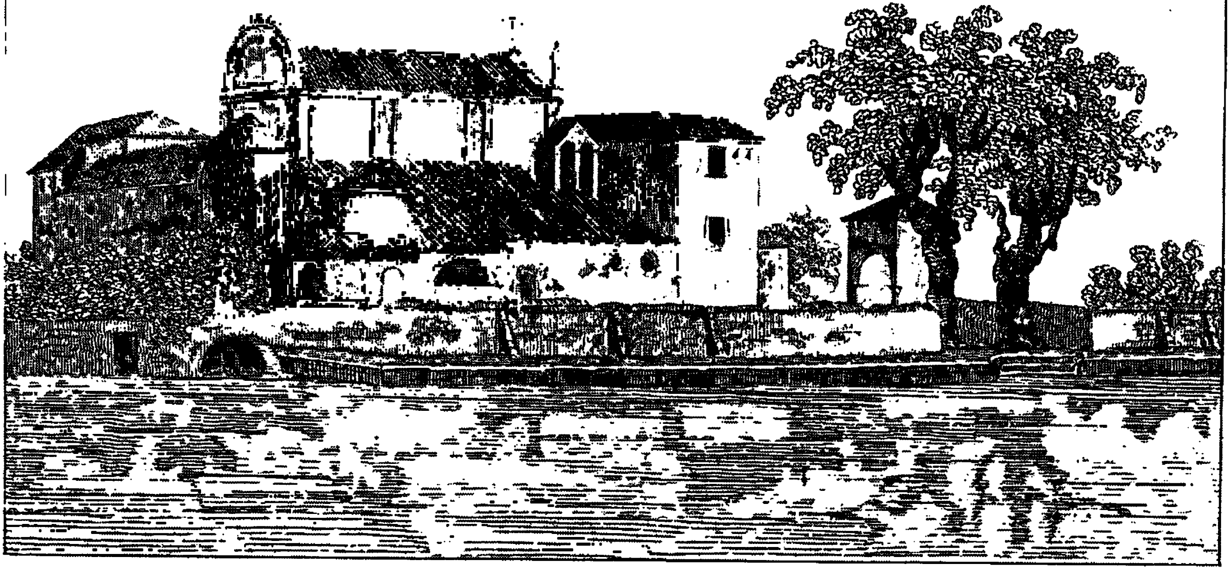
> ("And the flower which alone could raise me to the rank of the gods, the flower which I was keeping intact in order not to trouble, alas! that chaste soul, alas! he has plucked it and destroyed it.")

It is certain that if I had known where to look for her with any likelihood of finding her, I should have set off immediately. Before I knew of the disaster which had overtaken Lucia, I was proud, in my vanity, that I had been virtuous enough to leave her a virgin; and now I repented in shame of my stupid restraint. I promised myself that in the future I would behave more wisely so far as restraint was concerned. What made me most unhappy was the thought that before long, when Lucia would have sunk into unhappiness and perhaps infamy, she could not remember me without loathing and hate me as the original cause of her misfortunes. This disastrous outcome caused me to adopt a new principle of conduct, which I later carried too far.

I rejoined the lively company in the garden, which so restored me that at dinner I was the delight of the table. My sorrow was so great that I had either to put it ruthlessly behind me, or else leave. What gave me a flying start was the newly married lady's face, and even more her character, which was something wholly new to me. Her sister was the prettier of the two; but virgins were beginning to alarm me. I saw too much trouble ahead. . . .

The bride, who was between eighteen and twenty years of age, attracted the attention of the entire company because of her affected manners. Endlessly talkative, with an inordinate store of maxims which she saw fit to display, devout, and in love with her husband, she did not conceal the pain he caused her by showing that he was captivated by her sister, who always sat opposite to him at table and whom he always served. This husband of hers was a fool, who perhaps loved his wife very much but considered that he owed it to good manners to appear indifferent to her and who flattered his vanity by giving her reasons to be jealous. For her part, she was afraid she would be thought stupid if she did not notice them. The society of well-bred people embarrassed her precisely because she wanted to pass for accustomed to it. When I chattered idly away she listened attentively and, for fear of being thought stupid, laughed in the wrong places. She finally roused my curiosity to the point where I determined to take her in hand. Within three days my



Seminary and Church of San Cipriano, Murano assiduities, my antics, my attentions great and small made everyone aware that I had designs on her. My conduct was publicly pointed out to her husband but, nothing daunted, he laughed when he was told that I was dangerous. I feigned modesty and sometimes indifference. For his part, he stuck to his role and urged me to flirt with his wife, who, in her turn, gave a very poor performance as la disinvolta.[10]

On the fifth or sixth day, when I was walking in the garden with her, she made the mistake of saying that she had good reason for her anxiety, and how wrong it was in her husband to give her cause for it. I answered that, speaking as a friend, the only way for her to bring him to reason quickly was to pretend not to notice his attentions to her sister and, indeed, to pretend to be in love with me. To persuade her to this course, I told her that it was difficult and that only a woman of great intelligence could play so false a role. She assured me that she would play it to perfection; but she played it so badly that everyone saw the plot was of my own devising.

When I chanced to be with her in some walk of the garden where I was certain that no one could see us, and tried to make her play her role in good earnest, she first became serious, then haughty, and finally adopted the ill-advised expedient of running away from me and joining the others, who thereupon laughed at me and told me I was a poor hunter. After such an incident I vainly reproached her with the factitious triumph which she thus bestowed on her husband. I praised her intelligence and said that her upbringing had been deplorable. To calm her, I said that the way I behaved toward a woman of intelligence like herself was what was customary in good society. But after ten or twelve days she made me desperate by saying that, as a priest, I ought to know that any question of love made the slightest touch a mortal sin, that God saw everything, and that she would neither damn her soul nor risk the shame of having to tell her confessor that she had sunk to committing abominable acts with a priest. I told her that I was not a priest; but she finally floored me by asking if I would admit that what I wanted to do to her was a sin. Not having the effrontery to deny it, I saw that I must make an end.

When my treatment of her caused the old Count to remark before the entire table that my coldness was due to the fact that the expected had happened, I did not fail to point out to my bigot what conclusions her conduct suggested to people who knew the world; but it was to no avail. And now here is the strange incident which brought on the dénouement to the play.

On Ascension Day we all went to call on Signora Bergalli,[11] a famous ornament of the Italian Parnassus. When it was time to return to Pasiano the tenant-farmer's pretty bride started to get into the four-seated carriage in which her husband and her sister had already taken places, thus leaving me all by myself in a two-wheeled chaise. I protested, loudly complaining of her unjust suspicions; and the company all insisted that she must not insult me in this fashion. At that she came in with me, and upon my telling the postilion that I wanted to go by the shortest route, he left all the other carriages and took the road through the forest of Cecchini. The sky was clear, but in less than half an hour a storm came up, one of those storms which come up in Italy, last half an hour, seem to be trying to turn the earth and the elements upside down, and subside into nothing, with the sky cleared and the air cooler; so that usually they do more good than harm.

"Oh my God!" said the bride. "We are in for a storm."

"Yes, and though the chaise is covered, the rain will ruin your dress, I'm sorry to say."

"What do I care about my dress? It's the thunder I'm afraid of."

"Stop up your ears."

"And the lightning?"

"Postilion, take us somewhere where we can find shelter."

"The nearest houses," he answered, "are half a league from here, and in half an hour the storm will be over."

So saying, he drives calmly on. There is a flash of lightning, then another, thunder rumbles, and the poor woman is shaking all over. The rain comes down. I take off my cloak to use it to cover us both in front; and, heralded by an enormous flash, the lightning strikes a hundred paces ahead. The horses rear, and the poor lady is seized by spasmodic convulsions. She throws herself on me and clasps me in her arms. I bend forward to pick up the cloak, which had fallen to our feet, and, as I pick it up, I raise her skirts with it. Just as she is trying to pull them down again, there is another flash of lightning, and her terror deprives her of the power to move. Wanting to put the cloak over her again, I draw her toward me; she literally falls on me, and I quickly put her astride me. Since her position could not be more propitious, I lose no time, I adjust myself to it in an instant by pretending to settle my watch in the belt of my breeches. Realizing that if she did not stop me at once, she could no longer defend herself, she makes an effort, but I tell her that if she does not pretend to have fainted, the postilion will turn and see everything. So saying, I leave her to call me an impious monster to her heart's content, I clasp her by the buttocks, and carry off the most complete victory that ever a skillful swordsman won.

The rain coming down in torrents and the wind blowing straight in our faces, she is reduced to telling me with the greatest seriousness that I am ruining her reputation, for the postilion must be able to see her.

"I can see him," I answered, "and he has no idea of turning around, and even if he did my cloak covers us both completely; be reasonable and act as if you were in a faint, for I tell you I have no intention of letting you go."

She gives in, at the same time asking me how I can defy the lightning with such impious daring; I answer that the lightning is on my side, she is inclined to believe me, she has lost almost all her fear, and having seen and felt my ecstasy, she asks me if I have finished. I laugh and answer no, I want her consent until the storm is over. "Consent, or I will pull off my cloak."

"You are a monster who will have made me miserable for the rest of my days. Are you satisfied now?"

"No."

"What do you want?"

"A flood of kisses."

"Oh, how wretched I am! Well, there you are!"

"Tell me that you forgive me. Admit that I have given you pleasure."

"Yes. You can see that for yourself. I forgive you."

At that I wiped her off, and when I asked her to do as much for me, I saw that she was smiling.

"Tell me that you love me," I said.

"No, because you are an atheist and Hell awaits you."

I now put her back in her place and, seeing that the sky had cleared, I assured her that the postilion had never turned around. Joking over our adventure and kissing her hands, I said I was sure I had cured her of her fear of thunder, but that she would never tell anyone the secret of the cure. She answered that at least she was sure no woman had ever been cured before by such a remedy.

"In a thousand years," I said, "it must have happened a million times. I will even tell you that when I got into the chaise I was counting on it, for it was the only way I knew to possess you. Cheer up. I assure you that there is not a timid woman in the world who would have dared to resist in your situation."

"I can well believe it. But in future I will travel with no one but my husband."

"You will make a mistake, for your husband will not have the sense to reassure you as I have done."

"That is true too. One learns the strangest things from you; but you may be sure I will never travel with you again."

In such charming exchanges we reached Pasiano before any of the others. She had hardly got out of the chaise before she ran and locked herself in her room while I was looking for a scudo to give to the postilion. He was laughing.

"Why are you laughing?"

"You know why."

CHAPTER VI

My grandmother's death and its consequences. I lose the good graces of Signor Malipiero. I no longer have a house. La Tintoretta. I am put in a seminary. I am expelled. I am imprisoned in a fortress.

AT SUPPER no one talked of anything but the storm, and the tenant farmer, who knew his wife's weakness, told me he was sure I would never travel with her again. "Nor I with him," she retorted, "for he is an unbeliever who conjured up the lightning with his jokes."

The woman avoided me so successfully that I never found myself alone with her again.

On my return to Venice, I had to suspend my usual activities on account of the last illness of my good grandmother, whom I never left until I saw her expire.[1] She could leave me nothing, for she had given me all she possessed during her lifetime. This death had consequences which obliged me to adopt a new way of life. A month later I received a letter from my mother telling me that since there was no likelihood of her being able to return to Venice, she had decided to give up the house she had kept there. She said that she had communicated her intention to the Abate Grimani, whose wishes I was to obey. He, after selling all the furnishings, would see to it that I was settled in a good boardinghouse, and do the same for my brothers and my sister. I called on Signor Grimani to assure him that he would always find me obedient to his commands. The rent for the house was paid until the end of the year.

When I learned that at the end of the year I should be without a house and that all the furnishings were to be sold, I no longer stinted myself in my wants. I had already sold some linen and tapestries and pieces of porcelain; I set about selling mirrors and beds. I knew that I should be taken to task; but it was my father's inheritance, upon which my mother had no claim; I considered myself within my rights. As for my brothers, there would always be time to discuss it.

Four months later I received a letter from my mother dated from Warsaw and containing another. Here is a translation of my mother's letter: "I have made the acquaintance here, my dear son, of a learned Minimite,[2] a Calabrian, whose great qualities made me think of you every time he honored me with a visit. A year ago I told him that I had a son who was preparing for the priesthood but whom I had not the means to keep. He answered that my son would become his own if I could persuade the Queen[3] to appoint him to a bishopric in his native Calabria. The thing would be done, he said, if she would have the goodness to recommend him to her daughter the Queen of Naples.[4] Trusting in God, I flung myself at Her Majesty's feet, and I found favor. She wrote to her daughter, who arranged for Our Lord the Pope[5] to appoint him to the bishopric of Martorano.[6] True to his word, he will take you with him the middle of next year, for to reach Calabria he has to pass through Venice. He has written to you himself, answer him at once, send me your answer, and I will deliver it to him. He will set you on the road to the highest dignities of the Church. Imagine my happiness when, twenty or thirty years from now, I see you at least a bishop. Until he arrives, the Abate Grimani will take care of you. I give you my blessing, and I am, etc. . . .''

The Bishop's letter, which was in Latin, said the same thing. It was full of unction. He informed me that he would stay in Venice only three days. I answered as might be expected. These two letters turned my head. Good-by, Venice! Absolutely certain that the highest fortune would be mine at the end of my course, I could not wait to enter upon it; and I congratulated myself that I felt not the slightest regret for all that I should leave behind by leaving my country. ''I have done with trifling,'' I told myself. ''In future I shall concern myself only with what is great and substantial.'' Signor Grimani, after congratulating me to the skies on my good fortune, assured me that he would find me a boarding-house where I could live from the beginning of the coming year while I waited for the Bishop.

Signor Malipiero, who was a wise man in his fashion, and who saw me carried away by vain pleasures in Venice, was delighted when he saw me on the verge of setting out to fulfill my destiny elsewhere and read my ardent delight in the eager readiness with which I adapted myself to what circumstances had offered me. On this occasion he gave me a lesson which I have never forgotten. He told me that the famous precept of the Stoics, sequere Deum (''follow the God''),[7] meant neither more nor less than ''surrender yourself to what fate offers you, provided that you do not feel a strong repugnance to doing so.'' ''This,'' he went on, ''was the demon of Socrates, saepe revocans raro impellens ('which often forbids, seldom prompts');[8] and this the source of the fata viam inveniunt ('Destiny finds the way')[9] of the same Stoics.'' Herein lay the wisdom of Signor Malipiero, who had learned it without ever having studied any book but that of man's moral nature.

However, the maxims of the same school played a part in something which happened to me a month later, which brought me into disfavor with him, and which taught me nothing.

Signor Malipiero believed that he could recognize in the faces of young people signs indicative of the absolute dominion which Fortune would exercise over them. When he saw this, he took them under his protection so that he could teach them to assist Fortune by wise conduct for, as he said with great good sense, ''medicine in the hands of the foolhardy is poison, as poison becomes medicine in the hands of the wise.''

Accordingly, he had three protégés for whose education he did everything in his power. One was Teresa Imer, of whose innumerable vicissitudes my readers will find some account in these memoirs. I was the second, of whom they may judge as they see fit, and the third was one of the gondolier Gardela's daughters,[10] who was three years younger than I, and so far as prettiness goes, her face did bear a most striking sign. To put her on the stage, the philosophical old man was having her take dancing lessons, ''for,'' he said, ''the ball cannot go into the pocket unless someone gives it a push.'' She is the Gardela who, under the name of Agata, had a brilliant success in Stuttgart. She became the first acknowledged mistress of the Duke of Württemberg[11] in the year 1757. She was charming. She was in Venice when I left and she died there two or three years ago. Her husband, Michele Dall'Agata, poisoned himself soon afterward.

One day after having all three of us dine with him he left, as he always did, to take a siesta. The Gardela girl, having to go for a lesson, left me alone with Teresa, whom, though I had never flirted with her, I still found attractive. Sitting side by side at a small table with our backs to the door of the room in which we supposed our patron was sleeping, at a certain turn in the conversation it occurred to us in our innocent gaiety to compare the differences between our shapes. We were at the most interesting point of the examination when a violent blow from a cane descended on my neck, followed by another, which would have been followed by yet more if I had not escaped from the hailstorm at top speed by running out of the room. I went home without my cloak and without my hat. A quarter of an hour later I received them both, together with a note, from the Senator's old housekeeper, who also warned me never again to dare to set foot in His Excellency's palace.

I answered at once, directly to him and in the following terms: "You struck me in anger, hence you cannot boast of having given me a lesson. By the same token, I have learned nothing. I can forgive you only by forgetting that you are wise; and that I shall never forget."

The nobleman was perhaps in the right; but for all his prudence he acted unwisely, since his servants all guessed his reason for banishing me, and so the whole town laughed over the story. He did not dare to address the slightest reproach to Teresa, as she told me some time later; but, naturally, she did not dare ask him to pardon me.

One fine morning not long before our house was to be vacated, I saw before me a man of about forty, wearing a black wig and a scarlet cloak and with a face tanned by the sun, who handed me a note from Signor Grimani directing me to put all the furniture in the house at his disposition after turning it over to him in accordance with the inventory he had with him, of which I must have a duplicate. Fetching my inventory at once, I showed him all the specified pieces of furniture when they happened to be there, and when they were not, telling him that I knew what I had done with them. Taking a high tone, the oaf said he insisted on knowing what I had done with them, to which I replied that I was not answerable to him, then, hearing him begin to bellow, I advised him to clear out in a manner which showed him that I had the whip hand in my own house.

Feeling it incumbent on me to inform Signor Grimani of this occurrence, I called on him before he had risen, but found that my man was there already and had told him the whole story. I had to swallow a severe reprimand. He next demanded that I account for the missing articles of furniture. I answered that I had sold them to keep from running into debt. After calling me a scoundrel and telling me that I had no rights over them, he ordered me to leave his house on the instant.

Beside myself with rage, I start off to find a Jew to whom I can sell whatever is left, but, deciding to stop at my house on the way, I find a bailiff at my door, who hands me a summons. I read it and discover that it was executed at the instance of Antonio Razzetta.[12] This was the man with the tanned complexion. All the doors had been sealed. I cannot even enter my bedroom. The bailiff had gone but had left a guard. I leave and go to see Signor Rosa, who, after reading the summons, tells me that the seals will be removed the next day and that meanwhile he will have Razzetta summoned before the avogadore.[13]

"For tonight," he said, "you must find a bed in some friend's house. This is an outrage, but he shall pay you dearly for it."

"He is acting under Signor Grimani's orders."

"That is his affair."

I went and spent the night with my angels.

The next morning the seals were removed and I went home again; Razzetta not having appeared, Rosa summonsed him in my name under penal law in order to have a warrant issued for his arrest the following day if he did not appear. Early in the morning of the third day a footman of Signor Grimani's brought me a note from his master ordering me to come to his house to talk with him; I went.

Upon my appearance he asked me harshly what I meant to do.

"To secure myself against violence under the protection of the laws, by defending myself from a man with whom I have nothing to do and who forced me to spend the night in a place of ill repute."

"In a place of ill repute?"

"Exactly. Why was I prevented from going home?"

"You are there now. But go at once and tell your advocate to stop all proceedings. Razzetta did nothing except at my order. You were very likely going to sell all the rest of the furniture. Everything has been taken care of. You have a room in San Giovanni Grisostomo in a house belonging to me, the second floor of which is occupied by La Tintoretta,[14] our leading ballerina. Have your clothes and your books taken there and come to dine with me every day. I have put your brother in a good house and your sister in another, so everything is settled."

Signor Rosa, to whom I went at once with an account of all that had happened, advised me to do whatever the Abate Grimani wished, and I followed his advice. I had received satisfaction, and my being admitted to his table was an honor. In addition I was curious about my new lodging with La Tintoretta, who was being much talked about on account of a certain Prince Waldeck[15] who was spending a great deal on her. The Bishop was to arrive in the summer, I had only six more months to spend in Venice awaiting the prelate, who was perhaps to set me on the road to the Papacy. Such were my castles in Spain. After dining that same day at Signor Grimani's, without saying a word to Razzetta who was seated beside me, I went for the last time to my fine house in the parish of San Samuele, where I had everything which I considered my rightful property carried to my new lodging by boat.

Signorina Tintoretta, whom I did not know but with whose conduct and character I was acquainted, was a mediocre dancer but an intelligent girl who was neither pretty nor ugly. Prince Waldeck, who spent a great deal on her, did not prevent her from keeping her former protector. This was a Venetian nobleman of the now extinct Lin family,[16] aged about sixty years, who visited her at all hours of the day. It was this nobleman, who knew me, who entered my room on the ground floor early in the evening to bring me the Signorina's compliments and tell me that she was delighted to have me in her house and that she would be very glad if I would attend her reception. I answered Signor Lin that I did not know that I was lodging in her house, that Signor Grimani had not informed me that the room I was occupying belonged to her, otherwise I would have paid my respects to her even before I had had my few things brought over. After this excuse we went up to the second floor. He presented me and the acquaintance was made. She received me in the style of a princess, taking off her glove to give me her hand to kiss, and after announcing my name to five or six foreigners who were present, she named them to me one after the other and then made me sit down beside her. She was a Venetian, and thinking it absurd that she should converse with me in French, which I did not understand, I begged her to speak the language of our country. Surprised that I did not speak French, she made no attempt to conceal her disappointment, telling me that I would not cut much of a figure at her receptions, at which she received only foreigners. I promised to learn French. The great man arrived an hour later. This generous prince spoke to me in very good Italian and was extremely gracious to me all through the Carnival. Toward the end of it he presented me with a gold snuffbox in return for a very bad sonnet I had had printed in honor of "La Signora Margherita Grisellini detta la Tintoretta." Grisellini was her family name. She was called La Tintoretta because her father had been a dyer. The Grisellini whose fortune was made by Count Giuseppe Brigido[17] was her brother.[18] If he is still alive he is spending a happy old age in the beautiful capital of Lombardy.

La Tintoretta was far better endowed than Giulietta with qualities to captivate men. She was fond of poetry, and I should have fallen in love with her if I had not been expecting the Bishop. She was in love with a physician named Righelini,[19] a young man of the greatest talent who died in the prime of life and whom I still regret. I shall speak of him twelve years hence.

About the end of the Carnival, my mother having written to the Abate Grimani that it was improper for the Bishop to find me lodging in the house of a dancer, he determined to provide a decent and dignified dwelling for me. He consulted the priest Tosello and after discussing the most suitable place for me with him, they decided that nothing could be better than to put me in a seminary. They made all the arrangements without my knowledge, and the priest was charged with giving me the news and persuading me to go there willingly and without regrets.

I could not help laughing when I heard the priest adopting a style meant to soothe me and to gild the pill. I told him that I was ready to go wherever they saw fit to send me. Their idea was sheer madness, for at the age of seventeen and being the kind of person I was, the last thing anyone should have thought of was putting me in a seminary; however, still a disciple of Socrates and feeling no repugnance, I consented; but I thought the whole scheme so laughable that I could hardly wait to be there. I told Signor Grimani that I was ready for anything, provided that Razzetta was to have no part in it. He gave me his promise; but he did not keep it after the seminary; I have never been able to decide if the Abate Grimani was good because he was stupid or if his stupidity was a fault due to his goodness. But all his brothers were of the same stamp. The worst trick that Fortune can play on a young man of great talent is to make him answerable to a fool. After providing me with the costume of a seminarian, the priest took me to San Cipriano di Murano[20] and presented me to the rector.

The patriarchal church of San Cipriano is served by Somaschian monks.[21] The order was founded by the Blessed Girolamo Miani,[22] a Venetian nobleman. The rector received me with affectionate affability. From the unctuous tone of the discourse he delivered to me, I gathered that he thought I was being put in the seminary to punish me or at least to prevent me from continuing a scandalous course of life.

"I cannot believe, most reverend Father, that there is any intention of punishing me."

"No, no, my dear son. I only meant that you will be very happy with us."

I was shown three rooms in which there were at least a hundred and fifty seminarians, ten or twelve classrooms, the refectory, the dormitory, the gardens for walks during the hours of recreation, and I was given to expect that my life here would be the happiest a young man could desire, to the point where I should regret leaving it when the Bishop arrived. At the same time they seemed to be trying to encourage me by telling me I would be there at most for five or six months. Their eloquence made me laugh. I entered the seminary at the beginning of March. I had spent the night between my two wives, who, like Signora Orio and Signor Rosa, could not bring themselves to believe that a lad of my temperament could be so docile. They sprinkled the bed with their tears mingled with mine.

The evening before, I took all my papers to Signora Manzoni, who promised to keep them for me as a sacred trust. They made a considerable package, which I withdrew from that honorable woman's custody fifteen years later. She is still alive and in good health at the age of ninety. Laughing heartily at the stupidity which was putting me into a seminary, she maintained that I would not stay there more than a month at most.

"You are wrong, Signora; I am glad to go there and I shall wait there until the Bishop arrives."

"You know neither yourself nor the Bishop, with whom you will not remain either."

The priest accompanied me to the seminary. But halfway there he had the gondola stop at San Michele,[23] for I had been seized by a fit of vomiting which appeared to be choking me. The friar who was the apothecary restored me to health with melissa cordial. The attack was the effect of the amorous efforts I had made all night with my two angels, whom I feared I was holding in my arms for the last time. I do not know if my reader knows the state of a lover who, taking leave of the object of his love, fears that he will not see her again. He pays the final compliment and, when it is paid, refuses to let it be the last and repeats it until he sees his soul run out in blood.

The priest left me in the rector's custody. My trunk and my bed had already been taken to the dormitory, to which I went to leave my cloak and hat. I was not put in the class with the adults, because, despite my height, I was not old enough. I had the vanity to keep my face unshaven; I cherished that down because it left no doubt of my youth. It was absurd; but at what age does a man cease to indulge in absurdities? He gets rid of his vices more easily. Tyranny did not go so far with me as to require that I be shaved. But I found it tolerant only in this respect.

"In what school," the rector asked me, "do you wish to be put?"

"Doctrinal theology, most reverend Father; I want to learn the history of the Church."

"I will take you to the Father Examiner."

"I am a doctor and do not wish to take an examination."

"It is obligatory, my dear son. Come."

I considered this an insult. I was outraged. I instantly determined on taking a strange revenge, the idea of which filled me with joy. I answered all the questions, which the examiner asked me in Latin, so badly and committing so many solecisms,[24] that he had to put me in the lower grammar class, where, to my great satisfaction, I found myself with eighteen or twenty boys of nine or ten years who, when they learned that I was a doctor, all fell to repeating Accipiamus pecuniam et mittamus asinum in patriam suam ("Let us take the money and send the ass back to his country").

At recreation time my dormitory companions, who were all at least in the school of philosophy, looked at me scornfully and, as they were talking to one another about their abstruse theses, laughed at my appearing to listen to their arguments, which could not but be unintelligible to me. I had no idea of betraying my secret. But three days later an unavoidable circumstance unmasked me.

Father Barbarigo, a Somaschian from the monastery of La Salute in Venice, who had had me as a pupil in physics, and who had come to call on the rector, saw me coming out from mass and paid me a thousand compliments. The first question he asked me was what subject I was studying, and he thought I was joking when I replied that I was in the grammar class. The rector then came up, and we all went to our classes. An hour later the rector appeared and called me out.

"Why," he asked me, "did you pretend ignorance at your examination?"

"Why were you so unjust as to make me take it?"

Looking rather annoyed, he took me to the school of doctrinal theology, where my dormitory companions were astonished to see me. During the after-dinner recreation period they all made friends with me, gathering around me, and put me in a good humor.

A handsome seminarian of fifteen years, who, if he is not dead, is a bishop, was the one whose person and talent particularly impressed me. He inspired feelings of the strongest friendship in me, and during the recreation hours, instead of playing skittles, I did nothing but walk with him. We talked poetry. The finest odes of Horace were our delight. We preferred Ariosto to Tasso, and Petrarch was the object of our admiration, as Tassoni[25] and Muratori,[26] who had criticized him, were of our scorn. Within four days we became such fond friends that we were jealous of each other. We sulked when one of us left the other to walk with anyone else.

A lay monk was in charge of our dormitory. His function was to keep order in it. After supper the whole pack of us, led by this monk, who was called the prefect, proceeded to the dormitory; there each one went to his bed, and after saying his prayers in a low voice, undressed and got quietly in. When the prefect saw that we were all in bed, he went to bed too. The place, which was a rectangle eighty paces long by ten wide, was lighted by a large lantern. The beds were placed at equal distances apart. At the head of each bed were a prayer stool, a chair, and the seminarian's trunk. At one end of the dormitory there was a washroom on one side and the small room known as the "water closet" on the other. At the other end, close to the door, was the prefect's bed. My friend's bed was on the other side of the room, opposite to mine. The big lantern was between us.

The prefect's principal duty was to make very sure that no seminarian got into bed with another. Such a visit was never considered innocent; it was a capital crime, for a seminarian's bed is only for him to sleep in, not to give him a chance to talk with a schoolmate. Hence two schoolmates can break this law only for illicit reasons, though they are left free to do anything that they please alone, and so much the worse for them if they abuse themselves. The communities of boys in Germany where the directors are at pains to prevent masturbation are those in which it is most prevalent. The framers of these regulations were ignorant fools who knew neither nature nor morality; because nature, for its own self-preservation, demands this relief in the healthy man who has not the adiutorium[27] of woman, and morality is undermined by the axiom nitimur in vetitum.[28] The prohibition stimulates him. Unhappy the body politic whose legislator was not a philosopher! What Tissot[29] says is partly true only when the young man masturbates without nature's demanding it; but this will never happen to a schoolboy unless someone sees fit to forbid him the practice, for in that case he does it in order to have the pleasure of disobeying, a pleasure natural to all men since the time of Eve and Adam, and which is largely indulged in whenever the opportunity presents itself. The mother superiors of convent schools for girls show much more sense than men do in this respect. They know from experience that there is not a girl who does not begin masturbating at the age of seven, and they never think of forbidding them this childish practice, although it can produce unfortunate results in girls too, though less extensively because the excretion is slight.

It was on the eighth or ninth day of my stay in the seminary that I felt someone come and get into bed with me. He at once presses my hand, at the same time telling me his name, and sets me laughing. I could not see him because the lantern had gone out. It was the Abate with whom I had made friends, who, seeing the dormitory in darkness, took a fancy to pay me a visit. After we had laughed over it together, I asked him to leave, for if the prefect woke up and saw the dormitory dark, he would get up to relight the lamp and we should both be accused of having committed the oldest of crimes, according to some. Just as I was giving him this good advice, we hear footsteps; the Abate flees; but a moment later I hear a great thud, followed by the prefect's hoarse voice saying, "You scoundrel, wait till tomorrow, wait till tomorrow." After relighting the lantern he goes back to bed.

The next morning, even before the rising bell sounded, in comes the rector with the prefect. "Listen to me, all of you," said the rector. "You know what disorderly conduct occurred here last night. Two of you must be guilty, and it is my intention to forgive them and to safeguard their honor by keeping their names from becoming known. You will all come and confess to me today, before the recreation period."

He left. We got dressed, and after dinner all went to confession to him, and then to the garden, where the Abate told me that, having unluckily run into the prefect, he had been obliged to knock him down. This had given him time to get into bed.

"And now," I said, "you are sure of being forgiven, for you have 'been a good boy' and confessed the truth to the rector."

"You are joking. I would not have told him anything even if the innocent visit I paid you had been sinful."

"Then you must have made a false confession, for you were guilty of disobedience."

"Possibly. But the blame is his, because he forced us."

"My dear friend, your reasoning is perfect, and by now the Reverend Father must have learned that our dormitory is cleverer than he is."

This affair would have had no further consequences if, three or four nights later, I had not taken it into my head to return my friend's visit. An hour after midnight, having had to go to the water closet and hearing the prefect snoring on my way back, I quickly snuffed out the wick of the lamp and got into my friend's bed. He recognized me at once and we laughed together, but both keeping an ear open for our guardian's snores. Suddenly he stops snoring and, seeing the danger, I get out of my friend's bed without losing an instant and take only a moment to get into mine. But I was hardly in it before I have two surprises. The first is that I am beside someone; the second, that I see the prefect in his nightshirt, with a candle in his hand, walking slowly along between the two rows of beds looking sharply now to the right, now to the left. I understood that the prefect must have instantly lighted a candle with a powder tinderbox. But how was I to understand what was before my eyes? The seminarian in my bed was lying with his back to me, sound asleep. Without taking time to reflect, I decide to pretend I am asleep too. At the prefect's second or third shake I pretend to wake up; and my companion wakes in good earnest. Amazed to find himself in my bed, he stammers out excuses.

"I lost my way coming from the water closet in the dark; but the bed was empty."

"That may well be," I answered, "for I went to the water closet too."

"But," said the prefect, "how did you come to lie down without a word when you found your place taken? And, it being dark, how could you have failed to suspect that you were mistaken in thinking it was your bed?"

"I wasn't mistaken, for I groped until I found the pedestal of this crucifix here. As for the boy in my bed, I didn't notice him."

"That is not very likely."

At the same time he goes to the lamp, and seeing that the wick had been crushed:

"It did not go out," he said, "of itself. The wick is submerged, and that can only be the work of one of you two, who put it out on purpose when he went to the water closet. We shall see about this in the morning."

My fool of a roommate got into his bed, which was beside mine, and the prefect, having relighted the lamp, got into his. After this scene, which woke the whole dormitory, I slept until the rector appeared at dawn accompanied by the prefect and looking very angry.

After examining the scene of the crime and subjecting first the boy who had been found in my bed, and who of course was considered the guiltier, to a long interrogation and then questioning me, without succeeding in convicting me of any crime, he left, ordering us all to dress for mass. We were no sooner ready than he came back and, addressing the boy who was my neighbor and myself, "You are both," he said to me gently, "convicted of scandalous complicity, for you must have agreed together to put out the lamp. I am willing to believe all this disorder is, if not innocent, at least the result of nothing worse than thoughtlessness; but the whole dormitory has been scandalized and the discipline and the rules of this establishment gravely infringed, and the outrage calls for punishment. Go outside."

We obeyed; but no sooner were we between the two doors of the dormitory than four menservants seized us, tied our arms together behind our backs, brought us back inside, and made us kneel down before the great crucifix. In the presence of all our schoolmates, the rector then preached us a short sermon, at the conclusion of which he told his henchmen, who were behind us, to carry out his orders.

I then felt seven or eight strokes from a rope or a stick rain down on my shoulders, all of which, like my stupid companion, I took without uttering a single word of complaint. As soon as I was untied I asked the rector if I might write two lines at the foot of the crucifix. He had ink and paper brought me at once, and here is what I wrote:

"I swear by this God that I have never spoken to the seminarian who was found in my bed. My innocence therefore demands that I protest and that I appeal against this shameful act of violence to Monsignor the Patriarch.''

My companion in suffering signed my protest; and I asked all present if any one of them could declare the contrary of what I had sworn to in writing. All the seminarians then said with one voice that we had never been seen speaking together and that there was no way of knowing who had put out the lamp. The rector left in confusion, amid a storm of whistles and catcalls, but he nevertheless sent us to prison on the sixth floor of the monastery, separated from each other. An hour later my bed and all my belongings were brought up, as were my dinner and supper every day. On the fourth day the priest Tosello came to me with an order to take me to Venice. I asked him if he had gone into my case; he answered that he had talked with the other seminarian, that he knew the whole story and believed us to be innocent; but that he did not know what he could do about it. ''The rector,'' he said, ''refuses to admit that he is wrong.''

I thereupon threw off my seminarian's garb and dressed as one does in Venice, and we got into Signor Grimani's gondola, in which he had come, while my bed and trunk were loaded onto a boat. The priest instructed the boatman to take everything to the Palazzo Grimani. On the way he told me that Signor Grimani had told him, when he disembarked me in Venice, to warn me that if I dared to go to the Grimani palace the servants had orders to turn me away.

He took me to I Gesuiti,[30] where he left me without a soldo and possessed of nothing but what I had on.

I went to dinner at Signora Manzoni's and she laughed to find that her prophecy had come true. After dinner I went to see Signor Rosa, to take legal action against tyranny. He promised me he would bring an extrajudiciary to Signora Orio's, whither I at once went to wait for him and to cheer myself by the surprise of my two angels. It was beyond expression. What had happened to me astonished them. Signor Rosa came and gave me the document to read, though he had not had time to have it notarized. He assured me that I should have it the next day. I went to supper with my brother Francesco, who was boarding in the house of the painter Guardi. Tyranny was as heavy on him as it was on me, but I promised him I would deliver him from it. About midnight I went to Signora Orio's and made my way to the fourth floor, where my little wives, certain that I would not fail them, were waiting for me. On that night, I confess to my shame, worry disabled love, despite the two weeks I had spent in abstinence. I found myself having to think, and the proverb "C. . . non vuol pensieri"[31] is incontestably true. In the morning they condoled with me; but I promised them they would find me very different that night.

Having spent the whole morning in the Library of San Marco,[32] because I did not know where to go and had not a soldo, I left it at noon and was on my way to dine at Signora Manzoni's when a soldier came up and told me to go and speak to someone who was waiting for me in a gondola which he pointed out to me at one of the quays of the Piazzetta. I answered that whoever wanted to speak to me had only to come forward; but when he whispered to me that he had a companion with him who was well able to make me go by force, I did not hesitate but went. I loathed scandal and the disgrace of publicity. I could have resisted, and I should not have been arrested, for the soldiers were not armed and an arrest under such circumstances is forbidden in Venice. But this did not occur to me. The sequere Deum ("follow the God")[33] played its part. I felt no repugnance to going. Besides, there are moments when even a brave man either is not brave or does not wish to show it.

I enter the gondola, the curtain is drawn, and I see

Razzetta with an officer. The two soldiers sit down at the prow, I recognize Signor Grimani's gondola. It leaves the landing and heads in the direction of the Lido. No one says a word to me and I keep the same silence. After half an hour the gondola arrives at the small port of the fortress of Sant'Andrea,[34] which is at the entrance to the Adriatic, where the Bucentaur[35] stops when the Doge goes on Ascension Day to wed the sea.

The sentinel calls the corporal, who allows us to disembark.

The officer who was accompanying me presents me to the Major and hands him a letter. Having read it, he orders Signor Zen, his adjutant, to put me in the guardhouse and leave me there. A quarter of an hour later I saw them leave, then Adjutant Zen reappeared and gave me three and a half lire, and told me that I would receive the same amount every week. This came to ten soldi a day, which was exactly the pay of a soldier. I felt no anger, but a great indignation. Toward evening I gave a guard money to buy me something to eat so that I should not die of inanition. Then, stretched out on some planks, I spent a sleepless night in the company of some Slavonian soldiers who did nothing but sing, eat garlic, smoke tobacco which poisoned the air, and drink so-called Slavonian wine. It is like ink and only Slavonians can drink it.

Very early the next morning Major Pelodoro, for such was his name, had me brought up to his office and told me that in making me spend the night in the guardhouse he had only obeyed the order he had received from the Minister of War, whose title in Venice is Savio alla Scrittura.[36]

''From now on, Signor Abate, my only orders are to keep you under arrest at the fortress and to be responsible for your person. I give you the whole fortress for your prison. You have a good room, to which your bed and your trunk were brought yesterday. You may walk wherever you please; only remember that if you escape you will be the cause of my ruin. I am sorry that I have been ordered to give you only ten soldi a day; but if you have friends in Venice who are in a position to give you money, write to them and trust to me for the safety of your letters. Now go to bed if you need sleep."

I was conducted to my room, which was a fine one on the second floor with two windows which gave me a magnificent view. I saw my bed made up, and my trunk, of which I had the keys and which had not been forced. The Major had kindly had writing material placed on a table for me. A Slavonian soldier came and politely told me that he would wait on me and that I should pay him when I could, for everyone knew that I had only ten soldi. After eating a good dish of soup, I locked my door, then went to bed and slept for nine hours. When I woke, the Major sent to invite me up to his house for supper. I saw that things were not going so badly.

I wait on this honorable man, whom I find entertaining a large company. After introducing me to his wife, he named the other persons present to me. They were for the most part military officers, except for two, one of whom was the almoner of the fortress and the other a musician from the Church of San Marco named Paolo Vida; his wife was the Major's young sister, whom her husband obliged to live at the fortress because he was jealous of her, for in Venice jealous men always find their living quarters uncomfortable. The other women present were neither pretty nor ugly, neither young nor old; but the kindness they showed me made them all of interest to me.

What with my natural gaiety, the well-bred company at table were easily able to put me in a good humor. Everyone being curious to know what had provoked Signor Grimani to confine me there, I gave a detailed and faithful narrative of everything which had befallen me since the death of my good grandmother. This narrative kept me talking for three hours, without bitterness and often making a joke of things which would otherwise have been offensive, so that the whole company went off to bed assuring me of the most affectionate friendship and offering to serve me in any way.

Until I was fifty, I always had the same good fortune whenever I was the victim of oppression. As soon as I found myself with decent people who were curious to know the story of the misfortune which had befallen me, I no sooner told it than I inspired in them friendliness enough to take my part and be useful to me. The trick I used to accomplish this was to relate the facts truthfully, not omitting certain circumstances which it takes courage to reveal. Therein lies the secret, which not everyone can apply, for the greater part of the human race is made up of cowards; I know from experience that truth is a talisman whose charms are unfailing, provided that it is not wasted on fools. I believe that a guilty man who dares to admit his guilt to a just judge is more likely to be absolved than an innocent man who equivocates. Of course the speaker must be young, or at least not old, for the old man has all nature as his enemy.

The Major joked a good deal about the visit I received in my bed and then returned in the seminarian's, but the almoner and the women scolded him for it. He advised me to write my whole story to the Savio alla Scrittura and undertook to convey it to him, assuring me that he would become my protector. All the women urged me to follow the Major's advice.

CHAPTER VII

My brief stay in the fortress of Sant'Andrea. My first repentance in love. The pleasures of vengeance and brilliant proof of an alibi. Arrest of Count Bonafede. I am set free. Arrival of the Bishop. I leave Venice.

THIS fortress, in which the Republic usually kept only a garrison of a hundred disabled Slavonian soldiers, was then populated by two thousand Albanians. They were called Cimarioti.[1] The Minister of War, whose title in Venice is Savio alla Scrittura, had summoned them from the Levant on the occasion of a promotion. The officers were to be given the opportunity to prove their merit and to see it rewarded. They were all natives of the part of Epirus which is called Albania and which belongs to the Republic. It was then twenty-five years since they had distinguished themselves in the last war between the Republic and the Turks.[2] For me it was a spectacle as new as it was surprising to see eighteen or twenty officers, all elderly and in good health and all with scars on their faces and chests, which they kept bared from vanity. The Lieutenant Colonel literally had a quarter of his head missing. One ear, one eye, and his jawbone were nowhere to be seen. Yet he spoke and ate well enough; he was a most cheerful man and had brought along his whole family, which consisted of two pretty daughters, whom their costume made all the more interesting, and seven sons all soldiers. This man, who was six feet tall and well built, had a face made so ugly by his horrible wound that he inspired fear. Nevertheless I liked him at once, and I should have talked with him often if he could have stopped eating garlic as freely as I ate bread. He always carried at least twenty cloves of it in his pocket, as one of us would carry sweetmeats. Can anyone doubt that garlic is a poison? Its only medical virtue is to restore appetite to animals off their feed.

This man did not know how to write, but he was not ashamed of it for, with the exception of the priest and a surgeon, no one in the regiment could do so. All of them, officers and soldiers alike, had their purses full of gold, and at least half of them were married. So I saw five or six hundred women among them and a great number of children. This spectacle, which I was seeing for the first time, kept me occupied and interested. Happy youth! I do not regret it, for it was always giving me something new; for the same reason I loathe my old age, in which I find nothing new except what I read in the gazette, whose existence I happily scorned in those days, and in terrible events which force me to think of the future.

The first thing I did was to unpack from my trunk my whole supply of ecclesiastical clothing. I sold it all to a Jew, sparing nothing. My second act was to send Signor Rosa all the receipts I had for the things I had put in pawn; I told him to have them all sold and to send me the proceeds. As a result of these two maneuvers, I was now able to give my soldier the paltry ten soldi a day which I received. Another soldier, who had been a hairdresser, looked after my hair, which the seminary discipline had made me neglect. I wandered about the barracks looking for something to enjoy. The Major's house for cordiality and the scarred veteran's quarters for a bit of love in the Albanian fashion were my only refuges. Being certain that his Colonel would be appointed Brigadier, he was asking for the regiment in preference to a rival who he feared would defeat him. I wrote a petition for him which, though short, was so strongly worded that the Savio, after asking him who had composed it, promised him what he asked. He returned to the fortress so happy that, clasping me in his arms, he said he owed it all to me. After making me share the family dinner, at which his garlic-flavored dishes burned my soul, he presented me with twelve botargos[3] and two pounds of exquisite crab's-eye tobacco.[4]

The effect of my petition led all the other officers to believe that they would obtain nothing without the help of my pen; and I refused it to no one, which got me into difficulties, for I also served the rival of him whom I had served earlier and who had paid me. Finding myself in possession of thirty or forty zecchini, I no longer feared poverty. But now for an unhappy occurrence which made me spend six dismal weeks.

As I was getting out of bed on April 2nd, the fatal day of my entrance into this world, I saw before me a beautiful Greek woman, who told me that her husband, an ensign, had all the qualities to make him a lieutenant, and that he would be made one were it not that his captain had become his enemy because she refused him certain favors which honor allowed her to grant only to her husband. She shows me his certificates, she asks me to compose a petition for him, which she will herself take to the Savio, and she ends by saying that, as she is poor, she can only reward me for my trouble with her heart. After replying that her heart was the perfect reward for desires, I proceeded with her in the fashion of a man who hopes to be rewarded in advance, and I find only the resistance which a pretty woman makes as a matter of form. After the act I tell her to come back at noon for the petition, and she is punctual. She has no objection to paying me a second time, and toward nightfall, on the excuse that there are some corrections to be made, she comes and rewards me yet again. However, the next day but one after the performance, instead of finding myself rewarded, I find that I am punished and under the necessity of putting myself in the hands of a spagyrist,[5] who in six weeks restores me to perfect health. When I was fool enough to reproach the woman with her base conduct, she laughed and answered that she had only given me what she had, and that it was for me to be wary. But my reader cannot imagine either the pain or the shame which this misfortune caused me. I felt degraded. The adventure had a consequence which I now proceed to relate, since it may give the curious some idea of my stupidity.

Signora Vida, the Major's sister, whose husband was jealous, confided to me one morning when she happened to be alone with me, not only the anguish her soul suffered from her husband's jealousy but also his cruelty in leaving her to sleep alone for the past four years despite her being in the prime of life. "God grant," she added, "that he does not find out you have spent an hour with me, for he would drive me to despair."

Returning confidence for confidence, and feeling profoundly sorry for her, I told her that if the Greek woman had not put me in a shameful state, she would make me perfectly happy by choosing me as the instrument of her revenge. At these words, which I spoke in the most perfect good faith, and perhaps even as a compliment, she rose and, burning with fury, treated me to every insult which an outraged woman could hurl at a man who had presumed to forget himself. Utterly astonished, but understanding that I might have failed in my duty toward her, I made her a bow. She commanded me never to visit her house again, and told me that I was a conceited ass unworthy of addressing a decent woman. I told her as I left that a decent woman should show more reserve than she had done in this particular. It occurred to me later that she would not have lost her temper if I had been in good health and had set about consoling her in quite a different fashion.

Another untoward incident for which I heartily cursed the Greek woman was a visit from my angels, with their aunt and Signor Rosa, on Ascension Day, the fortress being the place from which the nearest view of the splendid ceremony can be had. I gave them dinner and stayed with them all day. It was in the solitude of a casemate that they flung themselves on my neck, thinking that I would quickly give them good proof of my constancy. But alas! I gave them only a profusion of kisses, pretending to be afraid that someone would come in.

Having written to tell my mother where I was being kept until the Bishop should arrive, she answered that she had written to Signor Grimani in such terms that she was certain he would soon have me released; in regard to the furniture which Razzetta had sold, she told me that Signor Grimani had undertaken to provide the necessary patrimony[6] for my posthumous brother.

This was an imposture. The patrimony was provided thirteen years later,[7] but factitiously and by a stellionate.[8] I shall speak in the proper place of this unfortunate brother of mine, who died in poverty at Rome twenty years ago.

In the middle of June the Cimarioti were sent back to the Levant, the fort was left with a garrison of a hundred disabled soldiers, and, bored and unhappy, I grew more and more angry. Since the heat was extreme, I wrote to Signor Grimani to send me two summer suits, telling him where they should be if Razzetta had not sold them. I was astonished a week later to see Razzetta himself enter the Major's room in company with another man, whom he introduced to him, saying that he was Signor Petrillo,[9] the famous favorite of the Czarina of All the Russias,[10] and had just arrived from Petersburg. I knew him by name, but instead of "famous" he should have said "infamous," and instead of "favorite," "clown." The Major asked them to sit down, and Razzetta, taking a package from Signor Grimani's gondolier, handed it to me, saying, "I've brought you your rags, here they are."

"The day will come," I answered him, "when I shall bring you a rigano." Such is the name of the uniform worn by galley slaves.

At these words he had the effrontery to raise his cane; but the Major petrified him by asking if he wanted to spend the night in the guardhouse. Petrillo, who had not opened his mouth, then told me that he was sorry not to have found me in Venice, for I would have taken him to a brothel.

"We should have found your wife there," I answered.

"I know faces," he replied. "You will be hanged."

The Major then rose, saying that he had some business to finish, and they left. He assured me that he would go the next day and complain to the Savio alla Scrittura. But after this scene I began seriously planning my revenge.

The fortress of Sant'Andrea was completely surrounded by water, and there was no sentinel who could see my windows. Hence a boat under my window, into which I could drop, could put me in Venice for the night and bring me back to the fortress before dawn, after I had accomplished my purpose. The thing was to find a boatman who, for the sake of money, would run the risk of going to the galleys.

Among a number of boatmen who came to bring provisions, one whose name was Biagio caught my attention. When I made my proposition to him, promising him a zecchino, he promised to give me his answer the next day. He told me that he was ready. He had wanted to find out if I was an important prisoner. The Major's wife had told him that I was being held only for some trifling escapades. We settled it that he should be under my window at nightfall with his boat, which he would provide with a mast long enough for me to catch hold of it and slide down.

He was on time. The sky was cloudy, and the tide high; the wind being contrary, I rowed with him. I disembarked at the Riva degli Schiavoni near the Sepolcro and ordered him to wait for me. I was wrapped in a sailor's cloak. I went straight to Sant'Agostino in the Calle Bernardo and got the waiter from the coffeehouse to guide me to the door of Razzetta's house. Certain of not finding him at home at that hour, I rang, and I heard and recognized my sister's voice telling me that if I wanted to find him I should come in the morning. I then went and sat at the end of the bridge to see from which direction he would enter the street. A quarter of an hour before midnight I saw him coming from the direction of the Campo San Polo. This being all I needed to know, I rejoined my boatman and returned to the fortress, getting in by the same window without any difficulty. At five o'clock in the morning everyone saw me walking about the fortress.

These are the measures, and the precautions, which I took to satisfy my hatred of the brute and to make sure that I could prove an alibi if I succeeded in killing him, as I hoped to do.

The day before the night I had fixed on with Biagio, I took a walk with Alvise Zen, the young son of the Adjutant, who was only twelve years old, but whose sly jokes amused me greatly. He later became famous, until the government sent him to live in Corfu twenty years ago. I shall speak of him under the year 1771.

Walking with this boy, then, I pretended to sprain my ankle in jumping down from a bastion. I had two soldiers carry me to my room, and the surgeon of the fortress, suspecting a dislocation, sent me to bed after applying towels soaked in camphor water to my ankle.

Everyone came to see me, and I insisted on my soldier keeping watch over me and sleeping in my room. One glass of brandy was enough to get the man drunk and make him sleep like a dormouse. As soon as I saw that he was asleep, I sent away the surgeon and likewise the almoner, who had a room above mine. At an hour and a half before midnight I climbed down into the boat.

I no sooner reached Venice than I spent a soldo for a good stick and went and sat on the doorstep of the last house but one in the street leading to the Campo San Polo. A narrow canal at the beginning of the street seemed made on purpose for me to throw my enemy into. The canal is no longer to be seen. It was filled in a few years later.

A quarter of an hour before midnight I saw him coming, walking at a slow, steady pace. I hurry out of the street, keeping to the wall to force him to make way for me, and I hit him first on the head, next on the arm, then a more violent blow knocks him into the canal, shrieking and calling out my name. At the same moment a Friulian[11] with a lantern in his hand emerges from a house at my left; I hit him on the hand which holds his lantern, he drops it and runs away down the street; throwing away my stick, I am over the square like a bird and I cross the bridge while everyone was running to the corner of the Campo where the thing had happened. I crossed the canal at San Tomà and in a few minutes was back in my boat. Midnight was striking as I entered my room through the window. I undress in an instant, I wake my soldier with piercing cries and order him to go for the surgeon as I am at death's door with colic. The almoner, wakened by my cries, comes down and finds me in convulsions. Certain that diascord would cure me, he goes for some and brings it to me. But instead of taking it I hide it while he is going for water. After half an hour of play-acting, I say that I feel well again and thank them all, and they leave, wishing me a restful sleep. After sleeping very well, I remained in bed because of my feigned sprain.

Before he left for Venice the Major came to see me and told me that the colic I had suffered came from a melon I had eaten.

An hour after noon I saw the Major again. "I have great news to tell you," he said with a smile. "Razzetta was cudgeled last night and thrown into a canal."

"Wasn't he killed?"

"No, but all the better for you, for your case would be much worse. Everyone is convinced that it was you who committed the crime."

"I am happy to have them think so, for it avenges me in some measure; they will have a hard time proving it."

"You are right. In the meanwhile Razzetta says that he recognized you, as does the Friulian Patissi, whose hand you broke when you knocked the lantern out of it. Razzetta only has a broken nose, three teeth missing, and bruises on the right arm. You have been accused before the Avogadore. As soon as Signor Grimani heard the news, he wrote to the Savio complaining of his having released you without notifying him, and I reached the War Ministry just as he was reading the letter. I assured His Excellency that the suspicion was groundless because I had just left you in bed unable to move because of a sprained ankle; I also told him that at midnight you thought you were dying of colic."

"Was he cudgeled at midnight?"

"That is what the accusation says. The Savio immediately wrote to Signor Grimani that he assured him you had not left the fortress, but that the complainant was at liberty to send commissaries to verify the fact. So you may expect to be questioned in three or four days."

"I shall answer that I am sorry to be innocent."

Three days later a commissary appeared with a clerk from the Avogaria,[12] and the proceedings were over at once. Everyone in the fortress knew of my sprained ankle; and the chaplain, the surgeon, the soldier, and several others who knew nothing about it, all swore that at midnight I had thought I was dying of colic. As soon as my alibi was found to be unassailable, the Avogadore who had received the riferta[13] sentenced Razzetta and the lantern carrier to pay the costs, without prejudice to my rights.

On the Major's advice I then presented the Savio with a petition in which I demanded my release, and I informed Signor Grimani of my action. A week later the Major told me that I was free and that he himself would present me to Signor Grimani. It was at table, and when we were at our merriest, that he told me this news. I did not believe it, but wishing to pretend that I did I answered that I preferred his house to the city of Venice and that to convince him of it I would remain in the fortress another week if he would let me. I was taken at my word, amid cries of delight.

When, two hours later, he confirmed the news to me so that I could no longer doubt it, I repented of the stupid present of a week I had given him; but I did not have the heart to break my promise. His wife's demonstrations of her delight had been such that to go back on my word would have made me a scoundrel. This excellent woman knew that I owed everything to her, and she was afraid that I would not realize it. But now for the last event in which I was involved at the fortress and which I must not pass over in silence.

An officer in the national uniform entered the Major's room, followed by a man who seemed to be about sixty years of age and who wore a sword. The officer handed the Major a sealed letter from the War Ministry, which he read and answered on the spot, and the officer departed alone.

The Major then told the gentleman, whom he addressed as Count, that he had received orders from the highest quarter to keep him in confinement and that his prison was the entire fortress. The gentleman then made to hand him his sword, but he generously refused it and conducted him to the room he had chosen for him. An hour later a servant in livery arrived, bringing the prisoner a bed and a trunk, and the same morning the same servant came and invited me, in his master's name, to breakfast with him. I went, and he at once addressed me as follows:

"Signor Abate, there has been so much talk in Venice about the brilliant exploit by which you proved the reality of an incredible alibi, that you should not be surprised at my wishing to make your acquaintance."

"When the alibi is real, Count, it is no exploit to prove it. Those who doubt it, permit me to say, pay me an ill compliment, because—"

"Then let us say no more about it, and excuse me. But since we have become fellow prisoners, I hope you will grant me your friendship. Now let us breakfast."

After breakfast, when he had learned from my own lips who I was, he considered that he owed me the same courtesy.

"I am," he said, "Count Bonafede.[14] In my youth I served under Prince Eugene, then left the military service for a civil career, first in Austria and then, because of a duel, in Bavaria. It was in Munich that I carried off a young lady of station and brought her here, where I married her. I have been here for the past twenty years, I have six children, everyone in the city knows me. A week ago I sent my lackey to the Flanders post[15] for my letters, but he was refused them because he did not have money enough to pay the postage. I went to the office myself and told them that I would pay when the next regular mail arrived. But it was no use; they refused to give them to me. I went up to see Baron von Taxis, who manages the post, to complain of the insult; but he rudely told me that his clerks did nothing except by his orders and that when I paid the postage I should have my letters. As I was in his house, I succeeded in restraining my first impulse and left; but a quarter of an hour later I wrote him a note in which I informed him that I considered I had been insulted and that I demanded satisfaction from him, warning him that I would wear my sword when I went out and that he would give me satisfaction wherever I found him. I found him nowhere; but yesterday the secretary of the State Inquisitors told me privately that I must forget the Baron's rudeness and go with an officer, who was waiting outside, and submit myself to imprisonment in this fortress, where he assured me that he would leave me for only a week. I shall thus have the very real pleasure of spending it with you."

I answered that I had been free for twenty-four hours; but that in token of my gratitude for the confidence he had just made me, I would accept the honor of keeping him company. Since I had already given my word to the Major, this was a white lie such as politeness condones.

After dinner, as we were standing together on the tower of the fortress, I pointed out to him a two-oared gondola which was coming toward the little port. After looking at it through a spyglass, he told me that his wife was coming to visit him, with their daughter. We went to meet them.

I saw a lady who might well have been worth carrying off and a tall girl between fourteen and sixteen years of age, who struck me as a beauty of a new kind. She was light blonde, with large blue eyes, an aquiline nose, and a fine mouth, whose smiling, half-parted lips showed, as if inadvertently, the edges of two splendid rows of teeth, as white as her complexion if its rosy tint had not made it impossible to see how white it was. Her figure was so slight that it seemed artificial, and her bosom, which was broad above, revealed itself as a splendid tablet unbroken save by two little rosebuds, rather far apart.

Emaciation here displayed a new kind of sumptuousness. Lost in ecstatic contemplation of this charmingly undeveloped bosom, I could not turn my insatiable eyes from it. My soul instantly gave it all that one could wish to find there. I raised my eyes to the Signorina's face, and her smiling look seemed to be saying: "In a year or two you will see in me all that you now only imagine."

She was elegantly turned out in the fashion of the time, with large hoops and a dress of the sort worn by girls of the nobility who have not yet reached the age of puberty; but the young Countess had reached it. I had never looked at the bosom of a well-born girl so openly; I thought I was more than free to look at a place where there was nothing, but which made that its boast.

When the conversation in German between the Count and Countess was over, it was my turn. He presented me in the most flattering terms, and the introduction was acknowledged in the most gracious way possible. Since the Major felt it incumbent upon him to show the Countess the fortress, I made good use of my inferior rank. I gave my arm to the Signorina, behind her mother and the attendant Major. The Count remained in his room.

Since I knew how to attend a lady only in the old Venetian fashion, the Signorina found me awkward. I considered that I was paying her the most polite attention when I put my hand under her arm. She drew away, laughing heartily. Her mother turns around to ask what she was laughing at, and I am nonplussed to hear her say that I had tickled her armpit. "This," she told me, "is the way a polished gentleman gives his arm."

So saying, she put her hand through my right arm, though, engaged in trying my utmost to regain my composure, I rounded it awkwardly again. The Signorina, concluding that she had to deal with the rawest of novices, decided to amuse herself by humiliating me.

She began by telling me that by rounding my arm as

I had done, I kept her away from my side so that I was out of drawing. I confessed that I did not know how to draw and asked her if she did. She answered that she was taking lessons and that, when I came to see her, she would show me the "Adam" and the "Eve" by the Cavaliere Liberi,[16] which she had copied and which her drawing masters admitted that they found beautiful, though they did not know they were her work.

"Why conceal it from them?"

"Because the two figures are too naked."

"I am not curious about your 'Adam,' but very much so about your 'Eve.' She will interest me, and I will keep your secret."

Her laughter made her mother turn around again. I played the simpleton. It was when she undertook to show me how to offer my arm that I conceived this stratagem, seeing the great advantage that I could reap from it. Finding me so ingenuous, she thought there could be no harm in telling me that her Adam was far finer than her Eve, for she had not left out a single one of his muscles, whereas none were to be seen on the woman.

"It is," she said, "a figure in which there is nothing to see."

"But it is precisely that nothing which will interest me."

"I assure you the Adam will please you better."

This exchange had affected me so strongly that I had become indecent and quite unable to hide the fact, for, the heat being intense, I was wearing linen breeches. I was afraid I should become a laughingstock to the Countess and the Major, who were walking ten paces ahead of us and might well turn round and see me.

A misstep that she made having caused the back of one of her shoes to slip from her heel, she held out her foot to me and asked me to put it right. I went down on my knees in front of her and set to work. She was wearing a wide pannier and no petticoat; forgetting this, she raised her dress a little, but it was enough to leave nothing to prevent me from seeing what very nearly made me drop dead. When I stood up she inquired if I was feeling ill.

As we were coming out of a casemate, her headdress became disarranged, and she asked me to readjust it for her, and bent her head. I could now no longer conceal my condition. She rescued me from my embarrassment by asking if my watch ribbon was a present from some beauty; I stammered out that my sister had given it to me; she now thought that she could convince me of her innocence by asking me tō let her see it close to. I answered that it was sewn to my fob pocket, which was true. Not believing me, she tried to draw it out; but, unable to resist any longer, I pressed my hand upon hers in such a way that she felt it necessary to stop insisting and call a halt. She must have been angry, for in unmasking her game I had been indiscreet. She became serious and afraid to laugh or talk with me any more, and in this fashion we made our way to the sentry-box where the Major was showing her mother the grave of Marshal Schulenburg, whose body[17] was being kept there until a tomb could be built for him. But what I had done made me feel so ashamed that I hated myself and did not doubt that she not only hated me in return but despised me. I supposed that I was the first scoundrel who had alarmed her virtue, and I was ready to do anything to repair the injury, if only someone would tell me what to do. Such was my delicacy at that age, though it was based on the opinion I had conceived of the person I had offended, which might well be mistaken. This trustfulness weakened in me as time went on, until today I have scarcely a trace of it. Nevertheless, I do not consider myself a worse man than my equals in age and experience.

We returned to the Count's quarters and spent the rest of the day dismally enough. At nightfall the ladies left. I had to promise the elder Countess that I would visit her at the Ponte di Barba Fruttarol,[18] where she told me she lived.

The young lady, whom I believed I had insulted, had impressed me so strongly that I spent seven days in the greatest impatience. I could not wait to see her, but only so that I might convince her of my repentance and thus obtain her forgiveness.

The next morning I found his eldest son with the Count. He was ugly, but I thought his manner noble and at the same time modest. Twenty-five years later I encountered him at Madrid, as a garzon[19] in the bodyguard of His Catholic Majesty. He had served for twenty years as a guard before obtaining this rank. I shall speak of him when I come to that time. He insisted that I had never met him and that he had never seen me. His humiliation demanded the lie; I felt sorry for him.

The Count left the fortress on the morning of the eighth day, and I left the same evening, after arranging to meet the Major at a coffeehouse in the Piazza San Marco, whence we were to go together to Signor Grimani's. I had no sooner reached Venice than I went to sup at Signora Orio's, and I spent the night with my angels, who hoped that my Bishop would die on his way to Venice.

When I took leave of the Major's wife, a true woman, whose memory is still dear to me, she thanked me for all I had done to prove my alibi; "but you must thank me, too," she said, "for having known you for what you are. My husband did not learn the whole story until afterwards."

The next day at noon I went to the Abate Grimani's with the Major. He received me as if he felt his guilt. His stupidity astonished me when he told me that I ought to forgive Razzetta and Patissi, who had made a mistake. He said that, as the Bishop was expected to arrive at any moment, he had ordered that I be given a room, and that

I could eat at his table. After that, I went with him to pay my respects to Signor Valaresso,[20] a man of intelligence who, his term having run out, was no longer "Savio." When the Major had left, he asked me to confess that it was I who had cudgeled Razzetta, and I admitted it frankly and amused him by relating the whole story. He thought for a moment and remarked that, since I could not have cudgeled him at midnight, the fools had made a mistake in their story, but that I did not need that in order to prove my alibi, since my sprained ankle, which everyone took to be genuine, had sufficed.

But now at last the moment has come when I shall go to see the goddess of my thoughts, whose forgiveness I was absolutely determined to obtain, or else to die at her feet.

I find her house without difficulty; the Count was not at home. The Countess receives me most graciously, but her appearance so astonishes me that I do not know what to reply.

Going to see an angel, I believed that I should enter a corner of Paradise, and I find myself in a drawing room in which there was nothing but three or four rotting wooden chairs and an old, dirty table. It was almost impossible to see, for the blinds were closed. This might have been to keep out the heat; but no—it was to conceal the fact that the windows had no panes. Even so, I could see that the lady who was receiving me was wrapped in a dress which was all tatters and that her shift was dirty. Seeing that my mind was elsewhere, she left me, saying that she would send her daughter to me.

She appears a moment later, with an air of dignity and ease, and tells me that she has been awaiting me impatiently but not at that hour, when she was not in the habit of receiving visitors.

I did not know what to answer, for she seemed a different person. Her wretched dishabille making her look almost ugly, I find that I no longer feel guilty of anything. I am astonished at the impression she had produced on me in the fortress, and she seems almost glad that I had been surprised into an act which, far from having offended her, must have been flattering to her. Reading all my emotions in my face, she displayed in hers not anger but a mortification which roused my pity. If she had been able, or had dared, to philosophize, she would have had the right to despise me as a man whom she had attracted only by her fine clothes, or by the idea of her rank or her wealth which she had led him to form.

Yet she set about the task of reviving my spirits by speaking to me sincerely. She felt certain that if she could manage to bring feeling into play, it would speak for her.

"I see that you are surprised, Signor Abate, and I know the reason. You expected to find opulence, and finding only a wretched poverty, you are taken aback. The government gives my father only a very small salary, and there are nine of us. Since we are obliged to go to church on feast days and present the appearance which our rank demands, we often have to go without eating in order to redeem the dress and the zendale[21] which need has driven us to put in pawn. We pawn them again the next day. If the priest did not see us at mass, he would strike our names from the list of those who share in the bounties of the Confraternity of the Poor. It is this charity which maintains us."

What a story!—as she had foreseen. Feeling overwhelmed me, but it was much more a feeling of shame than of sympathy. Not being rich, and being no longer in love, I first gave a great sigh and then became colder than ice.

However, I answered becomingly, talking sense to her in a kindly way and with a show of concern. I told her that if I were rich I should easily convince her that she had not confided her plight to a man without a heart, but that since I was on the eve of leaving Venice, she must see that my friendship could be of no service to her. I ended with the stupid commonplace which is always used to console a girl oppressed by poverty, even if she is respectable. I predicted that every imaginable happiness would come to her from the irresistible power of her charms. "That," she answered thoughtfully, "may well be, provided that he who is conquered by them knows that they are inseparable from my feelings and, by respecting these, renders me the justice which is my due. I aspire only to a lawful union, without demanding either high rank or wealth; I have lost all faith in the one and I can do without the other, for I have long been accustomed to poverty and even to going without the necessities of life, impossible as that may seem. But let us go and look at my drawings."

"You are most kind, Signorina."

Alas! I had forgotten all about them, and her Eve could no longer interest me. I followed her.

I enter a room in which I see a table, a chair, a small mirror, and a bed turned up so that only the bottom of the mattress was visible. The spectator was thus left free to imagine that there were sheets; but the last straw was a stench of no recent date; it finished me off. Never was lover more quickly cured. I had no other wish than to go and never come back, though I was sorry I could not leave a handful of zecchini on the table; it would have ransomed me and at the same time cleared my conscience.

She showed me her drawings; I thought them good and praised them, but without lingering over her Eve or joking about her Adam, as I would have done if I had been in a different frame of mind. As a matter of form, I asked her why, having so much talent, she did not turn it to account by learning to paint in pastel.

"I wish I could," she answered, "but the box of colors alone costs two zecchini."

"Will you forgive me if I make bold to offer you six?"

"Alas! I accept them; I am grateful to you and happy to be so far in your debt."

Unable to hold back her tears, she turned so that I should not see them. I quickly laid the sum on the table, and it was out of politeness and to spare her any humiliation that I saluted her lips with a kiss which she was free to believe came from love. I wanted her to attribute my moderation to respect. Taking my leave, I promised to come back some other day to pay a call on her father the Count; but I did not keep my promise. The reader will learn in due course in what a situation I found her when I saw her again ten years later.

What reflections when I left that house! What a lesson! Thinking of reality and imagination, I gave the latter the preference, for the former is dependent upon it. The source of love, as I learned later, is a curiosity which, combined with the inclination which nature is obliged to give us in order to preserve itself, leads to all the rest. Woman is like a book which, be it good or bad, must begin to please with its title page; if that is not interesting, it does not rouse a desire to read, and that desire is equal in force to the interest the title page inspires. Woman's title page runs from top to bottom like that of a book, and her feet, which inspire interest in so many men of my stamp, are of the same interest as the edition of the book is to the man of letters. Most men pay no attention to a woman's beautiful feet, and most readers do not notice the edition. Hence women make no mistake in taking such pains over their persons and their clothing, for it is only by these that they can arouse a curiosity to read them in those whom nature at their birth declared worthy of something better than blindness. Now, just as those who have read many books are always curious to read new ones, even if they are bad, as time goes on a man who has loved many women, all of them beautiful, reaches the point of feeling curious about ugly women if they are new to him. He sees a painted woman. The paint is obvious to him, but it does not put him off. His passion, which has become a vice, is ready with a strong argument in favor of the fraudulent title page. "It is quite possible," he tells himself, "that the book is not as bad as all that; indeed, it may have no need of this absurd artifice." He decides to scan it, he tries to turn over the pages—but no! the living book objects; it insists on being read properly, and the "egnomaniac"[22] becomes a victim of coquetry, the monstrous persecutor of all men who ply the trade of love.

You, Sir, who are a man of intelligence and have read these last twenty lines, which Apollo drew from my pen, permit me to tell you that if they fail to disillusion you, you are lost—that is, you will be the victim of the fair sex to the last moment of your life. If that prospect pleases you, I congratulate you.

Toward evening I visited Signora Orio to tell my wives that as I was to lodge at Signor Grimani's I could not begin by sleeping out. Old Rosa told me that people talked of nothing but the brilliance of my alibi, and that since all this acclaim could only come from their being certain that it was false, I must fear a revenge of the same sort at Razzetta's hands; hence I must be on my guard, particularly at night. It would have been too stupid of me to neglect the wise old man's advice. I never went about except in company or in a gondola. Signora Manzoni congratulated me on my precaution. The court, she said, had been obliged to find me not guilty; but people in general knew what to think, and Razzetta could not have forgiven me.

Three or four days later Signor Grimani informed me that the Bishop had arrived.[23] He was lodging in his Minimite monastery[24] of San Francesco di Paola. Signor Grimani himself took me to the prelate, as if I were a jewel which he cherished and which he alone had the right to display to him.

I saw a handsome monk with a bishop's cross on his chest; I would have taken him for Father Mancia had he not looked more robust and been more reserved in manner. He was thirty-four years old,[25] and he was a bishop by the grace of God, of the Holy See, and of my mother. After giving me first his blessing, which I received kneeling, and then his hand to kiss, he embraced me and called me his "dear son" in Latin, in which language he always addressed me thereafter. I was beginning to think that, being a Calabrian, he was ashamed to speak Italian; but he undeceived me when he spoke to Signor Grimani. He said that since he could not take me with him until after he had reached Rome, Signor Grimani would arrange to send me there, and that in Ancona a Minimite monk named Lazari, who was a friend of his, would give me his address and money for the journey. From Rome on we would remain together, and would go to Martorano by way of Naples. He asked me to come and see him very early the next morning so that we could breakfast together after he had said his mass. He said that he would leave on the day after that. Signor Grimani took me back to his palace, treating me all the way to a moral discourse at which I could not but laugh. Among other things he warned me that I must not study much, because in the heavy air of Calabria too much application could make me consumptive.

The next day I waited on the Bishop at daybreak. After mass and chocolate he catechized me for three hours on end. I saw clearly that he did not like me; but, on my side, I was well pleased with him; he seemed to me a thorough gentleman and in any case, since he was to guide me to the great stage of the Church, I could not but like him, for in those days, though I was very much prejudiced in my own favor, I had not a shred of self-confidence.

After the good Bishop's departure, Signor Grimani gave me a letter which he had left with him and which

I was to deliver to Father Lazari at the Minimite monastery in the city of Ancona. He told me that he would send me to Ancona with the Venetian Ambassador, who was about to set out; so I must be in readiness to leave. I was delighted with all this. I could not wait to be out of his custody.

As soon as I ascertained the time when the suite of the Cavaliere da Lezze,[26] Ambassador of the Republic, was to embark, I took leave of all my acquaintances. I left my brother Francesco in the school conducted by Signor Joli,[27] the celebrated theatrical scene painter. Since the peota[28] in which I was to travel to Chioggia was not to leave the quay until daybreak, I spent the brief night in the arms of my two angels, who were certain that they would never see me again. For my part, I could not foresee what might happen, for, having abandoned myself to fate, I considered that to think about the future was effort wasted. So we spent the night between joy and sorrow, between laughter and tears. I left them the key. This love, which was my first, taught me almost nothing about the way of the world, for it was perfectly happy, unbroken by trouble of any kind, and untarnished by any interested motives. All three of us often felt impelled to raise our hearts to Eternal Providence and render thanks for the direct protection by which it had kept us safe from any accident which could have troubled the sweet peace we had enjoyed.

All my papers, and all the forbidden books I owned, I left with Signora Manzoni. This lady, who was twenty years my senior and who, believing in fate, amused herself by turning over the pages of its great book, told me with a smile that she was sure she would be giving me back all that I had deposited with her by the next year at the latest. Her predictions astonished and pleased me; since I had a great respect for her, I felt it incumbent on me to help her see them come true. What enabled her to look into the future was neither superstition nor a vain, unreasonable foreboding; it was a knowledge of the world and of the character of the person in whom she was interested. She laughed over never having been wrong.

I embarked at the Piazzetta di San Marco. On the previous evening Signor Grimani had given me ten zecchini, which he said should be more than enough to keep me through the time I should have to spend in the lazaretto of Ancona undergoing quarantine.[29] Once I was out of the lazaretto, it was not to be expected that I should need money. Since they were so sure of it, it was my duty to be as sure as they were; but I gave the matter no thought. However, I found it comforting that, unknown to anyone, I had in my purse forty fine zecchini, which greatly raised my youthful spirits. I set off with a joyful heart, regretting nothing.

CHAPTER VIII

My misfortunes in Chioggia. Father Steffano, Recollect. The lazaretto at Ancona. The Greek slave. My pilgrimage to Our Lady of Loreto. I go to Rome on foot and from there to Naples to find the Bishop, but do not find him. Fortune provides me with the means of going to Martorano, which I very soon leave and return to Naples.

THE Ambassador's suite was called his "grand court," but I saw nothing grand about it. It was made up of a Milanese major-domo named Carnicelli, an abate who served as his secretary because he could not write, an old woman denominated the "housekeeper," a cook and his very ugly wife, and eight or ten menservants.

When I disembarked at Chioggia at noon I politely asked Signor Carnicelli where I was to lodge.

"Wherever you please. Just make sure you tell 'that man there' where you are so he can notify you when the tartan[1] is ready to sail for Ancona. My orders are to convey you to the lazaretto at Ancona, free of charge from the time we start. Until then, amuse yourself."

"That man there" was the captain of the tartan. I ask him where I can lodge.

"At my house, if you are willing to sleep in a big bed with our cook, whose wife will sleep on board my tartan."

I agree; and a sailor comes with me, carrying my trunk, which he puts under the bed because the bed took up the whole room. I laugh at this, for it was not my part to make difficulties, then I go and dine at the inn, after which I take a look at Chioggia. It is a peninsula, the seaport of Venice, with a population of ten thousand souls,[2] mariners, fishermen, merchants, pettifogging lawyers, and employees in the customs and finance offices of the Republic. Seeing a coffeehouse, I went in. A young Doctor of Law,[3] who had been a fellow student of mine at Padua, embraces me and introduces me to the apothecary whose shop next door to the coffeehouse was, he told me, the meeting place of all the local men of letters. A quarter of an hour later a tall one-eyed Jacobin monk, a native of Modena named Corsini, whom I had known in Venice, comes in, sees me, and greets me most cordially. He told me that I had arrived in time for the picnic which the members of the Macaronic Academy[4] were holding the next day after a session at which each member would recite a composition of his own to the honor and glory of macaroni. He urges me to honor the Academy by reciting a piece of my own composition and to attend the picnic, and I accept. I produced ten stanzas, and was admitted to the Academy by acclamation. I cut an even better figure at table, where I ate macaroni so diligently that I was accorded the title "Prince of Macaroni."

The young Doctor, who also was a member of the Academy, introduced me to his family. His parents, who were very well off, received me with the greatest cordiality. He had a very charming sister, and another who was a professed nun and whom I thought a prodigy. I could have spent my time very agreeably with these people until I had to leave; but it was written that I should have nothing but troubles at Chioggia. The young Doctor gave me another proof of his friendship; he warned me that Father Corsini was an ill-mannered scoundrel, that no one could put up with him, and that I should avoid him. I thanked the Doctor for his warning; but I paid no attention to it, because I believed that his bad reputation was due only to his unprejudiced opinions. Being tolerant by nature and stupid enough to have no fear of being gulled, I thought that, on the contrary, the monk could show me a good deal of amusement.

On the third day this ill-omened monk introduced me to a place where I could perfectly well have gone by myself and where, to show off, I surrendered myself to a miserable, ugly hussy. When we left, he took me to an inn to sup with four swindling friends of his, after which one of them made a bank at faro.[5] When I had lost four zecchini I wanted to stop; but my good friend Corsini persuaded me to risk another four in partnership with him. He made the bank, and it was broken. I wanted to stop playing; but Corsini, expressing great regret at having been the cause of my loss, advised me to make a bank of twenty myself, and they broke it. Since I could not afford such a loss, I did not have to be asked again. The hope of recovering my money made me lose all I had left. I went to the captain's house and got into bed with the cook, who was asleep; he woke and told me I was a scapegrace. I answered that I was indeed.

My constitution, shaken by this great misfortune, needed to forget it by losing itself in the brother of death. But at noon my accursed tormentor woke me and triumphantly told me that they had invited a very rich young man to supper, that he invariably lost, and so I should recoup.

"Whenever I lend, I am sure to lose. It is a superstition, but I have seen it happen too often. Try to find twenty zecchini somewhere else, and come. Good-by."

Ashamed to confess my misfortune to my sensible friend, I asked the first passer-by for the address of an honest pawnbroker. I went to the house of an old man, took him to my room, and emptied my trunk before him.

After making an inventory of all my possessions, he gave me thirty zecchini, on condition that if I did not return the amount to him by the third day at the latest everything would become his property. He asked no interest. A decent fellow! I made out a bill of sale; and when he had given me thirty brand-new zecchini, he carried everything away. It was he who made me keep three shirts and some socks and handkerchiefs; I did not want to keep anything. I had a presentiment that I should win back all my money that evening. Some years later I took my revenge by writing a diatribe against presentiments. I believe that the only presentiment to which a wise man should pay any attention is one which predicts misfortune; it comes from the mind. A presentiment of good fortune comes from the heart, and the heart is a fool and deserves to trust in fortune, which is a fool too. I wanted nothing more than to rejoin that honest company, who wanted nothing less than that I should fail to come. At supper not a word was said about play. I was praised to the skies for my eminent qualities and congratulated on the high destiny which could not but await me in Rome. But after supper, still hearing not a word about play, I loudly demanded my revenge. I was told that I had only to make a bank, and everyone would punt. I made it, and when I had lost everything I asked the lumine laesus (''the one-eyed man'')[6] to pay the innkeeper what I owed him, and he answered that he would be responsible for my share.

Already in despair, as I was getting ready for bed I saw what set the crown on my misfortunes—the loathsome signs of the same malady of which I had been cured less than two months before. I went to sleep stupefied. I woke eleven hours later, but I was so utterly dejected that I continued to drowse. I abhorred the thought of thinking, I abhorred the light, of which I felt myself unworthy. I feared to awaken completely, for then I should be under the cruel necessity of deciding on a course. I did not for a moment consider returning to Venice, though it was what I ought to have done; and I was ready to die rather than confess my situation to the young Doctor. My life had become a burden to me, and I hoped I should die of inanition without moving from the spot. I should certainly never have brought myself to get up, if Alban, the kindhearted captain of the tartan, had not come to give me a shake and tell me to get on board because, the wind being favorable, he was going to sail.

The mortal man who has escaped from a quandary, by whatever means, feels relieved. It seemed to me that Captain Alban had come to tell me what was the only course left to me in my extreme distress. After dressing as quickly as possible, I tied up my shirts in a handkerchief and went on board. An hour later the tartan raised anchor and the next morning dropped it in an Istrian port named Orsara.[7] We all went ashore to walk about the city, which does not deserve that name. It belongs to the Pope; the Venetians gave it to him to do homage to the Chair of St. Peter.

A young Recollect[8] monk from Belluno, named Frate Steffano, whom Captain Alban, who was a devotee of St. Francis of Assisi, had taken on board out of charity, came up to me and asked me if I was ill.

"Father, I am unhappy."

"You will get over it if you come and breakfast with me at the house of a woman who is one of our devotees."

It was thirty-six hours since the least particle of food had entered my stomach and the rough sea had made me vomit up whatever might have been left in it. In addition, my secret malady made me extremely uncomfortable, to say nothing of the depression which being penniless caused me. My spirits were so low that I did not have the strength to say no to anything. I followed the monk in a state of complete apathy.

He presented me to his devotee, telling her that he was taking me to Rome, where I was to assume the holy habit of St. Francis. Under any other circumstances, I would not have let his lie pass; but at the moment the fraud struck me as comical. The good woman gave us a fine meal of fish cooked in the excellent oil of the locality, the wine being a refosco,[9] which I found exquisite. A priest who happened to come in advised me not to spend the night in the tartan but instead to accept a bed in his house and even dinner the next day if the wind kept us from sailing. I accepted without hesitation. After thanking our devout hostess, I went for a walk with the priest, who gave me a good supper prepared by his housekeeper, who sat at table with us and whom I found attractive. His refosco, which was even better than my devout hostess's had been, made me forget all my troubles. The priest's conversation was amusing enough. He wanted to read me a short poem he had written, but as I could no longer keep my eyes open I told him that I should be glad to hear it the next day.

I went to bed, taking the necessary precautions to keep my infection from falling on the sheets. Ten hours later the housekeeper, who was watching for me to waken, brought me coffee, then left me alone to dress. Young and with a good figure, this housekeeper seemed worthy of my attention. I felt abashed that my condition prevented me from convincing her that I recognized her merits. I could not bear to have her think me either cold or impolite.

Determined to repay my host by listening attentively to his poem, I sent my gloom packing. My comments on his verses delighted him so much that, finding me more intelligent than he had supposed, he proposed to read me his idyls and I bowed to the yoke. I spent the whole day with him. The assiduity with which the housekeeper attended to my wants showed me that she had taken a liking to me, and by the same token put the finishing touch to the liking I had taken to her. The day passed like lightning for the priest, thanks to the beauties I found in what he read me, all of which was unutterably bad; but it passed slowly for me, because of the housekeeper, who was to show me to bed. Such was my nature; and I do not know if I should be ashamed of it or congratulate myself on it. In the most lamentable state, whether physical or moral, I dared to give myself up to enjoyment and to forget all the causes for gloom which could not but overwhelm any other reasonable man.

The time came at last. After a few appropriate preliminaries, I found her indulgent up to a certain point; but determined to refuse when I showed signs of wanting to do her full justice. Satisfied with what I had obtained, and even more satisfied that she had not taken me at my word when it came to the final point, I slept very well. In the morning over my coffee, the look in her face told me that she was delighted we had become so intimately acquainted. I took some steps to convince her that my affection had not been an effect of the refosco; she did not respond to them, but she gilded her refusal with a proviso which made it precious to me. She said that as we might be caught in the act, it would be better to wait until evening, since the southeast wind was even stronger than the day before. This was nothing short of a promise. I prepared myself to reap the benefit of it, servatis servandis ("on condition that what required to be done was done").

My day with the priest passed like the one before. At bedtime, when the housekeeper left me she said she would come back. Examining myself, I thought I saw that, if I took certain precautions, I could play my part without having to reproach myself for an unforgivable sin. It seemed to me that if I abstained and told her the reason, I should cover myself with ignominy and her with shame. If I had been a wise man, I would not have begun; I did not see how I could retreat now. She arrived. I gave her the reception she had expected, and after a couple of pleasant hours she returned to her room. Two hours later Captain Alban came and told me to make haste since he was determined to reach Pola[10] that evening by keeping close to the Istrian shore. I went on board the tartan.

Frate Steffano, the Recollect, kept me amused all day with a hundred remarks in which I detected ignorance mixed with knavery under the color of ingenuousness. He showed me all the alms he had received in Orsara—bread, wine, cheese, sausages, preserves, and chocolate. All the ample pockets of his religious habit were full of food.

"Have you money as well?"

"God forbid! In the first place, our glorious statutes forbid me to touch it; in the second place, if I accepted money when I go begging, people would salve their consciences with a soldo or two, while what they give me in food is worth ten times as much. Believe me, St. Francis was a wise man."

I reflected that the monk saw as wealth precisely what was then making me poor. He made me eat with him and was proud that I deigned to do him so much honor.

We landed at the port of Pola, which is named Veruda. After walking a quarter of an hour along an uphill road, we entered the city, where I spent two hours examining Roman antiquities, for this city had been the capital of the Empire; but I saw no vestiges of its former grandeur except a ruined arena. We returned to Veruda and, sailing from there, were the next day off Ancona, but we tacked back and forth all night and did not run in until morning. Though it is considered a great work of Trajan's,[11] the port would be a very poor one except for a dike built at great expense, which makes it good. There is a curious fact about the Adriatic which is worth mentioning: its northern coast has plenty of harbors, whereas the opposite coast has only one or two. It is obvious that the sea is withdrawing toward the east, and that in three or four centuries Venice will be joined to the mainland.[12]

We disembarked at Ancona at the old lazaretto, where we were sentenced to a quarantine of twenty-eight days because Venice had admitted the crews of two ships from Messina, where there had lately been a plague, after a quarantine of three months. I demanded a room for myself and Frate Steffano, who thanked me heartily for the arrangement; then I rented from the Jews a bed, a table, and some chairs, the hire for which I was to pay at the end of the quarantine; the monk refused to sleep on anything but straw. If he could have guessed that, without him, I should perhaps have died of starvation, he might not have been so proud of being lodged with me. A sailor who hoped to find me generous asked me where my trunk was; when I answered that I had no idea, he tried hard to find it, and I was much amused when Captain Alban, who had joined in the search, came and humbly asked me to excuse him for having left it behind and promised that I should have it in less than three weeks.

The monk, who was to spend four weeks with me, expected to live at my expense, whereas it was he whom Providence had sent to me to keep me alive. He had food enough to sustain us for a week.

It was after supper that I gave him a touching account of my sad situation, telling him that I should be in need of everything until we reached Rome, where (I lied) I was to serve the Ambassador as Secretary of Memorials.

I was astonished to observe that Frate Steffano was delighted by the sad tale of my misfortunes.

"I will take care of you," he said, "until we reach Rome. Only tell me if you can write."

"Are you joking?"

"Splendid! As I live and breathe, I cannot write anything but my name; true, I can write it with my left hand too; but what need have I to be able to write?"

"I am a little surprised, for I thought you were a priest."

"I am not a priest; I am a monk, I say mass, and so I have to know how to read. But consider that St. Francis, whose unworthy son I am, could not write, and there are those who say he could not even read, which is why he never said mass. But to come to the point. Since you can write, you shall write tomorrow in my name to all the persons I shall name to you; and I promise you they will send us food in plenty all through our quarantine."

He made me spend all the next day writing eight letters, because according to a saying handed down in his order any friar who had knocked on seven doors and been refused could be sure he would receive plentiful alms at the eighth. As he had already made the journey to Rome once before, he knew all the good houses in Ancona which were devoted to St. Francis, and all the superiors of the rich monasteries. I had to write to all the persons he named, and all the lies he wanted. He made me sign his name as well, saying that if he signed, the difference in the hands would show that he had not written the letter, which would reflect on him because in this corrupt age only the learned were esteemed. He made me fill the letters with passages in Latin, even the ones addressed to women, and all my remonstrances were in vain. When I objected, he threatened to stop feeding me. I decided to do whatever he asked. In several of the letters there were lies which others contradicted. He made me tell the superior of the Jesuits that he had not applied to the Capuchins because they were atheists, which was why St. Francis could not tolerate them. I tried to tell him that in St. Francis's day there were neither Capuchins nor Recollects, but he said I did not know what I was talking about. I was sure he would be dismissed as a fool and that no one would send anything. I was wrong. The quantity of provisions which arrived two days later and the day after surprised me. Three or four people each sent us wine enough to last us through the entire quarantine. It was cooked wine, which would have been bad for me; but in any case I was drinking water for dietary reasons, for I could not wait to be cured. So far as food was concerned, we had enough every day for five or six persons. We gave some of it to our guard, who was poor and had a large family. For all this bounty the monk was grateful to St. Francis alone, not to the good souls who were giving him charity.

He undertook to give my scandalously soiled shirts to our guard to wash, saying that he ran no risk for everyone knew that Recollects did not wear shirts. He did not know that such a malady as mine existed. As I kept to my bed all day, I escaped exhibiting myself to those who, having received one of his letters, felt it their duty to visit him. Those who did not come to visit sent him letters full of elegantly expressed incongruities, which I took care not to point out to him. I had a hard time making him understand that such letters did not require answers.

Two weeks of my regimen had cured my indisposition to the point where I was taking an early morning walk in the courtyard; but a Turkish merchant from Salonica arriving at the lazaretto with his household and being lodged on the ground floor, I had to give up my walks. My only remaining pleasure was to pass my time on the balcony, which gave on the same courtyard, in which the Turk strolled about. What interested me was a Greek slave girl of astonishing beauty. She spent almost the whole day sitting at the door of her room, knitting or reading in the shade. The heat was extreme. When she raised her beautiful eyes and saw me, she looked away and often, pretending surprise, rose and went slowly back into her room, as if to say, "I did not know anyone was looking at me." She was tall and her whole appearance showed that she was very young. Her skin was white and her eyes black like her hair and her brows. She dressed in the Greek fashion, which is very voluptuous.

Unoccupied, confined to a lazaretto, and such as nature and habit had made me, could I contemplate such an object four or five hours every day without falling madly in love? I had heard her conversing in lingua franca[13] with her master, a handsome old man who was as bored as she was and who would come out for a few moments with his pipe in his mouth, only to return to his room almost at once. I would have spoken to the girl, had I not been afraid of driving her away and never seeing her again. I finally resolved to write to her, since nothing stood in the way of my getting a letter to her, for I had only to drop it at her feet. But not being certain that she would pick it up, I hit upon the following plan to avoid any risk of precipitating an awkward situation.

Waiting for a time when she was alone, I dropped a sheet of paper folded like a letter but on which I had written nothing, meanwhile keeping my real letter in my hand. When I saw her stoop to pick up the pretended letter, I threw her the other too. She picked them both up, put them in her pocket, and vanished. My letter ran as follows: "Angel of the East whom I adore! I shall spend the whole night on this balcony, hoping that you will come for but a quarter of an hour to hear my voice through the hole at my feet. We will speak in whispers, and to hear me you can climb up on the bale which is under the same hole."

I asked my guard to be good enough not to lock me in as he did every night, and he made no objection to granting my request, on condition, however, that he would watch me, for if I took a notion to jump down, he risked losing his head. However, he promised not to come out on the balcony.

Waiting at the appointed place, I saw her appear at midnight, just as I was giving up hope. I lay down on my stomach and put my head to the hole, which was a splintery square five or six inches across. I saw her climb on the bale; when she stood up her head was only a few feet from the floor of the balcony. She had to steady herself against the wall with one hand, for the awkward position made her totter. In this situation, we talked of ourselves, of love, of desires, of obstacles, of impossibilities, and of ruses. When I told her why I could not jump down, she said that even if I did we should be lost, for there was no way I could get back up again. Then too, God alone knows what the Turk would have done to her and to me if he had caught us. After promising me that she would come and talk with me every night, she put her hand up through the hole. Alas! I could not get my fill of kissing it. I thought I had never touched a hand so soft and so delicate. But what delight when she asked me for mine! I quickly thrust my whole arm down through the hole, and she pressed her lips to the bend of my elbow; after that she forgave my rapacious hand all that it could steal from her Greek bosom, for which I hungered far more ravenously than I had for the kisses I had just imprinted on her hand. After we parted I was delighted to see my guard sound asleep in a corner of the room.

Satisfied that I had obtained all that I could obtain in this awkward position, I waited impatiently for the next night, racking my brains for a way to make it still more delicious; but the Greek girl, thinking to the same purpose, obliged me to admit that her wits were more fertile than mine.

She was in the courtyard with her master after dinner and had said something to him to which he nodded his assent, whereupon I saw a Turkish servant and their guard drag out a great basket of merchandise and place it under the balcony; while she had another bale placed on top of two others, as if to make more room for the basket. Understanding her plan, I trembled with joy. I saw that by this maneuver she had provided the means to stand two feet higher that night. "But what of it?" I reflected. "She will be in the most awkward position imaginable, so stooped over that she cannot possibly bear it. The hole is not big enough for her to make herself comfortable by putting her whole head through it."

Raging because I could not hope to enlarge the hole, I lie down, I examine it, and I see no other course but to unnail the whole worn plank from the two beams underneath it. I go back into the room; the guard was not there. I choose the strongest among the pairs of tongs which I see; I set to work and, making several attempts, for I am constantly afraid I will be caught, I pull out the four big nails which held the plank to the beams; I can now take it up whenever I please. I leave it there and wait impatiently for night. After eating a bite or two, I post myself on the balcony.

The object of my desires arrived at midnight. Dismayed to see that it took great agility on her part to climb up on the new bale, I lift my plank, set it aside, and, lying down, offer her the whole length of my arm; she takes hold of it, climbs, and, straightening up, is astonished to find that she is in my balcony down to her waist. She brought the whole length of her bare arms into it without any difficulty. We wasted only three or four minutes congratulating each other on having independently worked for the same end. If on the previous night I had been more her master than she had been mine, on this night she commanded my entire body. Alas! stretch my arms as I would, I could not possess more than half of hers. I was in despair; but she, though she had me entirely in her hands, was ready to weep because she could satisfy only her mouth. She heaped a thousand Greek curses on the wretch who had not made the bale at least half a foot bigger. Even then we should not have been satisfied; but my hand could have soothed her ardor somewhat. Though our pleasures were sterile, they occupied us until dawn. She departed without making a sound; I put back the plank, and went to bed in great need of regaining my strength.

She had told me that since the Lesser Bairam[14] began that day and continued for three more, she could not come again until the fourth day. It was the Turkish Easter. The Lesser Bairam lasts longer than the Greater. I spent these three days watching their ceremonies and their constant bustling about.

The first night after the Bairam, when she had clasped me in her loving arms, she told me that she could not be happy unless she were mine and that, as she was a Christian, I could buy her and then wait for her in Ancona till she had finished her quarantine. I had to confess that I was poor, and at that she sighed. The next night she told me that her master would sell her for two thousand piasters,[15] that she could give them to me, that she was a virgin, and that I could convince myself of it if the bale were bigger. She said she would give me a box filled with diamonds, a single one of which was worth two thousand piasters, and that by selling the others we could live in comfort without any fear of poverty. She said that her master would not notice the theft of the box until he had completed his quarantine, and that he would suspect anyone rather than her.

I was in love with this creature; her proposal troubled me; but when I woke in the morning I hesitated no longer. The next night she came with the box, and when I told her that I could not bring myself to be an accomplice in robbery, she wept and answered that I did not love her as she loved me, but that I was a "true Christian." It was the last night. The prior of the lazaretto was to come the next day at noon to give us our freedom. Surrendering to her senses, no longer able to resist the fire which was burning her soul, the charming Greek told me to stand up, bend over, take her under the armpits, and pull her up onto the balcony. What lover could resist such an invitation? Naked as a gladiator, I stand up, I bend over, I take her under the armpits and, without needing the strength of Milo of Crotona,[16] I was pulling her up when I felt my shoulders grasped and heard the guard's voice saying, "What are you doing?" I let go, she flees, and I fall on my stomach. I have no wish to get up, and I let the guard shake me. He thought the effort I had made had killed me, but I was worse than dead. I did not get up, because I wanted to strangle him. Finally I went to bed without addressing a word to him, and even without putting back the plank.

The prior came in the morning and told us we were free. As I left, brokenhearted, I saw the Greek girl wiping away her tears. I arranged to meet Frate Steffano at the Exchange[17] and he left me with the Jew to whom I owed the hire for the furniture he had supplied me with. I took him to the Minimite monastery, where Father Lazari gave me ten zecchini and the address of the Bishop, who had undergone his quarantine at the Tuscan frontier and must by now be in Rome, where I was to meet him. After paying the Jew and eating a poor dinner at an inn, I went to the Exchange to see Frate Steffano. On the way I had the bad luck to run into Captain Alban, who coarsely insulted me for having let him believe that he had left my trunk at his house. I calmed him by telling him the whole miserable story, and gave him a statement in writing certifying that I had no claims on him. I bought myself a pair of shoes and a blue redingote.

At the Exchange I told Frate Steffano that I wanted to go to the Santa Casa of Our Lady of Loreto,[18] that I would wait there three days for him, and that we could proceed to Rome on foot together. He replied that he did not want to go to Loreto and that I would repent of having scorned the protection of St. Francis. The next day I set off for Loreto, in excellent health.

I reached that holy city tired to death. It was the first time in my life that I had done fifteen miles[19] on foot, drinking nothing but water because cooked wine gave me heartburn. Despite my poverty I did not look like a beggar. The heat was intense.

As I enter the city, I meet a respectable-looking, elderly abate. Seeing that he is looking at me attentively, I raise my hat and ask him where there is a decent inn.

"Seeing such a person as you on foot," he says, "I conclude that it is devotion which has led you to visit this holy place. Ella venga meco" ("Come with me, Sir").

He turns back and leads me to a handsome house. After speaking privately to the proprietor, he takes a stately leave, saying, "Ella sarà ben servita" ("You will be well served").

I thought he took me for someone else, but I let it pass.

I was conducted to a suite of three rooms, of which the bedroom was hung in damask and had a canopied bed and an open secretary furnished with pens, ink, and paper. A manservant hands me a light dressing gown, then leaves and comes back with a companion carrying a large basin of water by its two handles. They set it before me, take off my shoes, and wash my feet. A well-dressed woman comes in, followed by a maid carrying bed linen, and after saluting me with a low bow, makes the bed. After my bath, a bell rings, they kneel, and I do likewise. It was the Angelus. A small table is laid; I am asked what wine I drink, I answer Chianti. I am brought the newspaper and two silver candlesticks, then left to myself. An hour later I am served a delicious fast-day supper, and before I go to bed I am asked if I will take my chocolate before I go out or after mass. Divining the reason for the question, I answer "before I go out." I get into bed, I am brought a night lamp mounted in front of a timepiece, and left to myself. I find that I am lying in a bed the equal of which I have found only in France. It was made to cure insomnia; but I did not need that. I slept for ten hours. The treatment I was receiving made me certain I was not at an inn; but could I have ventured to suppose that I was in a hospice?[20] After my morning chocolate, in comes a genteel hairdresser who does not wait to be questioned before speaking. Guessing that I did not want to have a beard, he offers to trim my face-down with the points of his scissors, which, he says, will make me look even younger.

"What makes you think I want to conceal my age?"

"That is easily seen, for if Monsignore did not have that in mind, he would have had himself shaved long ago. The Countess Marcolini is here. Does Monsignore know her? I am to dress her hair at noon."

Seeing that I am not interested in the Countess, the chatterbox goes on:

"Is this the first time Monsignore has lodged here? In all the states of Our Lord the Pope there is not a finer hospice."

"I can well believe it, and I shall congratulate His Holiness on it."

"Oh, he knows it himself. He lodged here before his elevation. If Monsignor Caraffa[21] had not known you, he would not have brought you here."

Such is the use of barbers to a stranger in any part of Europe; but it does not do to ask them questions, for then they bring out a mixture of falsehood and truth and instead of letting themselves be pumped, pump you. Considering it my duty to pay Monsignor Caraffa a visit, I had a servant show me the way there. He received me cordially and, after showing me his library, gave me a guide in the person of one of his abati, who was my own age and, as I found, both witty and intelligent. He showed me everything. If he is still alive, he is now a canon of San Giovanni in Laterano.[22] Twenty-eight years later he was of service to me in Rome.

The next morning I received the sacrament in the very place where the Blessed Virgin gave birth to her Creator. I spent the whole of the third day seeing all the treasures of the magnificant sanctuary. Early the next morning I set out, having spent only the three paoli[23] which I gave the hairdresser.

Halfway to Macerata, I overtook Frate Steffano, who was walking very slowly. Delighted to see me, he told me he had left Ancona two hours after I did and that he was traveling only three miles a day, being perfectly satisfied to spend three months making the journey, which even on foot could be made in a week. "I want," he said, "to reach Rome fresh and well; I have no reason to hurry; and if you feel like traveling in the same way, come with me. St. Francis can easily take care of us both."

This lazy lout was thirty years old, red-haired, of a very strong constitution, a true peasant, who had become a monk only so that he could live without tiring his body. I answered that, as I was in a hurry, I could not become his companion. He said he would walk twice as far that day if I would wear his cloak, which he found very heavy. I agreed to try, and he put on my redingote. We made such a comical pair that everyone who passed us laughed. I found that his cloak was in fact a load for a mule. It had twelve pockets, all of them full, besides a big back pocket, which he called a batticulo[25] and which all by itself contained twice what could be put in the others: bread, wine, cooked, fresh, and salted meat, chickens, eggs, cheeses, hams, sausages; there was enough in it to feed us for two weeks. When I told him how I had been treated in Loreto, he answered that if I had asked Monsignor Caraffa to give me a note to all the hospices on the road to Rome, I would have received much the same treatment everywhere.

"Hospices," he said, "are all under the curse of St.

Francis, because they do not receive mendicant monks; but we do not care about that because they are too far apart. We prefer the houses of people devoted to the order, and we find them at the end of every hour's travel."

"Why do you not lodge in your monasteries?"

"I am not such a fool as that. In the first place, they would not receive me because, being a fugitive, I have not the written 'obedience' they always insist on seeing; I should even run the risk of being sent to prison, for they are a bad lot. In the second place, we are not as well treated in our monasteries as we are by our benefactors."

"How and why are you a fugitive?"

He answered by giving me an absurd and mendacious account of his imprisonment and escape. He was a fool who had the brains of Harlequin and thought that those who listened to him were even greater fools. Yet there was a shrewdness in his stupidity. His religion was extraordinary. In his determination not to be a bigot, he made a scandal of himself; to raise a laugh, he talked the most revolting filth. He had not the slightest inclination for women or for any other kind of immorality, and he insisted that this was a virtue in him, whereas it was only a lack in his nature. He considered everything of the kind material for jokes; and when he was tipsy he asked his table companions—husbands, wives, daughters, sons—such obscene questions that he made them blush. The lout simply laughed.

When we were a hundred paces from the house of a benefactor, he put his cloak on again. Entering, he gave his blessing to everyone, and the whole family came and kissed his hand. The mistress of the house having asked him to say a mass for her, he most obligingly allowed himself to be led to the sacristy of the church, which was only twenty paces away.

"Have you forgotten," I whispered to him, "that we have breakfasted?"

"That is none of your affair."

I dare not answer; but when I hear him saying mass, I am much surprised to observe that he did not know how to go about it. I find this amusing; but the real comedy began when, after mass, he entered the confessional, where, after confessing the whole household, he took it into his head to refuse absolution to the hostess's daughter, a sweet little girl twelve or thirteen years old, charming and very pretty. He made his refusal in front of everyone, berating her and threatening her with hell-fire. The poor girl was overwhelmed with shame and left the church weeping, while I, greatly touched and concerned for her, first told Frate Steffano in a loud voice that he was mad and then ran after her to console her; but she had vanished, after absolutely refusing to come to the dinner table. This outrage so angered me that I was ready to cane him. In the presence of the whole family I called him an impostor and the infamous destroyer of the girl's honor, then asked him why he had refused her absolution, and he reduced me to silence by coolly answering that he could not reveal what he had learned in confession. I refused to eat, having made up my mind to part from the beastly monk. As I left the house I was forced to take a paolo for the accursed mass the scoundrel had celebrated. They must have supposed me his treasurer.

As soon as we were on the highroad, I told him I was leaving him, to escape the risk of being sent to the galleys with him. In the course of my reproaches I called him an ignorant scoundrel, and when I heard him answer that I was a tramp I could not refrain from giving him a slap, to which he replied by a blow from his stick, which I instantly snatched from his hands. Leaving him there, I set off at a fast pace for Macerata. A quarter of an hour later a vetturino[26] on his way back to Tolentino with his carriage empty offered me a seat in it for two paoli, and I accepted. From there I could have gone on to Foligno for six paoli; but an accursed wish to save money prevented me and, since I felt perfectly well, I thought I could get to Valcimara[27] on foot; I arrived there completely done in after a five-hour walk. A five-hour walk is enough to wear out a young man who, though strong and healthy, is not accustomed to walking. I went to bed.

The next morning when I go to pay my host out of the copper money I had in my coat pocket, I cannot find my purse, which should be in my breeches pocket. There must have been seven zecchini in it. What a blow! I remember that I had left it on the inn table at Tolentino when I changed a zecchino to pay for my dinner there. What a misfortune! I dismissed any idea of retracing my steps to recover the purse, which contained all my funds. Since I thought it impossible that whoever had filched it would give it back to me, I could not persuade myself to undergo a certain loss for the sake of an uncertain hope. I paid and, sick at heart, took the road to Serravalle.[28] But when, after walking for five hours and breakfasting at Muccia, I had only another hour's journey before me, I stumbled in jumping a ditch and sprained my ankle so painfully that I could not walk another step. I sit down beside the ditch, left with no resource but that which religion always affords to those who are in distress. I pray, asking God in his mercy to send some traveler along the road to rescue me.

An hour later a peasant came by on his way to fetch an ass's colt; for a paolo he took me to Serravalle, where I arrived with a capital of eleven paoli in coppers; to save me money, he lodged me at the house of a scoundrelly-looking man who put me up for two paoli paid in advance. I asked for a surgeon; but none is to be had until the next day. After a foul supper I retire to a very poor bed, where I nevertheless hope to find sleep; but it was precisely there that my evil demon was lying in wait to torment me with the pains of hell.

Three men come in, armed with carbines, making terrifying faces, conversing among themselves in a dialect I did not understand, swearing, raving, and not paying the slightest attention to me. After drinking and singing until midnight, they lay down on heaps of straw; but to my great surprise my host came in drunk and stark-naked and made to lie down beside me, bursting out laughing when I told him I would not permit it. Blaspheming God, he said that all hell could not keep him from lying in his own bed. I had to make room for him, exclaiming "Whose house am I in?" To this he answered that I was lodging with the most honest policeman in all the Papal States.

Could I have imagined that I was in the company of those accursed enemies of the entire human race? But this was not all. Scarcely has he lain down before the filthy brute, more by actions than words, reveals his infamous design upon me in a way which forces me to ward him off with a blow on the chest which knocks him out of the bed. He curses, he gets up, and returns to the attack undaunted. I decide to crawl out and sit in a chair, thanking God that he does not try to stop me and in fact has promptly fallen asleep. There I spent four miserable hours. At daybreak his comrades roused my tormentor and he got up. They drank and, taking their carbines, departed.

In this pitiable state I spent another hour calling for someone. A boy finally came up and, for a baiocco,[29] went and fetched me a surgeon. After examining me and assuring me that three or four days' rest would cure me, the surgeon advised me to have myself carried to the inn. I took his advice, and at once went to bed, where he looked after me. I sent my shirts to be washed and was well treated. I was reduced to wishing I would not get well, so greatly did I dread the moment when I should have to sell my redingote to pay the innkeeper. The thought filled me with shame. I saw that if I had not intervened on behalf of the girl to whom Frate Steffano had refused absolution, I should not now be in this wretched situation. I had to admit, it seemed, that my zeal had been misplaced. If I could have put up with the Recollect, "if," "if," "if," and all the accursed "if's" which rack the soul of the man in misfortune who thinks and who, having thought, finds himself even more unfortunate. Yet it is true that he learns to live. The man who refuses to think never learns anything.

On the morning of the fourth day, finding that I could walk as the surgeon had predicted, I resolve to entrust him with the sale of my redingote, a disastrous necessity because the rains were beginning. I owed the innkeeper fifteen paoli and the surgeon four. Just as I was about to entrust him with this heartbreaking sale, in walks Frate Steffano, laughing like a madman and asking me if I have forgotten the blow he had given me. I request the surgeon to leave me alone with the monk. I ask my reader: Is it possible to witness such things and keep one's mind free from superstition? The astonishing part is the timing, for the monk arrived at the very last minute; and what astonished me even more was the power of Providence, of fortune, of the inescapable concatenation of events, which insisted, determined, decreed that my only hope lay in this ill-omened monk, who had begun to be my guardian genius at the height of my misfortunes in Chioggia. But what a genius! I could not but find such power more a punishment than a blessing. Yet I felt comforted when I saw this fool, this rascal, this ignorant scoundrel appear, because I did not doubt for a moment that he would rescue me from my difficulties. Whether it was Heaven which sent him to me, or Hell, I saw that I must submit to him. It was he who would take me to Rome. Destiny had decreed it.

The first words Frate Steffano spoke to me were the proverb Che va piano va sano ("He who goes slowly goes safely").[30] He had spent five days making the journey I had made in one; but he was in good health and had suffered no misfortunes. He said that he was passing by, when someone told him that an abate who was Secretary of Memorials to the Venetian Ambassador was lying ill at the inn after having been robbed at Valcimara.

"I come to see you," he said, "and I find you well. Let us forget everything, and set off for Rome at once. To please you, I will walk six miles a day."

"I cannot; I have lost my purse and I owe twenty paoli."

"I will go and find them in the name of St. Francis."

An hour later he comes in with the accursed drunkard and sodomite of a policeman, who tells me that if I had let him know who I was he would have kept me in his house.

"I will give you forty paoli," he said, "if you will undertake to obtain the protection of your Ambassador for me; but when you have reached Rome you shall give them back to me if you do not succeed. So you must write me out a receipt."

"Very well."

It was all settled in a quarter of an hour; I received forty paoli, I paid my debts, and I set off with the monk.

An hour after noon he said that, as Collefiorito[31] was still a long way off, we could stop for the night in a house which he pointed out to me a couple of hundred paces from the highroad. It was a cottage, and I said we should be poorly lodged there; but my objections were of no avail, I had to do as he wished. We go there, and all we see is a decrepit old man, lying in bed and coughing, two ugly women of thirty or forty years, three stark-naked children, a cow in a corner, and an accursed barking dog. It was the picture of poverty; but the monstrous monk, instead of giving them alms and going his way, demanded supper in the name of St. Francis. The dying old man turned to his womenfolk and said: "You must cook the hen and bring out the bottle I've been keeping for twenty years.'' Then he fell into such a fit of coughing that I expected he would die on the instant. The monk promises him that St. Francis will make him young again. I wanted to go on to Collefiorito by myself and wait for him there; but the women protested and the dog held me by the coat with teeth which terrified me. I had to stay where I was. After four hours the hen was still tough; I uncorked the bottle and found vinegar. Losing all patience, I got some food from the monk's batticulo, and I saw the women delighted at seeing so many good things.

When we had all eaten well enough, they made us two beds of fairly good straw, and we lay down in darkness, for there was neither candle nor oil. Five minutes later, just when the monk was telling me that a woman had lain down beside him, I felt another beside me. The hussy takes hold of me and goes her way, despite my absolutely refusing to submit to her fury. The racket the monk made trying to ward off his made the scene so comic that I could not be really angry. The fool shouted for help at the top of his voice, invoking St. Francis since he saw he could expect no help from me. I was even worse off than he was, for when I tried to get up the dog came at my throat and terrified me. The same dog, going from me to the monk and from the monk to me, seemed to be in league with the strumpets to keep us from resisting them. We shouted ''murder'' at the top of our voices; but it was no use, for the house was isolated. The children slept, the old man coughed. Unable to escape and hearing the b[itch][32] assure me that she would go away if I would be a little kinder, I thought it best to let her have her way. I found that the writer who says sublata lucerna nullum discrimen inter mulieres (''when the lamp is taken away, all women are alike'')[33] says true; but without love this great business is a vile thing. Frate Steffano did otherwise. Protected by his heavy robe, he escaped from the dog, got up, and found his stick. Then he ran up and down the room, striking out blindly to left and right. I heard a woman's voice cry, "Oh, my God!" and the monk say, "I've killed her." I thought he had killed the dog too, for I did not hear it, and I thought the old man had been killed as well, for he had stopped coughing. The monk came and lay down beside me, holding his stout stick, and we slept until morning.

I dressed quickly, surprised to see nothing of the two women and terrified to see that the old man gave no sign of life. I showed Frate Steffano a bruise on the dead man's temple; he said that in any case he had not killed him on purpose. But I saw him go into a fury when he found his batticulo empty. For my part, I was delighted. Seeing nothing of the two sluts, I thought they had gone to the authorities for help and that we should be in serious trouble; but when I saw that the batticulo had been pillaged, I knew they had gone off so that we could not call them to account for the theft. However, I urged him so earnestly, telling him the danger we were in, that we set out. Coming upon a vetturino on his way to Foligno, I persuaded the monk to seize this opportunity to get away and, after eating a hasty bite, we got into another carriage which took us to Pisignano,[34] where a benefactor gave us an excellent lodging and where I had a good sleep, no longer fearing arrest.

The next day we reached Spoleto early. Having two benefactors there, he saw fit to honor them both. After dining with the first, who treated us like princes, he decided to sup and spend the night with the second. He was a rich wine merchant with a large family, all of whom were charming. All would have gone well if the ill-omened monk, who had already drunk too much in the house of the first benefactor, had not become completely intoxicated under the roof of the second. Thinking to please our good host and his wife by speaking ill of the man at whose house we had dined, the wretch told lies with which I could not put up. When he had the insolence to say he had told him that all his wines were doctored and he was a robber, I denied it in so many words and called him a villain. Our host and hostess calmed me by saying that they knew the people in question; and when the monk threw his napkin in my face in answer to my calling him a scandalmonger, the host gently took him by the arm and led him to a bedroom and locked him in. He showed me to another.

Early the next morning I was making ready to set off alone, when the monk, who had sobered up, came and said that in future we must live together as good friends. Bowing to my destiny, I went with him to Soma,[35] where the hostess of the inn, who was a rare beauty, gave us dinner. She gave us some Cyprus wine which the Venetian couriers brought her in exchange for the excellent truffles she gave them, which they took back to Venice on their return trip. When I set out I left the excellent woman a little of my heart; but what were my feelings when, two or three miles from Terni, the monster showed me a small sack of truffles he had stolen from her? The theft amounted to at least two zecchini. Furious, I took the sack from him, saying that I was absolutely determined to send it back to that good and beautiful woman. We fought until, having taken his stick from him, I threw him into a ditch and left him. I no sooner reached Terni than I sent the hostess her sack, with a letter asking her forgiveness.

I went to Otricoli on foot to look at the fine antique bridge[36] at my leisure, and from there a vetturino conveyed me to Castelnuovo[37] for four paoli. Setting out from there at midnight on foot, I reached Rome three hours before noon on September 1st.[38] But now for an experience which will perhaps be of interest to some of my readers.

An hour after leaving Castelnuovo on my way to Rome under a clear and windless sky, I noticed, at some ten paces to my right, a pyramidal flame a cubit high keeping pace with me some four or five feet above the ground. It stopped when I stopped, and when there were trees by the roadside it disappeared, but I saw it again as soon as I was beyond them. I went toward it several times, but it withdrew as far as I had approached. I tried retracing my steps, whereupon it vanished from my sight, but as soon as I started on again I saw it in the same place. It did not disappear until dawn.

What a wonder for superstitious ignorance if I had had witnesses to this phenomenon and then had made a great name in Rome! History abounds in such trifles, and the world is full of intellects which still attach great importance to them, for all the so-called enlightenment which the sciences have bestowed on the human mind. Yet I must candidly admit that, despite my knowledge of physics, the sight of this little meteor gave me some singular thoughts. I was prudent enough not to mention it to anyone. I reached Rome with seven paoli in my pocket.

Nothing stays my steps—neither the fine approach to the Porta del Pioppo,[39] which ignorance has dubbed "del Popolo," nor the façades of its churches, nor any of the monuments with which that magnificent city impresses the visitor who sees it for the first time. I make my way to Monte Magnanopoli,[40] where the address I had been given assured me that I should find my Bishop. I am told that he had left ten days earlier, leaving orders that I should be sent, all expenses paid, to Naples to an address which is given me. A coach would be leaving the next morning. I do not even consider seeing Rome; I go to bed and stay there until it is time for me to set out. I reached Naples on September 6th. I ate, drank, and slept with the three peasants who were my fellow travelers and never said a word to them.

As soon as I arrive, I find someone to guide me to the place named in the address I had been given, but the Bishop is not there. I go to the Minimite monastery, and am told that he had left for Martorano, and all the inquiries I make are fruitless. He had left no orders which could possibly concern me. So there I am in the great city of Naples with eight carlini[41] in my pocket and no idea where to turn. Yet my destiny calls me to Martorano, and there I am determined to go. The distance is only two hundred miles.[42] I find several coachmen setting out for Cosenza, but when they learn that I have no trunk, they refuse to take me unless I pay in advance. I admit they are right; but I had to get to Martorano. I determine to go on foot, boldly asking for food anywhere along the way, as Frate Steffano had taught me to do. I spend two of my carlini on a meal; that leaves me with six. Told that I should take the Salerno road, I get to Portici in an hour and a half. My legs carry me to an inn where I take a room and order supper. Excellently served, I eat, go to bed, and sleep very well. The next morning I get up and go to look at the royal palace.[43] I tell the innkeeper that I will come back for dinner.

As I enter the royal palace, a man of prepossessing appearance and dressed in the fashion of the East approaches me and says that if I wish to see the palace he will show me everything and so I shall save my money. I accept, thanking him heartily, and he walks beside me. When I tell him that I am a Venetian, he answers that, as a Zantiote,[44] he is my subject. I take the compliment for what it is worth and make him a slight bow.

"I have some excellent muscat wines from the Levant,"[45] he says, "which I could sell you cheaply."

"I might buy some; but I know them well."

"So much the better. Which one do you prefer?"

"Cerigo."

"You are right. I have some which is excellent, and we shall taste it at dinner, if you will dine with me."

"Certainly, with pleasure."

"I will buy some mercury too."

It is quite naturally, and without any thought of deceit, that a young man who is new to poverty and ashamed to be poor, and who falls into conversation with a rich man who does not know him, talks of buying. I suddenly remember an amalgam of mercury made with lead and bismuth. The mercury increased by a fourth part. I say nothing; but I think to myself that if the Greek did not know this magistery,[47] I might make money from it. I felt that I must proceed with cunning and caution. I saw that if I proposed point-blank to sell him my secret, he would think it worthless; I must first surprise him with the miracle of the increase, laugh at it, and then watch him come on. Cheating is a sin, but honest cunning is simply prudence. It is a virtue. To be sure, it has a likeness to roguery, but that cannot be helped. He who has not learned to practice it is a fool. In Greek this kind of prudence is called kerdaleophron.[48] Kerda means "fox." After seeing the palace, we repair to the inn. The Greek takes me to his room, where he orders the innkeeper to set a table for two. In the next room he had large flagons full of muscat wine and four filled with mercury, each holding ten pounds. Having my plan sketched out in my head, I ask him for a flagon of mercury at whatever it was worth, and I take it to my room. He goes out on some business, telling me that we shall meet again at dinnertime. I go out too, and buy two and a half pounds of lead and the same quantity of bismuth. It was all that the druggist had. I go back to my room, ask the innkeeper for two large empty flagons, and I make my amalgam.

We dine in high spirits and the Greek is delighted to see that I find his Cerigo muscat exquisite. He asks me smilingly why I had bought a flagon of his mercury and

I answered that he could see the reason in my room. He comes there, sees the mercury in two bottles, I ask for a piece of chamois, strain it, fill his flagon, and see him astonished by the quarter-flagon of fine mercury which I have left, together with an equal quantity of a powdered metal which he did not recognize and which was the bismuth. I greet his astonishment with a burst of laughter. I summon the waiter and send him off with the mercury I had left to sell it to the druggist. He comes back and hands me fifteen carlini.

The astounded Greek asks me to give him back his own flagon, which stood there full and was worth sixty carlini; I give it to him with a smile and thank him for having enabled me to make a profit of fifteen carlini. At the same time I tell him that early the next morning I must leave for Salerno. "Then we shall sup together again," he says, "this evening."

We spend all the rest of the day on Vesuvius, and never mention the mercury; but I saw that he was thoughtful. During our supper, he says smilingly that I might well stay over the next day and make forty-five carlini on the other three flagons of mercury he had with him. I answered him in a dignified and serious tone that I did not need them and that I had only increased one of his flagons to amuse him by a pleasant surprise.

"But," he said, "you must be very rich."

"No, for I am after[49] the method of increasing gold, and that costs us a great deal."

"Then there are several of you?"

"My uncle and I."

"What need have you to increase gold? Increasing mercury should be enough for you. Tell me, please, can the mercury you have increased be increased by as much again?"

"No. If it could, it would be a vast seedbed of wealth."

"I find your sincerity delightful."

Supper over, I paid the innkeeper and asked him to have a carriage and pair ready early in the morning to take me to Salerno. Thanking the Greek for his excellent muscat wine, I asked him for his address at Naples, adding that he would see me two weeks hence for I was determined to buy a barrel of his Cerigo. After embracing him cordially, I went off to bed, well pleased with my day's work and not at all surprised that the Greek had not proposed that I sell him my secret. I was sure that he would think it over all night and that I should see him at daybreak. In any case I had money enough to get me to Torre del Greco, and there Providence would take care of me. I thought I could not possibly make my way to Martorano by begging alms, because, such as I was, I did not arouse pity. I could interest only people ready to believe that I was not in need. That is of no use to a genuine beggar.

As I had hoped, the Greek came to my room at dawn.

"We will take coffee together," I said.

"Tell me, Signor Abate, will you sell me your secret?"

"Why not? When we meet again in Naples."

"Why not today?"

"I am expected in Salerno. Besides, the secret is worth a great deal of money and I do not know you."

"That is no obstacle, since I am well enough known here to pay you in cash. What do you want for it?"

"Two thousand once.* " 50

"I will give you that, on condition that I shall myself increase the thirty pounds I have here with whatever material you specify to me, which I will go and buy myself."

"That is impossible, since the material is not to be had here; but at Naples anyone can get as much as he pleases."

We can go there together. Can you tell me what the increase costs?"

"One and one-half per cent; but are you known in Torre del Greco too? For I should not wish to waste my time."

"Your doubt pains me."

He takes a pen, writes the following note, and hands it to me: "On sight. Pay the bearer fifty once in gold and charge them to my account. Panagiotti—Rodostemo. To Signor Gennaro di Carlo."

He tells me the man lives two hundred paces from the inn and urges me to go there myself. I go without waiting to be asked twice, receive fifty once and, returning to my room where he was waiting for me, put them on the table. I then tell him to come with me to Torre del Greco,[51] where we will complete the transaction, after exchanging engagements in writing. Having his own carriage, he ordered the horses harnessed and generously told me to take the fifty once.

At Torre del Greco he wrote me out a receipt in which he promised to pay me two thousand once as soon as I should have told him with what substances and by what process he could increase mercury by a fourth without impairment of its purity and of the same quality as that which I had sold at Portici in his presence.

Pursuant to this, he drew me up a bill of exchange payable in eight days at sight on Signor Gennaro di Carlo. I thereupon told him that the substances were lead, which amalgamated naturally with mercury, and bismuth, which served only to give it the fluidity it must have to pass through the chamois. The Greek went out to perform the operation in the house of some person whom he did not name. I dined alone, and in the evening I saw him looking very gloomy. I had expected as much.

"The operation is performed," he said, "but the mercury is not perfect."

"It is 'of the same quality as that which I sold in Portici.' Your receipt states that clearly."

"But it also says 'without impairment of its purity.' You must admit that its purity is impaired. It is also true that it can no longer be increased."

"I stick to the point of quality. We will go to court, and you will lose. I should be sorry to have the secret become public knowledge. If you do win, you can congratulate yourself, for you will have got my secret from me for nothing. I did not think you capable, Signor Panagiotti, of tricking me in this fashion."

"Signor Abate, I am incapable of tricking anyone."

"Do you know the secret, or do you not? Would I have told it to you except for the bargain we made? This will set all Naples laughing, and the lawyers will make money."

"I am already in trouble enough over the affair."

"In the meanwhile, here are your fifty once."

As I was taking them from my pocket in great fear that he would accept them, he left, saying he did not want them. We supped separately, each in his own room, divided by open war; but I knew that we would make peace. He came to me in the morning, when I was getting ready to leave and a carriage was already waiting for me. When I told him to take his fifty once, he answered that I should content myself with another fifty and give him back his bill of exchange for two thousand. We then began talking sense, and after two hours I gave in. He handed me another fifty once, we dined together, we embraced afterward, and then he presented me with a note good for a cask of muscat wine at his storehouse in Naples and with a magnificent case containing twelve silver-handled razors from the famous manufactory in Torre del Greco. We parted the best of friends. I stayed in Salerno for two days to buy shirts, stockings, handkerchiefs, and whatever I needed. I had a hundred zecchini at my disposal, I was in excellent health and proud of my exploit, in which I saw nothing with which I need reproach myself. The cunning and the quickness of mind on which I had drawn to sell my secret could be condemned only by a civic morality which has no place in the business of life. Free, rich, and certain of appearing before my Bishop a well-turned-out youth instead of a tramp, I recovered all my high spirits, and congratulated myself on having learned, at my own expense, to defend myself against Father Corsinis, swindling gamesters, mercenary women, and especially against those who praise a man to his face. I set off with two priests who were in a hurry to reach Cosenza. We did the one hundred and forty miles in twenty-two hours. The morning after I arrived in the capital of Calabria, I hired a small carriage and proceeded to Martorano.

As I traveled, I fixed my eyes on the famous Mare Ausonium[52] and rejoiced in being at the center of Magna Graecia,[53] which Pythagoras's[54] sojourn had rendered illustrious for twenty-four centuries. I looked with astonishment at a country renowned for its fertility, in which, despite the prodigality of nature, I saw only poverty, a dearth of all that delightful superfluity which alone can make life precious, and a humanity to which I was ashamed to remember that I belonged. Such is the Terra di Lavoro[55] where labor is held in abhorrence, where everything is sold for a song, where the inhabitants feel relieved of a burden when they find someone willing to accept their gifts of all kinds of fruits. I saw that the Romans had not erred in calling them brutes instead of Bruttii.[56] The priests who were traveling with me laughed when I confessed to my fear of the tarantula and the chersydrus.[57] I believed that the malady they communicated was even more horrible than that of Venus. The priests assured me that they were fabulous and laughed at the Georgics[58] of Vergil and the line which I quoted to justify my fear.

I found Bishop Bernardo da Bernardis sitting in an uncomfortable chair at a wretched table on which he was writing. He got up to raise me from my knees and, instead of blessing me, clasped me to his bosom. I saw that he was sincerely concerned when I told him that I had found no word at Naples telling me where I could come to fall at his feet, and he looked relieved when I said that I was in debt to no one and in good health.

He sighed as he told me of his feelings and his poverty, and ordered a servant to lay a third place at his table. In addition to this man, he had the most canonical of maidservants and a priest whose few words at table made me think him a great ignoramus. His house was quite large, but badly built and falling to ruin. It had so little furniture that, to provide me with a poor bed in a room near his, he had to give me one of his own hard mattresses. His wretched dinner horrified me. His attachment to the rule of his order made him keep the fast and the oil was bad. However, he was intelligent and, what is more, an honest man. He told me what greatly surprised me—that his bishopric, though it was not one of the poorest, yielded him only five hundred ducati del regno[59] a year and, still worse, he was in debt to the amount of six hundred. He said with a sigh that the only happiness he enjoyed was having escaped from the clutches of the monks, whose persecution of him had made his life a purgatory for fifteen years. All this information discouraged me, for it showed me the straits in which my presence must put him. I saw that he was disconcerted to realize what a poor present he had made me. Yet I felt that he was only to be pitied.

He smiled when I asked him if he had good books, a literary circle, or any good society in which to spend a pleasant hour or two. He admitted that in his entire diocese there was not a person who could boast of writing decently, still less of having taste and any notion of good literature, not a single real library, and no one curious enough to look into a newspaper. However, he promised me that we would give some time to letters together when the books he had ordered from Naples arrived.

That might well be; but without a good library, a circle, a spirit of rivalry, a literary intercourse, was this the country in which I must settle down at the age of eighteen? Seeing me thoughtful and almost overwhelmed by the prospect of the dreary life I must be prepared to lead with him, he tried to encourage me by telling me that he would do everything in his power to make me content.

As he had to officiate at a pontifical service the next day, I saw all his clergy and the women and men who filled his cathedral. It was then that I decided upon my course, grateful to fortune that I was in a position to do so. I saw nothing but brutes who seemed to me positively scandalized by my entire appearance. What ugly women! I told Monsignore in so many words that I felt no call to die a martyr in this city a few months hence.

"Give me," I said, "your episcopal blessing and permission to go, or come with me yourself, and I assure you that we shall make our fortunes. Resign your bishopric to those who made you such an ill present of it."

My proposal set him laughing again and again all the rest of the day; but if he had accepted it, he would not have died two years later in the prime of life.[60] The worthy man was moved to ask my forgiveness for the fault he had committed in bringing me there. Recognizing that it was his duty to send me back to Venice, and being without money and not knowing that I had any, he told me he would send me back to Naples, where a citizen to whom he would give me an introduction would give me sixty ducati del regno, with which I could go back to my native country. I accepted his offer gratefully, and hurried off to open my trunk and bring back the fine case of razors which Panagiotti had given me. I had all the trouble in the world persuading him to accept it, for it was worth the sixty ducati he was giving me.

He took it only because I threatened to stay on there if he persisted in refusing it. He gave me a letter to the Archbishop of Cosenza,[61] in which he praised me and asked him to send me to Naples at his expense. So it was that I left Martorano sixty hours after I arrived, pitying the Bishop whom I left there and who shed tears as he gave me a thousand heart-felt blessings.

The Bishop of Cosenza, a man of intelligence and wealth, insisted on lodging me in his house. At table I warmly praised the Bishop of Martorano; but I railed mercilessly at his diocese and then at the whole of Calabria, in a style so cutting that Monsignore and the entire company could not contain their laughter. Two ladies, relatives of his, did the honors of his table. The younger of them saw fit to disapprove of my satirical attack on her country. She declared war on me; but I mollified her by saying that Calabria would be a ravishing country if only a quarter of its inhabitants were like her. It may have been to prove the contrary of what I had maintained that, the following evening, he had a large company to supper. Cosenza is a city in which a gentleman can have a pleasant time, for there is a rich nobility, some pretty women, and some not uncultivated men.[62] I left on the third day, with a letter from the Archbishop to the celebrated Genovesi.[63]

I had five traveling companions who struck me from the first as being pirates or professional thieves, so I was careful never to let them see that I had a well-filled purse. I always slept with my breeches on, not only for the safety of my money but as a precaution I thought necessary in a country where unnatural desires are common.

I arrived at Naples on September 16th, and at once went to deliver my letter from the Bishop of Martorano. It was addressed to Signor Gennaro Palo, at Santa Anna.

This man, whose only obligation was to give me sixty ducati, read the letter and said that he would be glad to put me up, as he wanted me to make the acquaintance of his son, who wrote poetry too. The Bishop had written him that I was a sublime poet. After the usual protests, I accepted his invitation, then went and had my little trunk carried to his house. As soon as I got back, he had me shown into his room again.

CHAPTER IX

I make a short but pleasant stay in Naples. Don Antonio Casanova. Don Lelio Caraffa. I go to Rome in delightful company and there enter the service of Cardinal Acquaviva. Barbaruccia. Testaccio. Frascati.

I FOUND no difficulty in answering all the questions he asked me; what I did find most strange and curious was the prolonged laughter which burst from his lungs at every answer I made him. My account of the poverty of Calabria and the state of the Bishop of Martorano, both of which I described in a way to draw tears, roused his laughter to the point where I thought it would kill him.

He was big, fat, and red-faced. Thinking that he was mocking me, I was ready to take offense when he finally became calm and told me with great earnestness that I must pardon his laughter, for it was due to a disease which ran in his family and that one of his uncles had actually died of it.

"Died of laughing?"

"Yes. The disease, which was unknown to Hippocrates,[1] is called li flati."[2]

"How can this be? Do hypochondriac affections, which make all their victims melancholy, make you cheerful?"

"But my flati, instead of acting on the hypochrondrium,[3] affect my spleen, which my physician holds to be the organ of laughter. It is a new discovery."

"Not at all. Indeed, it is a very old idea."

"You don't say so! We shall discuss it at table, for I hope you will spend several weeks here."

"I cannot. I must leave day after tomorrow at the latest."

"Then you have some money?"

"I am counting on the sixty ducati which you will have the goodness to give me."

At this his laughter began again; he accounted for it afterward by telling me that the idea of making me stay there as long as he pleased had amused him. He then asked me to go and see his son who, at the age of fourteen, was already a great poet. A maidservant showed me to his room, and I was delighted to find him a youth of fine presence and with a manner which aroused interest at once. After greeting me most politely, he asked me to excuse him if he could not give me his entire attention, since he was busy on a canzone which must go to press the next day; a young lady who was related to the Duchess of Bovino[4] was to take the veil at Santa Chiara, and his poem was for the occasion. Considering his excuse more than legitimate, I offered to help him. He read me his canzone and, finding it full of enthusiasm and versified in the manner of Guidi,[5] I advised him to call it an ode. After praising it where it deserved praise, I ventured to correct it where I thought it needed correction, even going so far as to substitute new verses for those I considered weak. He thanked me, asking me if I were not Apollo himself, and began making a copy of it to send to the compiler. While he was copying it, I wrote a sonnet on the same subject. Paolo was delighted with it and insisted that I sign it and send it to the compiler with his ode.

While I was copying it for the second time to correct some errors in spelling, he went to his father and asked him who I was, which set him laughing until we sat down at table. A bed was made up for me in the young man's own room, an arrangement which pleased me greatly.

Don Gennaro's family consisted only of this son, a daughter who was not pretty, his wife, and two old sisters who were very devout. At supper he had some men of letters. I made the acquaintance of the Marchese Galiani, who was writing a commentary on Vitruvius[6] and was the brother of the Abate Galiani, whom I met at Paris twenty years later when he was embassy secretary to the Count of Cantillana.[7] The next day at supper I met the celebrated Genovesi, who had already received the letter the Archbishop of Cosenza had written him. He talked to me at some length of Apostolo Zeno[8] and the Abate Conti.[9] During supper he remarked that the most venial mortal sin a regular priest could commit was to say two masses in one day to earn two more carlini, whereas a secular priest who committed the same sin deserved burning.

The next day the nun took the veil, and the most highly praised compositions in the raccolta[10] were the two by Paolo and myself. A Neapolitan named Casanova no sooner learned that I was a foreigner than he became curious to meet me. Finding that I was staying with Don Gennaro, he came to compliment him on the occasion of his name day, which was celebrated the day after the nun took the veil at Santa Chiara.

After telling me his name, Don Antonio Casanova asked me if my family was originally Venetian. "I am, Signore," I answered modestly, "a great-grandson of the grandson of the unfortunate Marcantonio Casanova who was secretary to Cardinal Pompeo Colonna and who died of the plague at Rome in the year 1528, during the pontificate of Clement VII." Upon hearing this, he embraced me and called me his cousin. It was just at this moment that the whole company thought Don Gennaro would die from laughing, for it seemed impossible to laugh as he was doing and live through it. His wife gave Don Antonio a look of annoyance and said that since he was aware of her husband's disorder, he might well have spared him this absurdity; he answered that he could not have supposed it a laughing matter; I said nothing for, all things considered, I thought this scene of recognition highly comic. When Don Gennaro quieted down, Don Antonio, never losing his gravity, invited me to dinner, together with young Paolo, who had become my inseparable friend.

The first thing my worthy cousin did when I arrived at his house was to show me his genealogical tree, which began with a Don Francisco, brother of Don Juan. In mine, which I knew by heart, Don Juan, from whom I was directly descended, was born posthumously. It was possible that Marcantonio had had a brother; but when he learned that mine began with Don Francisco, of Aragon, who lived at the end of the fourteenth century, and that in consequence the whole genealogy of the illustrious house of the Casanovas of Saragossa became his own, he was so beside himself with joy that he did not know what to do to convince me that the blood which flowed in his veins was mine.

Seeing that he was curious to know what chance had brought me to Naples, I told him that, having entered the Church after my father's death, I was on my way to seek my fortune in Rome. When he introduced me to his family I thought his wife did not receive me cordially; but his pretty daughter and his still prettier niece could easily have made me believe in the fabled power of blood. After dinner he told me that the Duchess of Bovino had expressed her curiosity to know who this Abate Casanova was, and that he would consider it an honor to take me to call on her and introduce me as his relative.

Since we were alone, I begged him to excuse me, as I was outfitted only for my journey. I told him that I had to spare my purse, so that I should not arrive in Rome without money. Delighted at my confiding my reason to him, and persuaded that it was a good one, he told me that he was rich and that I must not hesitate to let him take me to a tailor. He assured me that no one would know of it and that he would be greatly chagrined if I refused him the pleasure. I clasped his hand and said that I was ready to do whatever he wished. So he went with me to a tailor, who took all the measurements he indicated, and who the next day appeared at Don Gennaro's bringing me everything the most highborn abate would need to appear in society. Don Antonio arrived later, stayed for dinner with Don Gennaro, then took me to call on the Duchess with young Paolo. To show her graciousness she at once addressed me in the familiar form, as is the custom in Naples. She was with her very pretty daughter, then ten or twelve years of age, who some years later became Duchess of Matalona.[11] She presented me with a snuffbox of light tortoise shell covered with arabesque incrustations in gold. She invited us to dine with her on the following day and said that afterwards we would go to Santa Chiara to call on the new nun.

When I left the Casa Bovino I went by myself to Panagiotti's warehouse to obtain the cask of muscat wine. The head of the establishment did me the favor of putting it in two small casks, of which I sent one to Don Gennaro and the other to Don Antonio. As I left the warehouse, I encountered the worthy Greek, who was glad to see me again. Was I to blush in the presence of this man whom I knew I had deceived? Not at all—on the contrary, he considered that I had acted most uprightly toward him.

At supper Don Gennaro thanked me for my valuable present without laughing. The next day Don Antonio, in return for the excellent muscat I had sent him, presented me with a cane which was worth at least twenty once, and his tailor brought me a traveling suit and a blue redingote with gold buttonholes, all of the finest cloth. I could not be better outfitted. At the Duchess of Bovino's I met the wisest of all Neapolitans, the illustrious Don Lelio Caraffa,[12] of the ducal family of Matalona, for whom the King, Don Carlos, had a particular liking and whom he honored with the name of friend.

In the visiting room at Santa Chiara, I shone for two hours, holding my own against all the nuns behind the gratings and satisfying their curiosity with my answers. If my destiny had let me remain in Naples, I should have made my fortune there; but I believed I ought to go to Rome, though I had no settled plan. I steadfastly refused to yield to the urging of Don Antonio, who offered me the most honorable employment in several noble houses, which he specified to me, as tutor to the eldest son of the family.

The dinner at Don Antonio's was magnificent; but I was preoccupied and angry because his wife obviously frowned on me. I noticed that she more than once looked at my coat and then whispered something to her neighbor. She had found out everything. There are certain situations in life to which I have never learned to adapt myself. In the most brilliant company, if but a single member of it stares me up and down, I am undone; I become ill-tempered and stupid. It is a weakness.

Don Lelio Caraffa offered me a liberal salary if I would remain as tutor to his nephew the Duke of Matalona, who was then ten years old. I called to thank him and begged him to become my true benefactor by giving me a good letter of introduction for Rome. He sent me two the next morning, one addressed to Cardinal Acquaviva,[13] the other to Father Georgi, a powerful churchman.[14]

I quickly made up my mind to leave when I found that my acquaintances were determined to procure me the honor of kissing the Queen's hand. It was obvious that in answering the questions she would put to me, I should have to tell her that I had just left Martorano and give her an account of the wretched bishopric which her intercession had secured for the good Minimite. Then too, Her Majesty knew my mother, there was nothing to stop her from revealing her position in Dresden; Don Antonio would be scandalized and my genealogy made ridiculous. I knew the inevitable and unhappy results of the prejudices then current; I should have come a complete cropper. I left while it was still time. Don Antonio presented me with a watch in a tortoiseshell case inlaid with gold and gave me a letter to Don Gaspare Vivaldi,[15] whom he termed his best friend. Don Gennaro gave me sixty ducati, and his son begged me to write to him and swore eternal friendship. They all wept as they accompanied me to a coach in which I had taken the last place.

From my landing at Chioggia until my arrival at Naples, fortune had treated me outrageously. It was at Naples that I began to breathe again, and Naples was always propitious to me, as will be seen in the course of these memoirs. At Portici I went through the horrible moment when I nearly came to the end of my courage, and for lost courage there is no remedy. It cannot be recovered. The mind succumbs to an apathy against which nothing avails. With his letter to Don Gennaro, the Bishop of Martorano compensated me for all the harm he had done me. I did not write to him until after I reached Rome.

Busy looking at the fine Strada di Toledo[16] and drying my tears, I did not think of examining the faces of my three traveling companions until we reached the gate of the great city. The man of forty or fifty years who sat beside me had a pleasant, lively face. The two women on the forward-facing seat were young and pretty; their clothes were clean and neat, they looked jolly but at the same time respectable. We reached Aversa in complete silence, where the driver told us that he would stop only to water his mules, so we did not get out. Toward nightfall we stopped at Capua. Incredible as it may seem, I never opened my mouth all day long but listened with pleasure to the dialect of the man, who was a Neapolitan, and the beautiful speech of the two sisters, who were Romans. It was the first time in my life that I had the firmness to spend five hours in silence in the company of two charming girls or women. At Capua we were given a room with two beds, as a matter of course. The man who had sat beside me was the first to speak, looking at me and saying:

"So I shall have the honor of sleeping with the Signor Abate."

"I leave it to you, Signore," I said coldly, "to make whatever arrangement you wish." This answer brought a smile to the lips of the young lady whom I had already decided was the prettier. I considered it a good omen.

We were five at supper, for when the vetturino has contracted to feed his passengers, it is customary for him to eat with them. In the casual remarks at the table I found a certain good breeding and knowledge of the world. This made me curious. After supper I went downstairs to ask the vetturino who my traveling companions were. "The man," he replied, "is an advocate and one of the two sisters is his wife, but I do not know which."

I showed them the civility of going to bed first, and also of rising earliest and going out, so that the ladies were left the freedom of the room. I did not come back until I was summoned to take coffee. I praised it, and the more attractive of the two sisters promised me the same charming offering every day.

A barber appeared and shaved the advocate and, when he had finished, offered me the same service, but in a tone which I did not like. When I answered that I had no need of him, he replied that a beard was a dirty thing.

As soon as we were in the coach the advocate remarked that barbers were mostly an insolent lot.

"The question," said my beauty, "is whether a beard is a dirty thing or not."

"The answer is yes," said the advocate, "for it is an excretion."

"That may be so," I replied, "but it is not regarded as such; does anyone call the hair an excretion? On the contrary, its growth is stimulated and it is admired for its length and beauty."

"It follows," the lady resumed, "that the barber is a fool."

"But apart from that," I replied, "have I a beard?"

"I thought so."

"Then I will begin being shaved when I get to Rome. This is the first time anyone has accused me of needing it."

"My dear wife," said the advocate, "you should have held your tongue, for it is quite possible that the Signor Abate is going to Rome to become a Capuchin."[17]

This thrust made me laugh; but I did not want to leave him master of the field. I told him that he had guessed right, but that my wish to become a Capuchin had left me as soon as I saw his wife. Laughing too, he said that his wife was mad about Capuchins, so I should not abandon my vocation. This jest having led to more, we spent our day pleasantly until we reached Garigliano, where amusing conversation made up for a poor supper. My budding inclination was fostered by the obvious partiality of its object.

As soon as we were seated in the coach the next day, the fair lady asked me if I expected to stay in Rome for a time before going on to Venice. I answered that as I knew no one in Rome, I feared I should have a dull time. She said that foreigners were well liked there and she was sure that I would find it pleasant.

"Then may I hope that you will permit me to pay my respects to you?"

"We should consider it an honor," said the advocate.

My beauty blushed, I pretended not to notice it, and we whiled away the day in talk as pleasant as that of the day before. We stopped at Terracina, and were given a room with three beds, two of them narrow, with a wide bed between them. It went without saying that the two sisters would share the wide bed, and they got into it while the advocate and I chatted at the table with our backs turned to them. The advocate got into the bed on which he saw his nightcap, and I into the other, which was only a foot from the wide bed, on the side on which his wife was lying. All vanity apart, I could not bring myself to believe that this arrangement was entirely due to chance. I was already on fire for her.

I undress, put out the candle, and lie down, considering a plan which made me restless, for I was afraid either to adopt it or to reject it. I could not get to sleep. A faint light by which I could see the bed in which the charming woman was lying kept me from closing my eyes. God knows to what decision I should finally have come, for I had been struggling with myself for over an hour, when I saw her sit up, get out of the bed, walk softly around it, and get into her husband's. After that I heard not a sound. This action was so little to my liking, indeed it so mortified and disgusted me, that I turned over on the other side and slept until dawn, when I saw the lady back in her own bed.

I dress in a foul humor and go out, leaving them all asleep. I go for a walk and do not return to the inn until, the coach being ready to leave, the two ladies and the advocate were waiting for me.

My beauty gently reproaches me with having forgone her coffee. I offer the excuse that I had needed a walk. I spent the whole morning not only without saying a word but without ever looking at her. I complained of a bad toothache. At Piperno, where we dined, she remarked to me that my indisposition was made to order. The reproach pleased me, for it gave me the right to have things out with her.

In the afternoon I played the same role all the way to Sermoneta, where we were to spend the night and which we reached early. As it was a fine day, the lady said she would like to take a little stroll and asked me civilly if I would give her my arm. I consented at once. Politeness left me no alternative. My heart was sore. I could not wait to return to my former footing, but only after having the matter out with her, and I did not know how to precipitate such an explanation.

As soon as I saw that I was far enough from her husband, who was giving his arm to her sister, I asked her what had made her think my toothache made to order.

"I will be frank. The change in your manner was too marked, you even took great care not to look at me all day. Since a toothache could not prevent you from being polite, I concluded that it was made to order. Besides, I know that none of us gave you any cause to change your attitude."

"Yet the change must have been caused by something. You are only half sincere, Signora."

"You are mistaken, Signore. I am completely sincere, and if I gave you any cause, I do not know what it was or it is something which I should not know. Be so good as to tell me in what way I have failed you."

"In no way, for I have no right to make any claim upon you."

"But you have rights, the same rights as I have, the rights which good society grants to all its members. Speak. Be as frank as I am."

"You are in duty bound not to know the cause, or rather, to pretend not to know it—that is true. But admit at the same time that my duty is not to tell it to you."

"Excellent! Now it has all come out. But if it is your duty not to tell me the reason for your change of humor, the same duty obliges you not to reveal the change. Delicacy sometimes commands a gentleman to conceal certain feelings which might be compromising. It is a restraint on impulse, I know; but it is worth the effort when it only makes him who exercises it all the more admirable."

An argument at once so subtle and so strong made me blush for shame. I pressed my lips to her hand, saying that I admitted I was in the wrong and that she would see me at her feet, begging her to forgive me, if we were not in the street. "Then let us say no more about it," she said, and touched by my quick repentance, she gave me a look of such forgiveness that I thought I did not deepen my guilt when I took my lips from her hand and let them feed on her lovely smiling mouth.

Intoxicated with happiness, I changed from gloom to gaiety so quickly that at supper the advocate indulged in a hundred witty sallies at my toothache and the walk which had cured it. The next day we dined at Velletri, going on from there to spend the night at Marino, where despite the large number of troops we had two small rooms and a fairly good supper.

I could not have wished to be on better terms with the charming Roman. I had received only one pledge from her; but it was a pledge of the firmest love, and it assured me that, once we were in Rome, she would be wholly mine. In the coach we spoke to each other with our knees more than with our eyes, thus making sure that what we said would be overheard by no one.

The advocate had told me that he was going to Rome to conclude an ecclesiastical suit and that he would lodge with his mother-in-law near the Minerva.[18] His wife was most anxious to see her after an absence of two years, and her sister expected to remain in Rome as the wife of an employee in the Santo Spirito bank.[19] Invited to call on them, I promised that I would avail myself of the opportunity whenever my business should permit.

We had come to the dessert when my beauty, admiring the design of my snuffbox, said to her husband that she wished she had one like it. He promised that she should.

"Then buy this one, Signore," I said; "I will let you have it for twenty once. You can pay the amount to the bearer of a note of hand which you will draw up for me. He will be an Englishman to whom I happen to owe that sum and whom I am glad to have this means of repaying."

"Your snuffbox," said the advocate, "is worth the twenty once you ask, and I should be delighted to see it in my wife's possession, she would find it a pleasant reminder of you; but I will do nothing but pay you cash for it."

Seeing that I was unwilling, his wife told him that she could just as well write me the note of hand to bearer which I needed. He answered, with a laugh, that she must beware of me, for it was all a trick on my part. "Don't you see," he added, "that his Englishman is a fiction? He will never put in an appearance, and the snuffbox will be ours for nothing. This Abate, my dear wife, is a great rogue."

"I had no idea," she answered, with a look at me, "that such rogues existed." I told her sadly that I wished I were rich enough to be able to indulge in such rogueries.

But now something happened which filled me with joy. There was one bed in the room where we were eating supper and another in an adjoining closet which had no door and could only be entered from the room we were in. The two sisters naturally chose the closet. When they were in bed the advocate went to bed too, and I followed him. Before extinguishing the candle, I put my head into the closet to wish them a good night. My real reason was to find out on which side of the bed the wife was lying. I had a plan all prepared.

But what curses did I not heap on my bed when I heard the dreadful noise it made when I got into it! Feeling certain that the lady would be acquiescent even though she had promised me nothing, I wait until the advocate begins snoring, then start to get up to pay her a visit; but as soon as I try to rise, the bed begins squeaking, the advocate wakes and puts out his arm. He feels that I am there and goes back to sleep. A half hour later I try the same maneuver, the bed goes through the same lazzi[20] and the advocate through the other. Sure that I am there, he goes back to sleep, but the accursed blabbing of the bed makes me decide to abandon my plan. But then the most unlikely thing happens.

A great noise of people running up and down stairs, tramping back and forth, fills the house. We hear gunshots, a drum beating the alarm, cries, shouts, someone knocks at our door, the advocate asks me what is going on. I say I have no idea and will he please let me sleep. The terrified sisters ask us in Heaven's name to bring a light. The advocate gets up in his shirt to look for one, and I get up too. I go to shut the door after him, and I shut it, but the spring breaks and I find it can only be opened with the key, which I do not have. I proceed to the bed of the two sisters to hearten them amid the noise and confusion, the cause of which I did not know. While I am telling them that the lawyer will be back in a moment with a light, I obtain some substantial favors. The weak resistance emboldens me. Fearing to lose a time so precious, I bend forward and, to take the object of my affection in my arms, I let myself fall on it. The planks supporting the mattress slip and the bed collapses. The advocate knocks, the sister gets up, my goddess begs me to leave her, I cannot but yield to her prayers, I grope my way to the door and tell the advocate that, as the spring is out of order, I cannot open it. He goes downstairs to find the key. The two sisters were behind me in their shifts. Hoping I have time to finish, I put out my arms; but, feeling that I am roughly repulsed, I realize that it must be the sister. I take hold of the other. The advocate being now at the door with a bunch of keys, she begs me in God's name to go back to bed, for if her husband sees me in the dreadful state I must be in, he will guess everything. Feeling that my hands are sticky, I understand what she means, and I hurry to my bed. The sisters retire to theirs, and the advocate comes in.

He at once goes to the closet to reassure them; but he bursts out laughing when he sees them buried in the fallen bed. He urges me to go and look, but I naturally excuse myself. He tells us that the alarm was due to a German detachment having surprised the Spanish troops which were in the town and which thereupon decamped. A quarter of an hour later not a soul was left, and silence succeeded all the uproar. After congratulating me on not having stirred from my bed, he lay down again.

I waited sleeplessly for dawn so that I could go downstairs and wash and change my shirt. When I saw the state I was in, I admired my love's presence of mind. The advocate would have guessed everything. Not only were my shirt and my hands dirtied, but, I do not know how, so was my face. Alas! he would have found me guilty, and I was not as guilty as I might have been. This camisade is recorded in history; but I am not mentioned. I laugh every time I read it in the elegant De Amicis,[21] who wrote better than Sallust.

My divinity's sister sulked over our coffee; but on the face of the angel whom I loved I saw love, friendliness, and content. It is a great pleasure to feel happy. Can one be so and not feel it? The theologians say one can. Let them go mind their own business! I saw myself in possession of Donna Lucrezia (for such was her name), though I had obtained nothing from her. Neither her eyes nor the slightest of her gestures retracted anything; the ostensible reason for our laughter was the rout of the Spaniards; but that, though she did not know it, was only incidental.

We reached Rome early. At the Tower,[22] where we ate an omelette, I cajoled the advocate with the fondest advances; I called him "papa," I gave him a hundred kisses, and I predicted that he would become the father of a son, which obliged his wife to vow that she would give him one. Then I said so many charming things to my idol's sister that she had to forgive me the collapse of the bed. On leaving them I said I would visit them the next day. I was let out at an inn near the Piazza di Spagna,[23] whence the vetturino took them to their house near the Minerva.

So here I was in Rome, with a good wardrobe, a fair amount of money, some jewelry, and a fair amount of experience, with good letters of recommendation, completely free, and at an age when a man can count on the help of fortune if he has a spark of courage and a face which disposes those whom he approaches to look on him with favor. It is not beauty, but something more valuable, which I possessed but which I cannot define. I felt that I was capable of anything. I knew that Rome was the one city in which a man who set out from nothing had often risen very high; and it is not surprising that I believed I possessed all the qualities needed to rise; my capital was an unbridled self-esteem which inexperience prevented me from mistrusting.

The man fit to make a fortune in this ancient capital of Italy must be a chameleon sensitive to all the colors which the light casts on his surroundings. He must be flexible, insinuating, a great dissimulator, impenetrable, obliging, often base, ostensibly sincere, always pretending to know less than he does, keeping to one tone of voice, patient, in complete control of his countenance, cold as ice when another in his place would be on fire; and if he is so unfortunate as not to have religion in his heart he must have it in his mind, and, if he is an honest man, accept the painful necessity of admitting to himself that he is a hyprocrite. If he loathes the pretense, he should leave Rome and seek his fortune in England. Of all these necessary qualities—I do not know if I am boasting or admitting my deficiency—I possessed only obligingness, which, without the others, is a fault. I was an interesting fool, a rather fine horse of a good breed, but unbroken or, what is worse, badly broken.

I at once took Don Lelio's letter to Father Georgi. This learned monk was esteemed by the whole city. The Pope thought highly of him because, being no friend to the Jesuits, he did not hide the fact. The Jesuits, for their part, thought themselves strong enough to disregard him.

After carefully reading the letter, he said he was prepared to be my adviser and that hence, if I wished, I might make him responsible for preserving me from misfortune, for if a man behaves himself properly he need not fear that evil will befall him. He then asked me what I wanted to do in Rome, to which I replied that it was for him to tell me.

"All in due time. So come and see me often, and conceal nothing from me, nothing, I say, of all that concerns you and happens to you."

"Don Lelio also gave me a letter to Cardinal Acquaviva."

"Then I congratulate you, for he is the one man who has more power in Rome than the Pope."

"Shall I take it to him at once?"

"No. I will speak to him about you this evening. Come here tomorrow early. I will tell you where and when you are to deliver it to him. Have you money?"

"Enough to keep me for at least a year."

"Excellent. Have you any acquaintances?"

"None."

"Do not make any without consulting me, and above all do not go to coffeehouses and eating houses, and if you must go, listen and do not talk. Shun those who would interrogate you and if politeness obliges you to answer, evade the question if it can lead to any consequences. Do you speak French?"

"Not a word."

"Too bad—you must learn it. Have you finished your studies?"

"That is all to the good, but be on your guard, for Rome is the city of infarinati, and they are forever unmasking each other and bickering among themselves. I hope that when you take your letter to the Cardinal, you will be dressed as a modest abate and not in that elegant coat, which is not of a cut to placate Fortune. Good-by until tomorrow."

Very well pleased with the monk, I went to the Campo di Fiore[25] to deliver my cousin Don Antonio's letter to Don Gaspare Vivaldi. This excellent man received me in his library, where he was conversing with two respectable abati. After welcoming me most graciously, Don Gaspare asked me for my address and invited me to dinner the next day. He spoke in the highest terms of Father Georgi and, seeing me to the stairs, said that he would attend the next day to paying the sum which Don Antonio directed him to give me.

So my generous cousin was giving me more money, which I could not refuse. It is not difficult to give, but to know how to give. On my way home I met Father Steffano; he was the same as ever and loaded me with caresses. I could not but feel a certain respect for this sordid freak, whom Providence had employed to save me from utter ruin. After telling me that the Pope had granted him all that he asked, he warned me to avoid the policeman who had given me the two zecchini, for, finding that he had been deceived, he wanted his revenge. The rascal was in the right. I told Frate Steffano to persuade the officer to deposit my note with some merchant and when I knew with whom it had been left I would go and take it up. The thing was arranged in this fashion, I paid the two zecchini, and the ugly business was over.

I supped at an eating house with some Romans and some foreigners, faithfully following Father Georgi's advice. I was made to listen to some harsh criticism of the Pope and of the Cardinal Minister, who was responsible for the Papal State's being inundated by eighty thousand men, both Germans and Spaniards. What surprised me was that everyone ate meat, though it was a Saturday; but at the end of a week a number of things I observed in Rome had exhausted my capacity for surprise. There is not a Catholic Christian city in the world where people are less strict in matters of religion than they are at Rome. The Romans are like the employees at the tobacco monopoly, who are allowed to take away as much as they please for nothing. The citizens of Rome live in the greatest freedom, except for one thing: the ordini santissimi[26] are as much to be feared as lettres de cachet[27] were in Paris before the atrocious revolution.

It was on the next day, October 1st of the year 1743, that I finally made up my mind to be shaved. My down had become a beard. I felt that I must begin to renounce certain privileges of adolescence. I dressed completely in the Roman fashion, as Don Antonio's tailor had decreed that I should do. Father Georgi seemed much pleased when he saw me so turned out. After inviting me to take a cup of chocolate with him, he told me that the Cardinal had been informed of my impending visit by a letter from the same Don Lelio, and that His Excellency would receive me about noon at the Villa Negroni,[28] where he would be taking a stroll. I said that I was to dine at Signor Vivaldi's, and he advised me to visit him often.

At the Villa Negroni, the Cardinal no sooner saw me than he stopped to receive my letter, leaving the two people who were with him to walk on. He put it in his pocket without reading it. After two minutes of silence, which he spent looking at me, he asked me if I felt any inclination for politics. I answered that as yet I had not felt drawn to anything but frivolities, and that hence I could only answer for my extreme readiness to do whatever His Excellency should command me, if he found me worthy to enter his service. He at once told me to go to his palace[29] the next morning and speak with the Abate Gama,[30] whom he would inform of his intentions. "You must," he said, "set about learning French at once. It is indispensable." After asking me if Don Lelio was in good health, he left me, giving me his hand to kiss.

From there I went to the Campo di Fiore, where Don Gaspare kept me to dine with a select company. He was a bachelor and his only passion was literature. He loved Latin poetry even more than Italian and his favorite poet was Horace, whom I knew by heart. After dinner he gave me a hundred Roman scudi[31] on behalf of Don Antonio Casanova. After I signed a receipt for the amount, he said that he would be delighted to have me take chocolate with him in his library any morning.

When I left his house I went to the Minerva quarter. I could not wait to see how surprised Donna Lucrezia and her sister Angelica would be. To find the house, I inquired where Donna Cecilia Monti lived. This was her mother.

I found a young widow, who looked as if she were the sister of her daughters. I did not need to tell her who I was, for she was expecting me. Her daughters entered, and their reception of me gave me some passing amusement, for they seemed to think I was a different person.

Donna Lucrezia introduced her younger sister to me, a girl of eleven, and her brother the abate, who was fifteen and as handsome as possible.

I maintained a behavior calculated to please the mother: I was modest and respectful and showed a fittingly lively interest in everything about me. The advocate arrived and, surprised to find me so greatly changed, was flattered when I remembered to address him as father. He began making jokes and I followed his lead, though not so far as to color my witticisms with the levity which had kept us laughing in the coach. "Having your beard shaved," he said, "has added one to your mind." Donna Lucrezia did not know what to make of the change in my manner. Toward nightfall I observed the arrival of some ladies who were neither ugly nor beautiful and of five or six abati who were clearly material for study. All these gentlemen listened most attentively to whatever I said, and I left them free to make what conjectures they pleased. Donna Cecilia told the advocate that he was an excellent painter but that his portraits were not good likenesses; he answered that she saw me wearing a mask, and I pretended to find his explanation mortifying. Donna Lucrezia said that I seemed to her exactly the same, and Donna Angelica maintained that the air of Rome gave foreigners a completely different appearance. Everyone applauded her aphorism, and she blushed with pleasure. After four hours I slipped away, but the advocate came running after me to tell me that Donna Cecilia wished me to consider myself a friend of the house, free to call there at any time without ceremony. I returned to my inn, hoping that I had pleased the household as much as it had enchanted me.

The next morning I waited on the Abate Gama. He was a Portuguese and appeared to be about forty years of age; his handsome countenance expressed frankness, humor, and intelligence. His affability sought to inspire trust. His speech and his manners were such that he could have passed as a Roman. He told me in honeyed phrases that His Excellency had himself given orders to his majordomo in regard to my residing in the palace. He said that I should dine and sup with him at the secretaries' table and that until I had learned French, I could, when I saw fit, occupy myself with making abstracts of letters which he would give me. He then gave me the address of the French teacher, to whom he had already spoken. He was a Roman advocate named Dalacqua, who lived directly across from the Palazzo di Spagna.[32]

After giving me these brief instructions and telling me that I could count on his friendship, he had a servant take me to the majordomo, who, after making me sign my name in a large book, at the bottom of a page filled with other names, paid me sixty Roman scudi in bank notes as three months' salary in advance. Followed by a footman he then took me up to the fourth floor and showed me my apartment. It consisted of an anteroom next to which was a bedroom with an alcove between two smaller rooms, all very nicely furnished. We then left, and the servant handed me the key and told me that he would come to wait on me every morning. He took me to the main door to make me known to the porter. Without losing an instant, I went to my inn and arranged to have my few possessions transported to the Palazzo di Spagna. This is the whole story of my sudden entrance into a house in which I would have made a great fortune if I had conducted myself in a way in which, being what I was, I could not. Volentem ducit, nolentem trahit ("[Fate] leads the willing, drags the unwilling").[33]

I at once went to my mentor, Father Georgi, to tell him all that had happened. He said that I could consider my career well begun and that, in the superior situation in which I found myself, my future depended entirely on how I behaved. "Bear in mind," this wise man told me, "that to make your conduct irreproachable, you must discipline yourself; and that if anything untoward befalls you, no one will consider it either a piece of bad luck or an unavoidable calamity; these terms mean nothing; it will be entirely your own fault."

"I am sorry, most reverend Father, that my youth and lack of experience will often make me trouble you. I shall become a burden to you; but you will find me docile and obedient."

"You will often think me too strict; but I foresee that you will not tell me everything."

"Everything, absolutely everything."

"Excuse me if I smile. You are not telling me where you spent four hours yesterday."

"It is of no importance. I made the acquaintance during my journey. I believe it is a decent house, where I can properly visit, unless you tell me it is not."

"Heaven forbid! It is a perfectly decent house, frequented by respectable people. The family is happy to have made your acquaintance. You pleased all their guests and they hope you will become a member of their circle. I heard all about it this morning. But you must not visit them constantly."

"Am I to stop going there from one day to the next?"

"No. That would be impolite. Go once or twice a week. But not regularly. You sigh, my son."

"No, no. I will obey you."

"I do not wish you to do it out of obedience, and I hope that your heart will not suffer; but, whether or no, you must conquer it. Remember that reason has no greater enemy than the heart."

"Yet it is possible to reconcile them."

"There are those who think so. Beware of the animum of your favorite Horace. You know there is no middle course, nisi paret imperat."[34]

"Yes. Compesce catenis,[35] he tells me, and he is right. But in Donna Cecilia's house my heart is not in danger."

"So much the better for you. For then ceasing to frequent it will not pain you. Remember it is my duty to believe what you say."

"And it is mine to follow your advice. I will go to Donna Cecilia's only occasionally."

Stricken with despair, I took his hand to kiss it, but he withdrew it and embraced me, turning away so that I should not see his tears.

I dined at the Palazzo di Spagna, sitting beside the Abate Gama at a table with ten or twelve other abati, for in Rome everyone either is or wants to be an abate. Since there is no prohibition against wearing their distinctive dress, everyone who wants to be respected wears it, with the exception of noblemen who have not entered on an ecclesiastical career. At table, where my grief kept me from saying a word, my silence was attributed to my sagacity. The Abate Gama invited me to spend the day with him, but I excused myself on the ground that I had some letters to write. I spent seven hours writing to Don Lelio, to Don Antonio, to my young friend Paolo, and to the Bishop of Martorano, who candidly answered me that he wished he were in my place.

In love with Donna Lucrezia and happy in my love, I thought that to abandon her was the blackest perfidy. To ensure the supposititious happiness of my life in the future, I was to begin by destroying my present happiness and denying my heart; I could accept this logic only by becoming a base object of contempt at the judgment seat of my own reason. I decided that when he forbade me her house Father Georgi should not have told me that it was respectable; my grief would have been less.

The next morning the Abate Gama brought me a large book filled with ministerial letters which I was to abstract to keep myself occupied. When I was ready to go out, I went to have my first French lesson; then, with the idea of taking a walk, I was crossing the Strada Condotta, when I heard my name called from a coffeehouse. It was the Abate Gama. I whispered to him that Minerva had forbidden me the coffeehouses of Rome.

"Minerva," he answered, "commands you to acquire some notion of them. Sit down here beside me."

I heard a young abate loudly recounting a true, or imaginary, incident which directly impugned the justice of the Pope, though without bitterness. Everyone laughed, and he joined in. Another, asked why he had left the service of Cardinal B., answered that is was because His Eminence claimed not to be obliged to pay him, except for certain extra services which he demanded in his nightcap. The laughter was general. Another came over and told the Abate Gama that if he cared to while away the afternoon at the Villa Medici,[36] he would find him there with due romanelle[37] who asked only a quartino.[38] This is a gold coin worth one fourth of a zecchino. Another read an inflammatory sonnet against the government and several people copied it. Another read a satire of his own composition which tore the honor of a family to shreds. In comes a pretty-faced abate. His hips and thighs make me think him a girl in disguise; I say so to the Abate Gama, who tells me that it is Beppino della Mammana,[39] a famous castrato. The Abate calls him over and laughingly says that I had taken him for a girl. He gives me a bold look and says that if I will spend the night with him he will serve me as a boy or a girl, whichever I choose.

At dinner everyone at the table spoke to me, and I thought that I had made such answers as I should. Giving me coffee in his room afterward, the Abate Gama said that all the company with whom I had dined were respectable men, then asked me if I believed I had made a good impression on them.

"I venture to think so."

"You flatter yourself. You evaded certain questions so obviously that everyone at the table was aware that you were keeping something back. No one will ask you any more questions."

"I should be sorry if they did not. Was I to make public what is my own business?"

"No, but there is always a middle course."

"So Horace tells us.[40] It is often difficult."

"That is my sole aim."

"God bless me! today you aimed at esteem far more than at affection. That is all very fine, but you must be prepared to fight envy and her daughter calumny; if those two monsters cannot ruin you, you will triumph. At table you demolished Salicetti,[41] who is a physician and, what is more, a Corsican. He must hold it against you."

"Was I to let him maintain that the voglie[42] of pregnant women cannot have the slightest influence on the skin of the fetus? I know from experience that they do. Are you of my opinion?"

"I am neither of yours nor of his, for I have certainly seen children with marks that are called 'longings'; but I cannot answer that those marks come from longings their mothers have had."

"But I can swear to it."

"So much the better for you if you know it so positively, and so much the worse for him if he denies that it is possible. Leave him to his error. That is better than to convince him he is wrong, and make an enemy of him."

That evening I went to Donna Lucrezia's. They knew my news, and congratulated me. She told me that I looked sad, and I answered that I was in mourning for my time, which was no longer mine to dispose of as I wished. Her husband told her that I was in love with her, and his mother-in-law advised him not to be so sure of himself. After spending only an hour there, I returned to the palace, setting the air on fire with my amorous sighs. I spent the night composing an ode which I sent to the advocate the next morning, being certain that he would show it to his wife, who was fond of poetry and who did not know that it was my passion. I spent three days without going to see her. I studied French and abstracted letters from ministers.

His Excellency was "at home" every evening, and at these occasions the highest nobility of Rome, both men and women, were present; I did not attend. Gama told me that I should attend as he did, without putting myself forward. I went. No one spoke to me; but since I was unknown, everyone asked who I was. Gama asked me which of the ladies I thought the most charming, and I pointed her out to him; but I was sorry at once, for I saw the toady go and tell her what I had said. I saw her look at me attentively, then smile. She was the Marchesa G.,[43] whose gallant was Cardinal S. C.[44]

On the morning of a day when I had decided to spend the evening at Donna Lucrezia's, her husband appeared in my room and, after saying that I was wrong if I thought I was convincing him that I was not in love with his wife by not going to see her more often, he invited me to a light repast at Testaccio with the whole family on the following Thursday. He said that at Testaccio I would see the only pyramid in Rome.[45] He said that his wife knew my ode by heart and that she had aroused a great desire to make my acquaintance in his sister-in-law Donna Angelica's fiancé, who was a poet and would make one of the party going to Testaccio. I promised to be at his house at the appointed hour in a carriage seating two.

At that time the Thursdays in October were days for gaiety in Rome. That evening at Donna Cecilia's we talked of nothing but the excursion, and I felt that Donna Lucrezia was counting on it as much as I was. We did not know how, but, consecrated to love, we commended ourselves to its protection. We loved each other and pined because we could not exchange proofs of it.

I did not want my good Father Georgi to learn of the outing from anyone but myself. I was determined to go to him and ask his permission. I feigned indifference, and he offered no objection. Indeed, he told me that I should certainly go, it was an irreproachable family party, and in any case there was nothing against my getting to know Rome and enjoying decent diversions.

I went to Donna Cecilia's at the appointed hour in a coupé which I hired from a native of Avignon named Roland.[46] My acquaintance with this man had important consequences, which will give me occasion to speak of him eighteen years hence. The charming widow introduced her future son-in-law Don Francesco to me as a great admirer of literary men and unusually well versed in letters. Taking this description at its face value, I treated him accordingly; at the same time I thought him stupid-looking and quite without the gallantry to be expected in a young man who was about to marry an extremely pretty girl, for such Angelica was. However, he was respectable and rich, which is worth far more than gallantry and learning.

When we started to get into our carriages, the advocate told me that he would keep me company in mine and that the three ladies would go with Don Francesco. I answered that he would go with Don Francesco himself, since Donna Cecilia should properly fall to my share, and any other arrangement would be an insult to me; and so saying, I gave my arm to the beautiful widow, who agreed that my arrangement was in accordance with the rules of etiquette observed in the best society. I saw approval in Donna Lucrezia's eyes, but I was amazed at the advocate, for he could not fail to know that he owed me his wife. "Can he have become jealous?" I asked myself. If he had, I should be greatly put out; yet I hoped that at Testaccio I could make him see his duty.

The journey and the collation at the advocate's expense easily brought us to the end of the day, but the gaiety was at mine. There was none of the usual joking about my love for Donna Lucrezia, and I lavished my attentions only on Donna Cecilia. I said but a few casual words to Donna Lucrezia and not one to the advocate. I thought this the only way to make him understand that he had failed in his duty to me. When we were ready to return to our carriages, the advocate took Donna Cecilia from me and seated himself beside her in the carriage for four in which Donna Angelica and Don Francesco had already taken places; so, almost out of my mind with delight, I gave my arm to Donna Lucrezia, treating her to some inane compliment, while the advocate, laughing heartily, appeared to be congratulating himself on having tricked me.

How many things we should have said to each other before giving ourselves up to our love if time had not been so precious! But knowing all too well that we had only half an hour, we instantly became a single individual. At the summit of happiness and intoxicated with satisfaction, I was surprised to hear Donna Lucrezia's lips utter these words: "Oh, my God! what misery!" She pushes me away, rearranges her clothes, the coachman stops, and the footman opens the door.

"What is it?" I ask, restoring myself to a decent condition.

"We are home."

Every time I recall this episode, I think it fabulous, or supernatural. It is not possible to reduce time to nothing, for it was less than an instant, yet the horses were worn-out nags. We had two pieces of good luck. The first was that the night was dark, the second that my angel was seated where she had to get out first. The advocate was at the door the moment the footman opened it. Nothing can be more quickly put to rights than a woman. But a man! If I had been on the other side, I should have been in a sorry fix. She got out slowly, and it all passed off perfectly. I remained at Donna Cecilia's until midnight.

I went to bed—but how was I to sleep? I was still filled with all the fire which the too short distance between Testaccio and Rome had prevented me from returning to the Sun from which it came. It was devouring my entrails. Alas for those who think that the pleasure of Venus is worth anything, unless it comes from two hearts which love each other and which are in perfect concord!

I got up in time to go for my lesson. My French teacher had a pretty daughter named Barbara; the first times I went to take a lesson she was always present, and indeed she sometimes gave it to me herself, and even better than her father. A handsome youth who also came for lessons was her lover, as I did not find it hard to perceive. This youth often came to visit me, and one reason why I liked him was his discretion. I had talked to him about Barbaruccia[47] a dozen times, but though he admitted that he loved her, he always changed the subject. I ceased to mention it to him; but not having seen him for several days, either at my apartment or at the French teacher's, and Barbaruccia having ceased to appear too, I wanted to know what had happened, more out of curiosity than from any real concern.

Finally, as I was coming out of church after mass at San Carlo al Corso, I see the young man. I go up to him and reproach him for dropping out of sight. He answers that his soul was so tormented by a grievous misfortune that he did not know what he was doing; that he was on the brink of ruin; that he was desperate.

I see that his eyes are filled with tears, he makes to leave me, I hold him back, I tell him that he can no longer count me among his friends if he will not confide his troubles to me. At that he stops, leads me to a cloister, and speaks as follows:

"I have loved Barbaruccia for six months, and three have gone by since she made me certain that I was loved. Five days ago her father came upon us at five o'clock in the morning in a situation which left no doubt that we were guilty lovers. He controlled himself and left the room, but just as I was about to throw myself at his feet, he conducted me to the door of the house and forbade me ever to enter it again. The monster who betrayed us was the maidservant. I cannot ask her hand in marriage because I have a married brother and my father is not rich. I have no profession and Barbaruccia has nothing. Alas! since I have confessed all to you, tell me what state she is in. Her despair must be as great as mine, it cannot be greater. There is no way that I can get a letter to her, for she never leaves the house, even to go to mass. Alas for me! what shall I do!"

I could only condole with him, for as a man of honor I could not interfere in such a situation. I told him I had not seen her for five days, and not knowing what else to say I gave him the advice which all fools give in such circumstances: I advised him to forget her. We were on the Ripetta[48] quay, and, the distracted look with which he fixed his eyes on the waters of the Tiber making me fear that his despair would lead to some tragedy, I said that I would ask her father for news of Barbaruccia and would tell him what I learned. He implored me not to forget him.

It was four days since I had seen Donna Lucrezia, despite the fire which the excursion to Testaccio had kindled in my soul. I feared Father Georgi's mildness, and still more that he might have decided to stop advising me.

I went to see her after taking my lesson and found her alone in her room. She said sadly and tenderly that it was impossible I could not have had time to come and see her.

"Ah! my beloved! It is not time that I lack. I am so jealous of my love that I would rather die than have it discovered. I have been thinking of inviting you all to dinner at Frascati. I will send a phaeton for you. I hope that there we can be alone together."

"Yes, yes, do that; I am sure your invitation will not be refused."

A quarter of an hour later everyone came in and I proposed the excursion, entirely at my expense, for the following Sunday, the feast of St. Ursula, which was the name of my angel's younger sister. I asked Donna Cecilia to bring her, and her son as well. My invitation was accepted. I said that the phaeton would be at their door at exactly seven o'clock, together with myself in a carriage for two.

The next day, on my way downstairs after taking my lesson from Signor Dalacqua, I see Barbaruccia passing from one room to another; she gives me a look and drops a letter. I feel obliged to pick it up, otherwise the maid, who was coming up the stairs, would have seen it. The letter, which enclosed another and was directed to me, said: "If you think it wrong to give this letter to your friend, burn it. Pity an unhappy girl and be discreet." The enclosure, which was not sealed, ran: "If your love equals mine, you cannot hope to be happy without me. We can neither speak nor write to each other except by the intermediary I have made bold to employ. I am ready to do anything which can unite our fates until death. Think, and decide."

I felt greatly touched by the girl's cruel situation; but I at once made up my mind to return her letter to her the next day, enclosed in one from me in which I would ask her to forgive me if I could not render her this service. I wrote it that evening and put it in my pocket.

The next day I prepared to give it to her, but, having changed my breeches, I could not find it; so, having left it at home, I had to wait until the next day. In any case, I did not see the girl.

But the same day the poor, disconsolate lover appears in my room just after I had finished dining. He flings himself on a couch and paints such a vivid picture of his desperation that finally, fearing the worst, I cannot but soothe his grief by giving him Barbaruccia's letter. He was talking of killing himself because his heart told him that Barbaruccia had resolved to forget him. I had no other way to persuade him that his conviction was false than to give him the letter. It was my first error in this disastrous affair, committed because I was too soft-hearted.

He read it, read it over again, he kissed it, he wept, he flung himself on my neck thanking me for restoring him to life, and ended by saying that he would bring me his answer before I went to bed, for his mistress must be in need of the same consolation he had received. He left, assuring me that his letter would not implicate me in any way and that I was free to read it.

And in fact his letter, though it was very long, contained nothing but protestations of eternal constancy and chimerical hopes; even so, I should not have assumed the role of Mercury in the affair. To keep out of it, I need only have considered that Father Georgi would never approve of my complying.

The next morning, finding Barbaruccia's father ill, I was delighted to see his daughter sitting at his bedside. I concluded that he had probably forgiven her. It was she who gave me my lesson, though without leaving her father's side. I handed her her lover's letter, which she put in her pocket, blushing furiously. I told them they would not see me the next day. It was the feast of St. Ursula, one of the thousand martyred virgins and royal princesses. That evening at His Eminence's reception, which I attended regularly although it was only very rarely that anyone of distinction spoke to me, the Cardinal beckoned to me. He was talking with the beautiful Marchesa G., to whom Gama had reported that I thought she outshone all the other women.

"The Signora," says the Cardinal, "wants to know if you are making good progress in the French language, which she speaks to perfection."

I answer in Italian that I have learned a good deal, but that I did not yet venture to speak.

"You must venture," said the Marchesa, "but at the same time be unassuming. That will shield you from any criticism."

Since I had not failed to take the word "venture" in a sense which the Marchesa had presumably not intended, I blushed. Noticing it, she opened another subject with the Cardinal, and I slipped away.

At seven o'clock the next morning I was at Donna Cecilia's. My phaeton was at the door. We set off at once, in the same order as before. We reached Frascati in two hours.

This time my carriage was an elegant vis-à-vis,[49] softly upholstered and so well sprung that Donna Cecilia praised it. "I shall have my turn," said Donna Lucrezia, "on the way back to Rome." I bowed to her, as if taking her at her word. In this way she dissipated suspicion by defying it. Certain that my desire would be fully satisfied at the end of the day, I surrender to all my natural high spirits. After ordering a dinner which did not spare my purse, I let them take me to the Villa Ludovisi.[50] Since we might well lose sight of one another, we agreed to meet at one o'clock at the inn. The discreet Donna Cecilia took her son-in-law's arm, Donna Angelica her fiancé's, and Donna Lucrezia was left with me. Ursula went running off with her brother. In less than a quarter of an hour we were out of sight.

"Did you hear," she began, "how innocently I made sure of spending hours alone with you? And it is a vis-à-vis! How clever love is!"

"Yes, my angel, love has made our two minds one. I adore you, and I do not go for days without coming to visit you only that I may be sure of one day in which we shall be undisturbed."

"I did not think it possible. It is you who have done it all. You know too much for your age."

"A month ago, my darling, I knew nothing. You are the first woman who has initiated me into the mysteries of love. You are she whose departure will make me wretched, for in all Italy there can be but one Lucrezia."

"What! I am your first love! Alas for you! You will never get over it! Why am I not wholly yours? You, too, are my soul's first love, and you will surely be the last. Happy the woman whom you will love after me. I am not jealous of her. I am only sorry that she will not have a heart like mine."

Seeing my tears, Donna Lucrezia gave way to hers. Throwing ourselves down on a lawn, we pressed our lips together, and tasted our own tears flowing down on them. The ancient natural philosophers are right: Tears are sweet, I can swear to it; the moderns are but idle chatterers. We were sure that we had swallowed them with the nectar which our kisses distilled from our amorous souls. We were but one being, when I said that someone might catch us.

"Never fear. Our Geniuses are watching over us."

We were resting there quietly after the first brief combat, looking at each other without a word and without thinking of changing our position, when the divine Lucrezia glanced to her right.

"Look!" she said, "did I not tell you that our Geniuses were watching over us? Ah! How he stares at us! He is trying to reassure us. Look at that little demon.

Nature has no greater mystery. Admire him. He is certainly your Genius or mine.''

I thought she had gone out of her head.

''What are you saying, my angel? I do not understand you. What is it that I am to admire?''

''Do you not see that beautiful snake with his fiery scales and his raised head, which seems to be worshiping us?''

I look in the direction in which she was staring and see an iridescent snake an ell long which was indeed looking at us. I was far from pleased by the sight, but, not wishing to show less courage than she did, I controlled myself.

''Is it possible, my dearest,'' I said, ''that the sight of him does not terrify you?''

''The sight of him delights me, I tell you. I am sure that such an idol is a snake only in appearance.''

''And if he came writhing and hissing toward you?''

''I would clasp you even more closely to my breast and I would defy him to harm me. Lucrezia in your arms can feel no fear. Look. He is going away. Quick, quick! He is trying to tell us by his going that some of the profane are on their way here, and that we must find another lawn on which to renew our pleasures. So let us get up. Arrange your clothing.''

We had scarcely risen and were walking slowly away when we saw Donna Cecilia and the advocate emerging from the adjoining walk. Neither hurrying nor avoiding them, as if it were perfectly natural that we should meet, I ask Donna Cecilia if her daughter is afraid of snakes.

''For all her intelligence, she is afraid of lightning to the point of fainting and she runs away screaming when she sees a snake. There are snakes here; but she is mistaken to be afraid, they are not poisonous.''

My hair stood on end, for her words assured me that I had witnessed a miracle of love. Her children came up, and we separated again.

"But tell me," I said, "you astonishing creature, what would you have done if your husband and your mother had caught us in the act?"

"Nothing. Do you not know that in such divine moments one is only in love? Can you suppose that you did not possess me entirely?"

She was not composing an ode when she spoke these words.

"Do you believe," I asked her, "that no one suspects us?"

"My husband either thinks that we are not in love or pays no attention to certain little freedoms in which young people commonly indulge. My mother is intelligent, and perhaps suspects everything; but she knows that it is none of her business. Angelica, my dear sister, knows everything, for she will never be able to forget the ruined bed, but she is discreet, and besides, she has taken it into her head to feel sorry for me. She has no conception of what my passion is. Without you, my dear, I might have died without ever knowing love, for my husband has won from me only the acquiescence which it is a wife's duty to give."

"Ah! your husband enjoys a divine privilege, of which I cannot help being jealous. He clasps all your beauties in his arms whenever he pleases. No veil keeps his senses, his eyes, his soul from enjoying them."

"Where are you, beloved snake? Hasten to watch over me, and I will satisfy my lover this instant."

In this fashion we spent the whole morning, declaring that we loved each other and proving it wherever we thought we were safe from being caught.

> Nè per mai sempre pendergli dal collo
> il suo desir sentia di lui satollo.[51]
> her desire for him was never satisfied.")

At my choice and delicious dinner, I was chiefly attentive to Donna Cecilia. Since my Spanish tobacco[52] was excellent, my pretty snuffbox made the round of the table several times. Once when it had reached the hands of Donna Lucrezia, who was seated at my left, her husband told her that she might give me her ring and keep it. "Done!" I said, thinking that the ring was worth less; but it was worth more. Donna Lucrezia would not hear a word. She put my snuffbox in her pocket and gave me her ring, which I put in mine since it was too small for my finger.

But suddenly we were all reduced to silence. Angelica's fiancé takes from his pocket a sonnet, fruit of his genius, which he had composed to my honor and glory, and insists on reading it. Everyone applauds, and I have to thank him, take the sonnet, and promise him another in due course. He thought that I would immediately have called for writing materials and answered him on the spot, and that there we should remain, devoting to his accursed Apollo the three hours which were destined for love. After coffee, I having settled with the innkeeper, we all scattered about the gardens of another villa, the Aldobrandini[53] if I remember rightly.

"Explain to me," I asked my Lucrezia, "out of the metaphysics of your love, how it can be that at this moment I feel as if I were about to plunge into the delights of love with you for the first time. Let us hasten to look for a spot where we shall find an altar to Venus, and let us sacrifice until we perish, even if we see no snakes; and if the Pope comes with all the Sacred College, let us not stir. His Holiness will give us his blessing."

After wandering about a little, we entered a shady walk; it was quite long, and halfway down it there was an arbor filled with turf seats, each of a different shape. We saw one which struck us. It was in the form of a bed but in addition to the regular bolster there was another, lying parallel to it about two feet away, but only a quarter as high. We looked at it and laughed. It was an eloquent bed. We instantly made ready to try its virtues. From where it stood we had a prospect of a great, solitary plain, across which even a rabbit could not have reached us unobserved. Behind the bed there was no way of approaching the walk and we saw its two ends at equal distances to right and left. No one who entered the walk could reach us in less than a quarter of an hour except by running. Here in the garden at Dux, I have seen an arbor of the same sort; but the German gardener never thought of the bed. In this happy spot we had no need to tell each other our thoughts.

Standing face to face, intensely serious, looking only into each other's eyes, we unlaced, we unbuttoned, our hearts throbbed, our hands hurried to calm their impatience. Neither of us having been slower than the other, our arms opened to clasp the object of which they were to take possession. After our first combat the beautiful Lucrezia laughed and confessed that since genius had the right to shine everywhere, it was nowhere out of place. We both applauded the happy effect of the smaller bolster. Our adventures varied after that, but though they were all good, they were all rejected to give place to others. At the end of two hours, enchanted with each other and looking most lovingly into each other's eyes, we spoke in unison, saying these very words: "Love, I thank thee."

After turning her grateful eyes for a moment on the infallible sign of my defeat, Donna Lucrezia laughed and gave me a most languorous kiss; but when she saw that she was restoring me to life, "Enough!" she cried, "a truce to triumphing! Let us get dressed." At that we hurried, but instead of keeping our eyes on ourselves, we fixed them on that which impenetrable veils were to hide from our insatiable desire. When we were fully dressed we agreed to make a libation to love, to thank him for having guarded us from being disturbed while we celebrated his orgies. A long, narrow seat without a back, which could be straddled like a riding mule, was our simultaneous choice. The combat began and was proceeding vigorously; but foreseeing that the end was too distant and the libation doubtful, we put it off until we should be face to face in the darkness of night to the music of four trotting horses.

As we slowly made our way toward the carriages, our talk was the confidences of satisfied lovers. She told me that her future brother-in-law was rich and that he had a house at Tivoli, where he would invite us to spend the night. She thought of nothing but imploring love to reveal how we could spend it together. She finally told me sadly that the ecclesiastical suit with which her husband was occupied was going so well that she feared he would obtain his judgment too soon.

We passed the two hours which we spent face to face in the carriage playing a comedy which we could not finish. Arriving at their house, we had to ring down the curtain. I should have finished it if I had not taken a fancy to divide it into two acts. I went to bed rather tired; but a good sleep restored me completely. The next day I went to take my lesson at the usual hour.

CHAPTER X

IT WAS Barbaruccia who gave it to me, for her father was seriously ill. As I was leaving she slipped a letter into my pocket, then ran away so that I should not have time to refuse it. She was right, for it was not a letter to be refused. It was addressed to me and dictated by feelings of the liveliest gratitude. She asked me to tell her lover that her father was speaking to her, and that she hoped as soon as he recovered he would engage a different maid. She ended by assuring me on her oath that she would never implicate me.

Her father being kept in bed by his illness for twelve consecutive days, it was she who gave me my lessons. She aroused my interest in a way which was entirely new to me where a pretty girl was concerned. It was a feeling of pure pity, and I was flattered when I perceived that she counted upon it. Her eyes never lingered on mine, her hand never touched mine, her toilet never showed the least sign of being studied to make it pleasing to me. She was pretty, and I knew that she was susceptible; but these considerations detracted nothing from what I felt that I owed to honor and good faith, and I was very glad that she did not believe me capable of taking advantage of my knowledge that she had erred.

As soon as her father recovered he dismissed his maid and engaged another. She begged me to give her lover the news and to tell him that she hoped to win her over to their side, so that at least they could have the pleasure of writing to each other. When I promised to tell him, she took my hand to kiss it. I withdrew it and made to give her a kiss, whereupon she blushed and turned away. This pleased me. I conveyed the news of the new maid to her lover, he contrived to speak to her, and won her over to his cause, and I took no more part in the intrigue, for I clearly saw the unfortunate consequences it could have. But the harm was already done.

I seldom called on Don Gaspare, for my French studies prevented me; but I called on Father Georgi every evening; though my standing there was only that of a protégé of the monk's, I gained some reputation by it. I never spoke myself, but I found much to interest me. There was criticism without backbiting, there was talk of politics and literature; I was picking up knowledge. On leaving the wise monk's monastery, I went to the great reception at the palace of my master the Cardinal, which it was my duty to attend.

At almost every one of these, when the Marchesa G. saw me at the table where she was playing cards, she would speak a word or two to me in French, which I always answered in Italian because I felt that I ought not to make her laugh in public. A strange feeling, which I leave to the perspicacity of my reader. I thought her charming, and I avoided her, not because I was afraid I should fall in love with her, for, in love as I was with Donna Lucrezia, that seemed to me impossible, but for fear she might fall in love with me or at least become interested in me. Was this a vice or a virtue? Solvat Apollo ("Let Apollo find the solution"). As once before, she sent the Abate Gama to fetch me; this time she was standing and in the company of my master and Cardinal S. C. I go to her, and she surprises me with a question in Italian which I should never have expected.

"Vi ha piaciuto molto," she asks, "Frascati?" ("Did you like Frascati very much?")

"Very much, Signora. I never in my life saw anything so beautiful."

"Ma la compagnia con la quale eravate, era ancora più bella, ed assai galante era il vostro vis à vis" ("But the company you were with was even more beautiful, and your vis-à-vis was very smart").

My only answer was a bow. A moment later Cardinal Acquaviva said to me, kindly:

"Are you surprised that it is known?"

"No, Monsignore, but I am surprised that it is talked about. I did not think that Rome was so small."

"And the longer you remain in Rome," said S. C., "the smaller you will find it. Have you not gone yet to kiss His Holiness's foot?"

"Not yet, Monsignore."

"You must go," said Cardinal Acquaviva.

I answered with a bow.

As we left, the Abate Gama told me that I must go without fail the next morning.

"I suppose," he said, "you sometimes put in an appearance at the Marchesa G.'s."

"You may stop supposing so, for I have never been there."

"You amaze me. She calls you over, she talks to you!"

"I will go there with you."

"I never go."

"But she talks to you, too."

"Yes, but . . . You do not know Rome. Go there by yourself. You must go."

"You think she will receive me?"

"Are you joking? You need not have yourself announced. Simply go in to see her when the double doors of the room she is in are open. You will find it full of people paying her court."

"Will she see me?"

"You may be sure of that."

The next day I go to Monte Cavallo,[1] and I go straight into the room where the Pope was as soon as I am told that I may enter it and that he is alone. I kiss the "holy cross" on the "most holy slipper," he asks me who I am, I tell him, and he answers that he has heard of me, and he congratulates me on my good fortune in being in the service of so eminent a Cardinal. He asks me how I had managed to enter his service, and I tell him the whole story, altering nothing, beginning with my arrival at Martorano. After laughing heartily at my account of the Bishop, he said that instead of struggling to speak to him in Tuscan I should speak to him in Venetian just as he was speaking to me in Bolognese.[2] I talked away at such a rate that he said he would be glad to have me come to see him as often as I could. I asked him for permission to read all the forbidden books, and he granted it by giving me his blessing and saying that he would have a written permission sent me gratis; but he forgot to do it.

Benedict XIV was learned, a man who liked his joke, and extremely agreeable. The second time I talked with him was at the Villa Medici. He called me over and, continuing his walk, talked in the lightest vein. He was accompanied by Cardinal Annibale Albani[3] and the Venetian Ambassador. A man of modest appearance approaches, the Pontiff asks him what he wants, the man speaks to him in a low voice, the Pope hears him out and says, "You are right, commend yourself to God." He gives him his blessing, the man goes dejectedly away, and the Pope continues his walk.

"That man," I said to the Holy Father, "was not satisfied with the answer Your Holiness gave him."

"Why?"

"Because presumably he had already commended himself to God before he spoke to you and, hearing you send him back to God again, he feels he is being sent, as the saying goes, from Herod to Pilate."[4]

The Pope burst out laughing, as did his two companions, but I kept a straight face.

"I cannot," said the Pope, "accomplish anything without the help of God."

"Very true. But this man also knows that Your Holiness is his prime minister; so it is easy to imagine how frustrated he feels now that he has been sent back to Your Holiness's master. His only resource is to go and give money to all the beggars in Rome. For a baiocco apiece they will all pray to God for him. They boast of their influence. I believe only in Your Holiness's, so I beg you to deliver me from this irritating inflammation of the eyes by dispensing me from eating fish."

"Eat meat."

"Most Holy Father, your blessing."

He gives it to me, adding that he did not dispense me from fasting.

That evening at the Cardinal's reception, I found that the news of the dialogue between the Pope and myself was out. Everyone was now eager to speak to me. What I found flattering was Cardinal Acquaviva's pleasure, which he vainly tried to conceal.

I did not fail to follow the Abate Gama's advice. I went to the Marchesa G.'s at the hour when anyone could go there. I saw her, I saw her Cardinal and a great many other abati; but I thought I must be invisible, for since the Signora did not honor me with a look, no one said a word to me. After half an hour I left. It was not until five or six days later that she told me, with the most gracious courtesy, that she had seen me in her reception room.

"I did not know that the Signora had done me the honor to notice me."

"Oh, I see everyone. I am told you have wit."

"If those who have told you so, Signora, know what wit is themselves, you have given me very good news."

"Oh, they know what it is."

"If they had never spoken to me, they would never have found it out."

"Very true. Let me see you here."

A circle had formed around us. Cardinal S. C. said that when the Signora spoke to me in French, I ought to answer her in the same language, whether well or badly. The politic Gama said to me privately that my style was too cutting and that in the end I would be disliked.

Having learned enough French, I took no more lessons. Practice would suffice to familiarize me with the language. I did not call on Donna Lucrezia except occasionally in the morning; and I went to Father Georgi's every evening. He had heard of my excursion to Frascati, and had found no fault with it.

Two days after the Marchesa had more or less commanded me to pay my court to her, I entered her reception room. Seeing me at once, she gave me a smile, which I thought it proper to answer with a low bow; but that was the end of it. A quarter of an hour later she sat down to cards and I went off to dinner. She was pretty, and a power in Rome; but I could not bring myself to crawl. Roman manners exasperated me.

Toward the end of November Donna Angelica's fiancé called on me with the advocate to invite me to spend a day and a night at his house in Tivoli with the same company I had entertained at Frascati; I accepted with pleasure, for since St. Ursula's Day I had not been alone with Donna Lucrezia for a single moment. I promised him I would be at Donna Cecilia's in my carriage at dawn of the appointed day. We had to start very early, since Tivoli is sixteen miles from Rome and since the large number of beautiful things to be seen there took a great deal of time. As I was to be away for a night, I asked the Cardinal himself to give me permission; when he heard with whom I was going, he answered that I was quite right to take the opportunity of seeing the wonders of the famous place in good company.

At the appointed hour I was at Donna Cecilia's door with the same four-horse vis-à-vis, and as usual she fell to my lot. Notwithstanding her irreproachable morals, the charming widow was well content that I should love her daughter. The whole family was in a phaeton for six, which Don Francesco had hired. At half past seven we stopped at a small house where Don Francesco had arranged to have an elegant breakfast ready for us which, as it was to serve us for dinner too, was ample as well. At Tivoli we should have time only for supper. So after breakfasting heartily, we returned to our carriages and reached his house by ten o'clock. I was wearing the ring Donna Lucrezia had given me, having had it remade to fit my finger. I had also had an obverse setting fitted to it, which displayed only a field of enamel with a caduceus[5] entwined by a single snake. On either side of the caduceus were the Greek letters Alpha and Omega. This ring was the sole subject of conversation at breakfast as soon as it was seen that the reverse contained the same stones that had been set in Donna Lucrezia's ring. The advocate and Don Francesco cudgeled their brains to decipher the hieroglyph, much to the amusement of Donna Lucrezia, who knew the secret.

After half an hour spent in viewing Don Francesco's house, which was really charming, we all set off together to spend six hours seeing the antiquities of Tivoli. While Donna Lucrezia was saying something to Don Francesco, I whispered to Donna Angelica that when she became the mistress of the house I would come and spend a few days with her during the seasons of good weather.

"As soon, Signore, as I become the mistress here, the first person to whom I shall order my door closed will be you."

"Thank you for warning me, Signorina."

The joke is that I took this reprimand for nothing less than a very flattering and very clear declaration of love. I was almost paralyzed. Donna Lucrezia gave me a shake and asked me what her sister had said to me. When I told her she said very seriously that after she left I must take her sister in hand and force her to admit that she was wrong. "She pities me," she added; "it is for you to avenge me."

When I praised a small room which gave on to the orangery, Don Francesco said that I should sleep in it. Donna Lucrezia pretended not to have heard him. Since the whole party was to view the beauties of Tivoli together, we could not hope to be alone during the day. We spent six hours looking and admiring, but I saw very little. If my reader is interested in knowing something about Tivoli without going there, he has only to read Campagnani.[6] I did not get to know Tivoli well until twenty-eight years later.

Toward evening we returned to the house, exhausted and dying of hunger. An hour's rest before supper, two hours at the table, the exquisite dishes, and the excellent wine of Tivoli did so much to restore us that we needed nothing more than our beds, whether for sleep or for the rites of love.

Since no one wanted to sleep alone, Lucrezia said she would share a bed with Angelica in the room which gave on the orangery, that her husband should sleep with the Abate, and her young sister with her mother. Everyone thought the arrangement excellent. Don Francesco took a candle, conducted me to the small room I had praised, showed me how to lock the door, and bade me good night. This small room was next to the room in which the two sisters were to sleep. Angelica had no idea that I was her neighbor.

I put my eye to the keyhole and five minutes later saw them come in, accompanied by Don Francesco, who lit a night lamp for them and then left. After locking the door they sat down on the couch, where I watched them undress. Lucrezia, knowing that I could hear her, told her sister to take the side of the bed toward the window. Upon which the virgin, unaware that she was observed, takes off even her shift and in this striking array crosses to the other side of the room. Lucrezia extinguishes the night light, blows out the candles, and lies down too.

Happy moments for which I hope no longer, but whose precious memory death alone can take from me! I believe I never undressed more quickly. I opened the door and fell into the arms of my Lucrezia, who said to her sister: "It is my angel, hold your tongue and go to sleep."

She could say no more, for our clinging mouths were no longer either organs of speech or channels for respiration. Become a single being at the same instant, we did not have the strength to restrain our first desire for more than a minute; it ran its course without the sound of a single kiss or the least movement on our part. The raging fire which urged us on was scorching us; it would have burned us had we tried to restrain it.

After a short respite, ourselves the ingenious ministers of our love and jealous of the fire which it was to rekindle in our veins, we went silently, seriously, and calmly to work drying from our fields the too copious flood which had followed the first eruption. We performed this sacred service for each other with fine linen, devoutly and in the most religious silence. After this expiation we paid homage with our kisses to all the places which we had lately flooded.

It was now my part to invite my fair enemy to begin a battle whose tactics could be known only to love, a combat which, enchanting all our senses, could have no fault but that of ending too soon; but I excelled in the art of prolonging it. When it was over, Morpheus took possession of our senses and held us in a sweet death until the moment when the light of dawn showed us in each other's scarcely opened eyes an inexhaustible spring of new desires. We surrendered to them, but it was to destroy them. A delightful destruction, which we could only accomplish by satisfying them!

"Beware of your sister," I said; "she might turn and see us."

"No, my sister is charming; she loves me and she pities me. Is not that so, dear Angelica? Turn and embrace your sister, who is possessed by Venus. Turn and see what awaits you when love makes you his slave."

Angelica, a girl of seventeen, who must have passed a hellish night, asks nothing better than an excuse to turn and show her sister that she had forgiven her. Kissing her a hundred times, she confessed that she had not slept at all.

"Forgive," Lucrezia said, "him who loves me and whom I adore; come, look at him, and look at me. We are as we were seven hours ago. The power of Love!"

"Hated by Angelica," I said, "I dare not—"

"No," said Angelica, "I do not hate you."

Telling me to kiss her, Lucrezia gets on the other side of me and enjoys the spectacle of her sister in my arms, languishing and showing no signs of resistance. But feeling, even more than love, prevents me from defrauding Lucrezia of the token of gratitude which I owed her. I clasp her frenziedly, at the same time reveling in the ecstasy I saw on the face of Angelica, who was witnessing so splendid a combat for the first time. The swooning Lucrezia implores me to stop, but finding me inexorable throws me on her sister who, far from repulsing me, clasps me to her bosom so strongly that she achieves happiness almost without my participation. It was thus that when the Gods dwelt on earth the voluptuous Anaideia,[7] in love with the soft, delightful breath of the West Wind, one day opened her arms to it and became fruitful. It was the divine Zephyrus.[8] The fire of nature made Angelica insensible to pain; she felt only the joy of satisfying her ardent desire.

Astonished, blissfully content, and kissing us in turn, Lucrezia was as delighted to see her swoon as she was charmed to see that I continued. She wiped away the drops of sweat which dripped from my brow. Angelica finally perished for the third time, so lovingly that she ravished my soul.

However, the sun's rays coming in through the cracks in our window shutters, I left them. After locking my door, I got into bed; but only a few minutes later I heard the voice of the advocate reproaching his wife and his sister-in-law for their sloth. Then, knocking on my door and finding me in my nightshirt, he threatened to bring my neighbors in. But he left, saying he would send me a hairdresser. I lock my door again, I give my face a thorough washing in cold water, which restores me to my usual looks. An hour later I enter the drawing room, showing not a sign of anything. I am delighted to see that my fair conquests look fresh and rosy. Donna Lucrezia was perfectly relaxed, Angelica gayer than usual and radiant; but as she keeps turning uneasily now to the left, now to the right, I can see her only in profile. Seeing her smile at my vain attempts to catch her eye, which she was determined not to let me do, I tell Donna Cecilia that her daughter should not powder her face. Trapped by my calumny, she makes me rub her face with a handkerchief, and looks at me. I take it back and beg her pardon, and Don Francesco is delighted that the whiteness of his future wife's complexion has led to such a doubt.

After drinking chocolate, we go to view his fine garden, and finding myself alone with Donna Lucrezia I reproach her for her perfidy. Looking at me like a goddess, she reproaches me for my ingratitude.

"I have enlightened my sister," she says. "Instead of pitying me, she must now approve of me, she must love you; and as I am soon to go away, I leave her to you."

"But how can I love her?"

"Is she not charming?"

"She is indeed. But charmed by you I am proof against all other charms. And in any case at this time she should be entirely taken up with Don Francesco, and it is not for me to trouble the harmony of a married couple. I can tell you, too, that your sister has a very different way of looking at things from yours. Last night both she and I were victims of our senses. This is so true that I do not feel that I have been unfaithful to you. But Angelica—do you hear?—Angelica must already be regretting that she allowed nature to lead her astray."

"That may be all very true; but what distresses me is that we shall leave at the end of the month. My husband is certain he will obtain his judgment this very week. So our pleasures are over."

The news made me sad. At table I paid no attention to anyone but the generous Don Francesco, whom I promised an epithalamium for his wedding, which was to take place in January.

We returned to Rome, and during the three hours we were alone together Donna Lucrezia could never convince me that I was less in love with her than I had been before she surrendered all her treasures to me. We stopped at the small house where we had breakfasted, to eat some ices which Don Francesco had ordered made for us. We reached Rome at eight o'clock. Feeling badly in need of rest, I at once went to the Palazzo di Spagna.

Three or four days later the advocate called and took his leave of me with the utmost civility. He was returning to Naples after winning his suit. As he was to leave on the next day but one, I spent the last two evenings of his stay in Rome at Donna Cecilia's. Having learned the hour at which he was to leave, I set out two hours earlier and stopped where I supposed he would spend the night, hoping thus to have the pleasure of supping with him for the last time; but something having come up which obliged him to delay his departure for four hours, I had only the pleasure of dining with him.

After the departure of this extraordinary woman, I was left in the state of lassitude to which a young man succumbs when his heart is empty. I spent all my days in my room, making summaries of the Cardinal's French correspondence, and he was good enough to tell me that he found my extracts well chosen but that I really must not work so hard. The Marchesa G. was present and heard this most flattering compliment. After the second time I had paid my court to her she had seen no more of me. Her manner to me was cool. Hearing the Cardinal reproach me with working too much, she told him that I must be working to cure my grief at Donna Lucrezia's departure.

"You are right, Signora, I felt it very keenly. She was kind; and she forgave me if I could not visit her often. In any case, my friendship for her was innocent."

"I have no doubt of it, despite the fact that in your ode the poet seems to be in love."

"A poet cannot compose," said my adorable Cardinal, "without pretending to be in love."

"But if he is in love," the Marchesa replied, "he need not pretend to be."

So saying, she took my ode from her pocket and handed it to S. C., remarking that it did me honor, that it was a little masterpiece according to all the wits of Rome, and that Donna Lucrezia knew it by heart. The Cardinal smiled and handed it back to her, saying that he did not care for Italian poetry but that since she admired it she might well give herself the pleasure of translating it into French. She answered that she only wrote prose in French, and that any translation of a piece of poetry into prose could not but be bad.

"My literary endeavors," she added, with a look at me, "go no further than an occasional modest poem in Italian."

"I should consider myself fortunate, Signora, if I could obtain the favor of seeing one of them."

"Here," said her Cardinal, "is a sonnet by the Signora."

I respectfully take it and prepare to read it, when the Signora tells me to put it in my pocket and give it back to His Eminence the next day, though, she added, her sonnet did not amount to much.

"If you go out in the morning," said the Cardinal, "you can dine with me and give it back to me then."

"In that case," Cardinal Acquaviva replied instantly, "he will go out on purpose."

After a low bow which excused me from speaking, I gradually move away and go to my room, eager to read the sonnet. But before reading it, I give a moment's thought to myself, to my present situation, and to the very great progress it seemed to me I had made that evening at the reception. The Marchesa G. telling me in the clearest way possible that she has taken an interest in me!

The Marchesa G., under cover of her grandeur, having no fear of compromising herself by making advances to me in public! Who would have dared to see anything wrong in it? A young abate like myself, of no importance whatever, could only aspire to her protection, and her nature was such that she granted it chiefly to those who, though considering themselves more than worthy of it, showed no sign of laying claim to it. My modesty in this respect was perfectly apparent to everyone. Why, the Marchesa would have insulted me if she had thought me capable of imagining that she was drawn to me! Impossible! No one could be so stupidly conceited! This was so true that her Cardinal himself invites me to dinner. Would he have done so if he could possibly have thought his Marchesa found me attractive? On the contrary, he did not ask me to come and dine with him until he had gathered from what the Marchesa herself said that I was the very person they needed for an hour of talk now and again at no risk, absolutely none.

Nonsense!

Why should I put on a mask before my dear reader? If he thinks me conceited, I forgive him. I felt certain that I had attracted the Marchesa; I congratulated myself on her having taken that terrifying first step without which I should never have dared even to cast an eye on her, let alone attack her in force. In short, I did not see her as a woman I could love, and a woman well worthy of succeeding Donna Lucrezia, until that evening. She was beautiful, young, intelligent, witty, highly cultivated, well read, and a power in Rome. I decided I would pretend not to be aware of her liking for me, and to begin the next day giving her reason to believe that I loved her without daring to hope. I was certain that I should triumph. It was a course which Father Georgi himself could not but pretend to approve. I had observed with the greatest satisfaction that Cardinal Acquaviva had been pleased that Cardinal S. C. had invited me, though he himself had never so far honored me.

I take up her sonnet and read it, I find it good, flowing, facile, faultless in diction. In it the Marchesa praised the King of Prussia, who had recently captured Silesia by what amounted to a surprise attack.[9] As I copied it out, I took a fancy to compose an answer to it in which Silesia would complain because Love, the speaker in the Marchesa's sonnet, dared to applaud her royal conqueror when he was himself a declared enemy of Love.

A man who is in the habit of composing verses cannot possibly deny himself the pleasure once a happy idea has come to his mind. I thought my idea splendid, and that is what counts. I replied to the Marchesa's sonnet, using the same rhymes, and went to bed. In the morning I polished it, made a fair copy, and put it in my pocket.

The Abate Gama came to breakfast with me and congratulated me on the honor S. C. was doing me, but he warned me to be on my guard because His Eminence was extremely jealous. I thanked him and assured him that I had nothing to fear in that respect, since I did not feel the slightest inclination for the Marchesa.

Cardinal S. C. received me kindly but with a dignity calculated to make me conscious of the favor he was conferring on me.

"Did you," he at once asked me, "find the Marchesa's sonnet well turned?"

"Charming, Monsignore. Here it is."

"She is very talented. I am going to show you ten stanzas she composed, but in the strictest confidence."

"Your Eminence may be sure that I will not betray it."

He opens a secretary and hands me ten stanzas to read, of which he was himself the subject. I find them lacking in inspiration, but with some images well expressed in a passionate style. They were clearly a declaration of love. By showing them to me, the Cardinal had committed a grave indiscretion. I ask him if he has answered; he says he has not, smiles, and asks me if I will lend him my pen, but still in the strictest confidence.

"I will stake my head on that, Monsignore; but the Signora will notice the difference in style."

"She has nothing of mine; but in any case I am sure she does not think me a good poet. So your stanzas must be such that she will not find them above my ability."

"I will write them, Monsignore, and Your Eminence shall pronounce on them. If you find that you cannot do as well, Your Eminence will not deliver them."

"Excellent. Will you write them now?"

"Now? It is not prose, Monsignore."

"Try to bring them to me tomorrow."

We dined alone together at two o'clock, and he liked my appetite. He congratulated me on eating as much as he did. I answered that he flattered me too greatly and that he had outdone me. I was laughing to myself over his eccentric character and considering the advantage I could reap from it, when in comes the Marchesa, without being announced, of course. It was the first time that I had found her a perfect beauty. At her sudden appearance the Cardinal laughs because she goes and sits down beside him so quickly that she does not give him time to rise. For my part, I am left standing, as is to be expected. She talks of various things in a lively way; coffee is brought, and at last she tells me to sit down, but as if she were throwing a coin to a beggar.

"By the way, Abate, have you read my sonnet?"

"And brought it back to His Eminence. I admired it, Signora. I found it so well turned that I am sure you must have spent much time over it."

"Time?" says the Cardinal. "You do not know her."

"Without toil, Monsignore, one accomplishes nothing of value. That is why I have not dared to show Your Eminence an answer to it which I composed in half an hour."

"Show it, show it," says the Marchesa. "I want to read it."

"Silesia's Answer to Love." The title makes her blush. She becomes perfectly serious. The Cardinal remarks that love has nothing to do with it.

"Wait," says the Signora. "We must respect the ideas of poets."

She reads it aloud, and very well; she reads it over again. She finds Silesia's reproaches to Love well justified, and she explains to the Cardinal why Silesia cannot but take it ill that her conqueror was the King of Prussia. "Ah yes, of course," says the Cardinal. "I see . . . Silesia is a woman[10] . . . The King of Prussia is . . . Oh really! it is a marvelous idea."

We had to wait ten minutes for His Excellency's laughter to subside.

"I want to copy the sonnet," he said. "I must have it."

"The Abate," said the Marchesa, smiling, "will save you the trouble."

"I will dictate it to him. What is this? Wonderful! he has written it with the same rhymes as yours. Did you notice that, Marchesa?"

A glance which she gave me put the finishing touch to my falling in love with her. I saw that she wanted me to understand the Cardinal as she understood him and to be in league with her. I felt more than ready. After copying the sonnet I left them. The Cardinal said that he expected me for dinner the next day.

I went to my room and locked myself in, for the ten stanzas I had to compose were of the most peculiar nature. I had to straddle the ditch with consummate skill, for at the same time that the Marchesa would have to pretend she thought the Cardinal the author of the stanzas, she must not only know that they were mine but also know that I knew she knew it. I had to spare her pride, and at the same time make certain that she would find an ardor in my verses which could come only from my love and not from poetic imagination. I also had to keep in mind doing my best from the Cardinal's point of view, for the more well turned he found the stanzas the more he would think them worthy of his owning their authorship. The great point was to be clear, and that is precisely the most difficult thing in poetry. Obscurity, which is easier, would have passed as sublimity with the man whose good graces I must endeavor to gain. If the Marchesa in her ten stanzas described the Cardinal's excellent qualities, both physical and moral, I had to give him something of the same sort. So I composed them to all these requirements. I described her visible beauties and took care not to describe her hidden ones, and I concluded my last stanza with these two beautiful lines from Ariosto:

Le angeliche bellezze nate in cielo

("The angelic beauties born in heaven cannot be hidden under any veil.")

Well pleased with my little effort, I went to the Cardinal's and gave it to him, saying that I doubted if he would want to acknowledge himself the author of a production which only too clearly revealed the hand of an apprentice. After reading them aloud twice, and very badly, he said that, true enough, they did not amount to much but they were what he needed; and he thanked me for having put in the two lines from Ariosto, which would show the Marchesa that he had needed their help. To console me, he said that when he copied them out he would change some verses so that they would not scan, which would make her certain that he had written them. We dined earlier, and I left to give him time to copy out the stanzas before the lady arrived.

It was on the next day, in the evening, that meeting her at the door of the Palazzo just as she was stepping out of her carriage, I gave her my arm. She told me point-blank that she would be my enemy if Rome came to know her stanzas and mine.

"I do not know what you are talking about, Signora."

"I expected you would not, but mark my words."

As soon as she reached the drawing room, I fled to my own room in despair, for I believed that she was really angry. "My stanzas," I thought to myself, "are too highly colored; they are compromising to her pride, and she does not like my knowing too much about her intrigue. She tells me she is afraid I will be indiscreet; but I am sure she is only pretending; it is an excuse for dismissing me from her favor. What would she have done if I had stripped her naked in my verses?" I was sorry that I had not. I undress, I go to bed, and a half hour later the Abate Gama knocks at my door; I pull the latchstring. He comes in saying that Monsignore wished me to come down. "The Marchesa G. and Cardinal S. C. are asking for you."

"I am sorry. Go and tell them the truth. Tell them too, if you like, that I am ill."

As he did not return, I saw that he had done his errand well.

The next morning I received a note from Cardinal S. C. informing me that he expected me for dinner, that he had been bled, that he needed to speak to me, and that I was to come early, even if I were ill—it was urgent. I could not guess the reason for his summons, but I did not anticipate anything unpleasant.

No sooner am I dressed than I hurry downstairs and go to hear mass, at which I was sure Monsignore would see me. After the mass, he took me aside and asked if I was really ill.

"No, Monsignore. I only wanted to sleep."

"You were wrong, for you are liked. Cardinal S. C. is being bled."

"I know. He mentions it in this note, in which he commands me to wait on him if Your Eminence approves."

"Very well. But it is odd. I did not know that he needed a third person."

"Will there be a third person?"

"I have no idea, and I am not curious."

Everyone thought that the Cardinal had been speaking to me of state affairs. I went to Cardinal S. C.'s, and found him in bed.

"Since I have been put on a diet," he said, "I will dine alone; but you will lose nothing by it, for the cook has not been informed. What I have to tell you is that I fear your stanzas are too well turned, for the Marchesa is mad about them. If you had read them to me as she read them, I would not have claimed them."

"Yet she believes they are by Your Eminence."

"She has no doubt of it; but what am I to do if she takes it into her head to ask me for more verses?"

"I am at your disposal, Monsignore, day and night, and you may be sure that I will die rather than betray your secret."

"I beg you to accept this small present. It is some Negrillo from Havana[12] which Cardinal Acquaviva gave me."

The tobacco was good, but what went with it was better. The snuffbox was of enameled gold. I accepted it with respect and a feeling of gratitude. If His Eminence did not know how to compose verses, at least he knew how to give, and in a nobleman that knowledge is a far greater grace than the other.

At noon I was surprised to see the Marchesa appear in the most elegant dishabille.

"If I had known," she said to him, "that you were in good company, I would not have come."

"I am sure," he answered, "that you will not find our Abate unwelcome company."

"No, for I believe he is honorable."

I stood there without a word, but at the same time determined to leave with my fine snuffbox at the first cutting remark she should take it into her head to make to me. He asked her if she would eat dinner, at the same time telling her that he had been put on a diet.

"Yes," she said, "but I shall not enjoy it, for I hate eating alone."

"If you will grant him the honor, the Abate will keep you company."

She answered only by giving me a gracious look. She was the first woman of high station with whom I had had anything to do. I could not become accustomed to her accursed air of patronage, which can have nothing in common with love; but I saw that in the presence of her Cardinal she could not behave otherwise. I knew that she must know that a haughty air is unnerving.

The table was laid near His Eminence's bed. Eating next to nothing herself, the Marchesa encouraged me by praising my excellent appetite.

"I told you," the Cardinal said, "that the Abate is my equal."

"I think," she answered, "that he is not far from it. But you are more discriminating."

At that, I ask her to tell me what reason she had for thinking me a glutton.

"I like only the choice, exquisite morsel in everything, Signora."

"Explain your 'in everything,'" says the Cardinal.

Venturing a laugh, I began improvising in verse, enumerating every kind of thing which deserved to be called a "choice morsel." The Marchesa applauded, saying that she admired my courage.

"My courage, Signora, is your doing, for I am as timid as a rabbit when I am not given it. It is you who are the author of my impromptu, 'cum dico quae placent dictat auditor'" ("when I say anything pleasing, it is my reader who has dictated it").[13]

"I admire you. For my part, even if Apollo himself should encourage me, I could not produce four lines except in writing."

"Have the courage, Signora, to trust in your Genius, and you will utter things divine."

"I agree," said the Cardinal. "Please allow me to show the Abate your ten stanzas."

"They are faulty; but I am willing, provided it remains between us."

The Cardinal then handed me the Marchesa's ten stanzas, and I read them aloud, giving them all the feeling which reading aloud can give a good piece of poetry.

"How well you read that!" said the Marchesa. "I can no longer believe that I wrote them. I thank you. But now please be so good as to give His Eminence's ten stanzas in answer to mine the same kind of reading. They are far better."

"Never believe it," he said to me. "However, here they are. But try not to make them worse than they are by your reading."

There was no need for the Cardinal to ask this of me, for the verses were mine, I was incapable of reading badly, and the more so since Bacchus had increased the fire which having the Marchesa before me had kindled in my soul.

I read them in a way which delighted the Cardinal and which made the Marchesa blush at the passage wherein I described certain beauties which poetry is permitted to praise but which I could not have seen. She snatched them from me with every sign of resentment, saying that I had altered some of the verses. It was true, but I pretended not to admit it. I was aflame, and so was she. The Cardinal had fallen asleep; she rose, made her way to the belvedere[14] and sat down, and I followed her. She had scarcely seated herself on the balustrade before I came and stood in front of her. One of her knees was touching the fob pocket in which I had my watch. Taking one of her hands with respectful tenderness, I told her that she had set me on fire.

"I adore you, Signora, and if you do not permit me to hope, I am determined never to see you again. Pronounce sentence on me."

"I believe you are a libertine and inconstant."

"I am neither."

With these words, I clasped her in my arms and saluted her lips with an amorous kiss, which she received without stooping to make me offer her the least violence. My famished hands now tried to open the way to complete possession; but she quickly changed her position and begged me so sweetly to respect her that I felt it my duty not only to calm my transports but also to ask her pardon. She then spoke to me of Donna Lucrezia, and she must have been delighted to find me a paragon of discretion. After that she talked of the Cardinal, trying to make me believe that she was only his good friend. We then recited beautiful passages of poetry to each other, she sitting so that I could see half of a well-turned leg, I still standing and pretending not to see it, and determined that I would wait for another day to obtain a greater favor than I had been granted on this.

We were interrupted by the Cardinal, who came out in his nightcap, innocently asking if we had not lost patience waiting for him.

I did not leave them until nightfall, well satisfied with my good fortune and determined to hold my budding love in check until a propitious occasion should assure me that it would be crowned with victory. From that day on, the charming Marchesa never ceased to give me tokens of her particular esteem without the slightest attempt at concealment. I thought I could count on the coming Carnival, feeling certain that the more I spared her delicacy, the more she would herself try to present me with an opening on an occasion when she could give my love, my loyalty, and my constancy their full reward. But my fortune was to take a different turn just when I least expected it and when Cardinal Acquaviva and the Pope himself were planning to give it a firm foundation. That illustrious pontiff had most warmly congratulated me on the beautiful snuffbox I had received from Cardinal S. C., at the same time never breathing a word to me about the Marchesa G.; and Cardinal Acquaviva had not concealed his pleasure when he saw the beautiful snuffbox in which his generous brother cardinal had given me a sample of his Negrillo. Seeing me so well on the road, the Abate Gama, though he congratulated me, did not dare give me any more advice; and Father Georgi, who divined the whole situation, told me that I should content myself with the favor of the Marchesa G. and take very good care not to give her up for some other acquaintance. Such was my situation.

It was on Christmas Day that I saw Barbaruccia's lover enter my room, shut the door, and throw himself on a sofa, saying that I was seeing him for the last time.

"I come only to ask you for some good advice."

"What advice can I give you?"

"Here—read this. It will tell you everything."

It was a letter from Barbaruccia and ran as follows: "I am pregnant, my dear, I can no longer doubt it. I write to tell you that I have resolved to leave Rome by myself and to die where God may please to send me if you do not take care of me. I will bear anything rather than confess to my father the unhappy state to which we have brought ourselves."

"As a man of honor," I said, "you cannot abandon her. Marry her, despite your father and hers, and then live with her. Eternal Providence will help you."

He reflects, he seems calmer, he leaves.

Anno 1744.

At the beginning of January he appears again, looking very happy.

"I have," he says, "rented the top floor of the house next to Barbaruccia's. She knows this; and tonight I will leave it by the attic window and go in through the attic window of hers. We will settle on a time when I can carry her off. My plan is laid. I have decided to take her to Naples; and since her maid, who sleeps in the attic, cannot help knowing of her elopement, I will take her with us."

"May God bless you."

A week later I see him enter my room an hour before midnight with an abate.

"What do you want with me at this hour?"

"I want to make you acquainted with this handsome abate."

I recognize Barbaruccia and am alarmed. "Did anyone see you come in?"

"No. And suppose anyone did? It is only an abate. We spend every night together."

"I congratulate you."

"The maid has already consented, she will come with us. We leave in a little while and shall be at Naples in twenty-four hours. We have a carriage to take us to the first posthouse, where I am sure they will give us horses."

"Good-by, then. I wish you happiness. I must ask you to leave."

"Good-by."

A few days later when I was walking at the Villa Medici with the Abate Gama, I hear him remark that there is to be an execution at the Piazza di Spagna that night.

"What sort of execution?"

"The Bargello[15] or his lieutenant will execute some ordine santissimo, either by searching some suspected house or carrying off someone who does not expect it."

"How has it become known?"

"His Eminence has to know it, for the Pope would not dare to encroach on his jurisdiction[16] without asking his leave."

"So he has asked him?"

"Yes. An auditore santissimo[17] came to ask his permission this morning."

"But our Cardinal could have refused."

"True, but he never refuses such a request."

"And if the person sought is under his protection?"

"In that case His Eminence sends him a warning."

A quarter of an hour later, when I had left the Abate, I began to feel very uneasy. It occurred to me that the order might concern Barbaruccia or her lover. Dalacqua's house was under the jurisdiction of Spain. I looked for the young man everywhere, but in vain, though I did not dare to go to his house or to Barbaruccia's for fear of implicating myself. Yet if I had been sure I should find him there, I would certainly have gone, but my suspicion was not firmly founded enough.

About midnight, feeling ready for bed, I go to the door to take out the key when I am surprised to see an abate come in breathless and throw himself into a chair. Recognizing Barbaruccia I lock my door; I gather what has happened and, foreseeing the consequences, consider myself lost. In my trouble and confusion I ask her no questions, I give her a piece of my mind, upbraiding her for having taken refuge in my room, and I ask her to go.

Alas! I should not have asked her, I should have forced her and even summoned help if she refused to go. I did not have the heart.

At the word "go," she flung herself at my feet, sobbing, moaning, and begging me to take pity on her. I gave in, but warning her that we were both lost.

"No one saw me enter the palace or come up here, I am sure of it; and I think I am lucky to have come here to see you ten days ago, otherwise I should never have guessed where your room is."

"Better that you should never have known! What has become of your lover the Doctor?"

"The sbirri[18] have carried him off with the maid. But here is the whole story:

"My lover told me last evening that a carriage[19] would be waiting at eleven o'clock tonight at the foot of the Scala di Trinità dei Monti[20] and that he would be waiting for me in it. Accordingly, an hour ago I left my house by the attic window, with the maid going ahead. I entered his house, I put on the clothes which you see, I came downstairs and started straight toward the carriage. My maid was walking ahead of me with my few belongings. Turning a corner, I notice that one of my shoe buckles has come undone, I stop and bend over to fasten it. My maid, thinking that I was still following her, went on to the carriage and got in; I was only thirty paces behind her. But then something stopped me in my tracks. The maid had scarcely got in when by the light of a lantern I see the carriage surrounded by sbirri, at the same time the postilion dismounts, another man takes his place and drives the carriage away at full gallop with my maid and my lover, who was certainly waiting for me in it. What could I do at that terrible moment? Since I could not go back home, I obeyed an impulse which I can only call involuntary and which brought me here. So here I am. You tell me that my action has ruined you, and all this is killing me. Find some expedient, I am ready for anything; even to ruin myself if necessary, to save you."

But as she uttered these last words she burst into sobs for which I can find no comparison. Realizing the full horror of her situation, I thought it far worse than mine; but that did not prevent me from seeing that I was on the verge of ruin, guiltless though I was.

"Let me take you to your father's feet," I said. "I feel that I have the power to convince him that he must save you from shame."

But when she hears me propose this expedient, which was the only one, I see that the poor creature is in despair. Her tears falling in torrents, she answers that she would rather I put her out in the street and abandoned her there. This is what I should have done, and I considered it; but I could not bring myself to do it. What stopped me was her tears.

Do you know, my dear reader, the power of tears falling from the lovely eyes of a young, pretty girl who is respectable and unfortunate? Their power is irresistible. Credete a chi ne ha fatto esperimento ("Believe him who has had the experience").[21] It was a physical impossibility for me to turn her out. What tears! Three handkerchiefs were soaked with them in half an hour. I have never seen tears shed so uninterruptedly; if they were necessary to assuage her grief, there was never in the world a grief to equal hers.

After all these tears, I asked her what she thought of doing when daylight came. It had already struck midnight.

"I will leave the palace," she said, sobbing. "In these clothes no one will notice me; I will leave Rome; I will walk until my breath fails."

With these words she fell to the floor; I thought she was going to die. She herself put a finger to her neckband to help her to breathe, for she was choking. I saw her turning blue. I was in the most excruciating of quandaries.

After untying her neckband and unbuttoning everything that was tight on her, I brought her back to life by sprinkling her face with water. The night being extremely cold, and there being no fire in my room, I told her to get into bed and be sure that I would respect her. She answered that she believed her state was such that it could inspire only pity, but that in any case she was in my hands to do with as I would. To restore her courage and to give her blood a chance to flow freely, I persuaded her to undress and get under the covers. Since she had not the strength, I had to undress her and carry her to the bed myself. In so doing, I performed a new experiment on myself. It was a discovery. I resisted the sight of all her charms without any difficulty. She went to sleep, and so did I, lying beside her, but fully dressed. A quarter of an hour before dawn I woke her and, finding her strength restored, she did not need me to help her dress.

As soon as it was daylight, I went out, telling her to remain calm until I returned. I went out with the intention of going to her father, but I changed my mind as soon as I saw spies. I went to the coffeehouse in the Via Condotti, observing that I was followed at a distance. After taking a cup of chocolate, I put some biscuits in my pocket and returned to the palace, observing that I was still followed by the same spy. I gathered from this that the Bargello, having failed to catch her, was now reduced to acting on conjectures. The porter told me, without my asking him, that a seizure was attempted during the night but that he believed it had failed. At the same moment an auditore of the Cardinal Vicar's asked the porter when he could speak to the Abate Gama. I saw that there was no time to be lost, and I went up to my room to decide on a course.

After making Barbaruccia eat two biscuits dipped in Canary wine, I took her to the top of the palace to an indecorous place to which no one ever went. I told her she must wait there until she heard from me, since my lackey was bound to arrive. He arrived a few minutes later. I went down to the Abate Gama's apartment, first ordering the man to bring me the key to my room as soon as he had finished cleaning it.

I found the Abate in conversation with an auditore of the Cardinal Vicar's. When he had finished talking with him, he came to me and at once ordered chocolate. To give me the news of the day, he told me about the Cardinal Vicar's message. His Eminence was to be asked to dismiss from the palace a person who must have taken refuge in it about midnight. "Nothing can be done," he added, "until the Cardinal is visible; if anyone has hidden in the palace without his knowledge, he will certainly have the person turned out." We then talked of the cold weather until my servant brought me the key. Seeing that I had at least an hour before me, I thought of an expedient which alone could save Barbaruccia from disgrace.

Making sure that I was unobserved, I went to the place where Barbaruccia was hiding, gave her a pencil, and made her write a note in good French, in these terms: "I am, Monsignore, a decent girl disguised as an abate. I implore Your Eminence to permit me to tell you my name in person. I trust in your magnanimity to save my honor."

"You will leave this place," I told her, "at exactly nine o'clock. You will go down three flights of stairs and you will enter the apartment on your right and pass through it to the last antechamber, where you will see a stout gentleman sitting before a brazier. You will hand him this note, asking him to deliver it to the Cardinal at once. Do not fear that he will read it, for he will not have time. As soon as he has delivered it, you may be sure that the Cardinal will let you come in at once and will hear you without a witness. Go down on your knees and tell him your whole story, perfectly truthfully, all except the fact that you spent the night in my room and that you have talked with me. Say that when you saw your lover carried off, you were frightened, you entered the palace, and went up to the top floor where, after spending an agonizing night, you felt inspired to write him the note which you sent in to him. I am certain, my poor Barbaruccia, that His Eminence will save you from disgrace in one way or another. This is your only hope of having your lover become your husband."

When she had assured me that she would carry out all my instructions to the letter, I went downstairs, had my hair dressed, changed my clothes, and, after hearing mass in the presence of the Cardinal, I went out and did not return until dinnertime.

At table this extraordinary incident furnished the sole subject of conversation. Each gave his own version of it. Only the Abate Gama said nothing, and I did likewise. What I gathered was that the Cardinal had extended his protection to the person who was sought. This was all I wanted; so, thinking that I had no further reason for fear, I silently rejoiced in the outcome of my little stratagem, which I thought a masterpiece. After dinner I asked the Abate Gama to tell me what all this business was about, and here is his answer:

"A father whose name I have not yet learned appealed to the Cardinal Vicar to prevent his son from eloping with a girl whom he planned to take out of the state. The elopement was to take place at midnight in our Piazza. After obtaining His Eminence's leave, as I told you yesterday, the Vicar ordered the Bargello to bring in his men and capture the guilty couple in the act. The order was carried out; but the sbirri discovered they had been tricked when, on arriving at the Bargello's and ordering the prisoners out of the carriage, instead of a girl they found a woman and indeed such a woman as no one would think of carrying off. A few minutes later a spy came to the Bargello and told him that just as the carriage was leaving the Piazza an abate had run into the Palazzo di Spagna. The Bargello at once went to the Cardinal Vicar and reported the circumstance which had been responsible for his failure to apprehend the girl, apparently mentioning his suspicion that she might be the very abate who had taken refuge in the Palazzo. The Vicar then informed our master that a girl dressed as an abate might be hiding in his palace. He asked him to have the person, whether girl or abate, turned out, unless it was someone whom His Eminence knew to be above suspicion. Cardinal Acquaviva was informed of this just before nine o'clock this morning by the Vicar's auditore, with whom you saw me talking this morning. He dismissed him with an assurance that he would have a thorough search made and would turn out anyone in the palace who was not known to him.

"Sure enough, the Cardinal immediately gave such an order to the majordomo, who at once began carrying it out; but a quarter of an hour later he was ordered to stop the search. The reason for the counterorder can only be this:

“The Chamberlain has told me that on the stroke of nine o’clock a very good-looking abate, whom he really thought a girl in disguise, appeared before him and asked him to deliver to His Eminence a note which the abate handed him. He delivered it immediately, and no sooner had His Eminence read it than he ordered him to admit the abate, who has not left His Eminence’s apartment since then. As the order to stop the search was given immediately after the abate was admitted, there is good reason to believe that the said abate is the girl whom the sbirri failed to apprehend and who took refuge in the palace, where she must have remained in hiding all night until she was prompted to present herself to the Cardinal.”

“Even so, His Eminence may today put her into the hands not of the sbirri but of the Vicar.”

“Not even into the hands of the Pope. You can have no idea of the power of our Cardinal’s protection, and his protection has already been extended since the person is not only still in the palace but in the master’s own apartment under his guard.”

The story was interesting and the attention with which I listened to it was far from offending the inquisitive Gama, who would certainly have told me nothing if he knew how deeply I was involved and how great my interest in the story must be. I went to the opera at the Teatro Aliberti.[22]

The next morning Gama entered my bedroom and smilingly told me that the Cardinal Vicar knew that the abductor was a friend of mine and that the girl must be too, since her father was my French teacher.

“Everyone is certain,” he said, “that you knew about the whole affair and they naturally think that the poor child spent the night in your room. I admire the prudence you demonstrated in your behavior toward me yesterday. You were so well on your guard that I would have wagered you knew nothing about it.”

"Nor did I," I answered calmly and seriously. "I have learned of it only this moment from your own lips. I know the girl, but I have not seen her since six weeks ago, when I stopped taking lessons; I am much better acquainted with the young Doctor, yet he never told me anything about his plan. However, everyone is free to think what he chooses. It is natural, you say, that the girl should have spent the night in my room. Permit me to laugh at those who take conjectures for certainties."

"It is the particular vice of the Romans, my dear friend, and those who can laugh at it are fortunate; but this slander, for I believe it to be a slander, can turn our master's mind against you."

That evening, there being no opera, I went to the reception. I found not the slightest change in the Cardinal's manner nor in anyone else's. I found the Marchesa more gracious to me than usual. It was the next day after dinner that Gama told me that the Cardinal had sent the girl to a convent, where she was being very well taken care of at His Eminence's expense.

"I am sure," he said, "that she will not leave it except to become the wife of the young man who tried to abduct her."

"I assure you," I answered, "that I shall be very glad, for both he and she are honorable and worthy of everyone's esteem."

A day or two later Father Georgi told me that the news of the day in Rome was the abortive attempt to carry off the daughter of the advocate Dalacqua; and that I was credited with having managed the entire intrigue, as he was greatly displeased to hear. I spoke to him as I had spoken to Gama, and he appeared to believe me, but he said that Rome did not like to know things as they were but as it chose to think they must be.

"It is known," he said, "that you went to Dalacqua's house every morning; it is known that the young man frequently called on you, and that is enough. No one wishes to know what would scotch the slander, for slander is the delight of this holy city. Your innocence will not prevent the business from being laid to your account forty years hence at a conclave of cardinals at which you are put up as a candidate for the Papacy.''

During the following days this accursed adventure began to be a real annoyance, for everyone spoke of it to me and I clearly saw that if people listened to what I had to say and appeared to believe me, it was only because they could not do otherwise.

The Marchesa G. slyly told me that Signorina Dalacqua was under the greatest obligation to me; but what troubled me most was that, even in these last days of the Carnival, Cardinal Acquaviva had changed his old unconstrained manner toward me. No one noticed it; but I saw it beyond peradventure.

It was, in fact, at the beginning of Lent, when everyone had stopped talking about the elopement, that the Cardinal told me to go into his study with him. It was there that he treated me to the following little discourse:

''The Dalacqua affair is over, no one even mentions it now. But, leaving aside the question of whether it is a slander or not, the general verdict is that those who profited by the young man's bungling attempt to abduct the girl are you and I. All this talk is nothing to me, for if the same thing happened to me again, I would not act otherwise; nor do I wish to know what no one can oblige you to tell and what, as a man of honor, you even ought not to tell. If you knew nothing about it beforehand, by turning the girl away—always supposing that she was in your room—you would have committed a barbarous and even cowardly act, which would have made her miserable for the rest of her life and, even so, would have left you suspected of complicity and, what is worse, of disloyalty. But despite all this you can well imagine that, though I scorn all talk of the kind, I nevertheless cannot remain entirely indifferent[23] to it. Such being the case, I find myself obliged to ask you to leave not only my service but Rome as well; but I will supply you with an excuse which will preserve your honor and, what is more, such consideration as the proofs of my esteem which I have given you may have gained you. I give you permission to inform anyone you please in confidence, and even to announce to the world, that you are going away on a piece of business which I have entrusted to you.

"Consider what country you wish to go to; I have friends everywhere; I will give you such recommendations as I am certain will procure you employment. I will give you letters of introduction in my own hand; it rests with you to arrange matters so that no one will know where you are going. Come tomorrow to the Villa Negroni, prepared to tell me to what place you wish me to give you letters. You must be ready to leave in a week. Believe me, I am sorry to lose you. It is a sacrifice which I make to the greatest of all prejudices. Do not oblige me to witness your grief, I beg you."

He spoke these last words when he saw my tears, and he gave me no time to answer so that he need not see more of them; I nevertheless found the strength to compose myself and to appear in good spirits to all who saw me coming out of his office. At table everyone thought me in the best possible humor. The Abate Gama, after giving me coffee in his room, congratulated me on looking so happy. "I am sure," he said, "that it is because of your conversation with His Eminence this morning."

"Concern?"

"Yes, I am very much afraid I may fail in a difficult mission which the Cardinal entrusted to me this morning. I am obliged to hide the little confidence I feel in myself in order not to diminish the confidence His Eminence has in my small abilities."

"If my advice can be of any use to you, make free of it. However, you do very well to appear happy and calm. Is it a mission in Rome?"

"No. It involves a journey on which I must start in a week or ten days."

"In what direction?"

"Westward."

"I will not ask you any more."

I went by myself to the Villa Borghese, where I walked for two hours in desperation, for I loved Rome and, having started on the highroad to fortune, I saw myself an outcast not knowing which way to turn and with all my hopes blighted. Examining my conduct, I could not find that I was guilty; but I clearly saw that Father Georgi was right. I should not only have had nothing to do with Barbaruccia's subsequent course, I should have changed my French teacher as soon as I discovered that she was carrying on a love affair. But at my age and with my small knowledge of what misfortune meant, I could not have a caution which could only be the fruit of long experience. I considered where I ought to go, I thought about it all night and all the next morning, yet I could not decide on one place rather than another. I went back and retired to my room without any thought of supper. The Abate Gama came and told me that His Eminence wished me not to make any engagement for dinner the next day as he had business to transact with me.

I found him at the Villa Negroni, tomando el sol.[24] He was walking with his secretary, whom he left as soon as he saw me. Left alone with him, I gave him a full and faithful account of Barbaruccia's intrigue, omitting not the smallest detail. After this faithful narrative, I described the grief I felt at leaving him, painting it in the liveliest colors. I told him that I felt that all my hopes of fortune were dashed for my entire life, since I was certain that I could attain to it only in his service. I spent an hour talking to him in this vein, weeping most of the time; but all that I said was of no avail. He told me in the kindest manner to take courage, and when he urged me to tell him to what place in Europe I wished to go, the word which despair and resentment brought to my lips was "Constantinople."[25]

"Constantinople?" he said, falling back two steps.

"Yes, Monsignore, Constantinople," I repeated, wiping away my tears.

The prelate, who was a man of wit, though a thorough Spaniard, said not a word for two or three minutes. Then, looking at me with a smile:

"I am obliged to you," he said, "for not choosing Ispahan,[26] for I should have been at a loss. When do you wish to leave?"

"A week from today, as Your Eminence commanded me."

"Shall you embark at Naples, or at Venice?"

"At Venice."

"I will give you an adequate passport, for you will find two armies in winter quarters[27] in Romagna. So far as I am concerned, you can tell everyone that I am sending you to Constantinople, for nobody will believe you."

This piece of political acumen almost made me laugh. He gave me his hand, which I kissed, and set off to rejoin his secretary, who was waiting for him in another walk; as he left, he told me that I was to dine with him.

On my way back to the Palazzo di Spagna, considering what I had done, my astonishment at having chosen Constantinople was so great that for a moment I thought only two things were possible: either I had gone mad, or I had been impelled to bring out the name by nothing other than the mysterious power of my Genius, who was summoning me there in concert with my destiny. What surprised me was that the Cardinal had consented at once. It seemed as if his pride had prevented him from advising me to go somewhere else. He was afraid I might think he had been boasting when he told me that he had friends everywhere. To whom would he recommend me? What should I do in Constantinople? I had no idea, but go there I must. His Eminence dined alone with me and made a point of showing me the utmost kindness, as I did of showing the utmost satisfaction, for my self-esteem was stronger than my grief and would not allow me to give anyone who might be observing me the slightest cause for suspecting that I was in disfavor. The chief reason for my sadness was having to leave the Marchesa G., with whom I was in love and from whom I had obtained nothing of consequence.

On the next day but one His Eminence gave me a passport for Venice and a sealed lètter addressed to "Osman Bonneval,[28] Pasha of Karamania, at Constantinople." I could have kept it to myself, but since the Cardinal had not forbidden it, I showed the address on the letter to all my acquaintances. The Abate Gama laughed and said he knew I was not going to Constantinople. The Cavaliere da Lezze, the Venetian Ambassador, gave me a letter addressed to a rich and kindly Turk who had been a friend of his. Don Gaspare asked me to write to him, as did Father Georgi. When I took leave of Donna Cecilia, she read me part of a letter from her daughter, containing the happy news that she was pregnant. I also paid a call on Donna Angelica, whom Don Francesco had married without inviting me to the wedding.

When I went to receive the Holy Father's blessing, I was not surprised to hear him tell me of his acquaintances in Constantinople. Of these the one he had known best was Monsieur de Bonneval. He directed me to give him his compliments and tell him he was sorry he could not send him his blessing. Giving me a most hearty one, he presented me with a rosary of agates connected by a thin gold chain, which might be worth twelve zecchini.

When I took leave of Cardinal Acquaviva, he gave me a purse in which I found a hundred coins of the sort the Castilians call doblones de a ocho.[29] They were worth seven hundred zecchini and I had three hundred. I kept two hundred and procured a bill of exchange for sixteen hundred Roman scudi on a Ragusan who had an office in Ancona and was named Giovanni Bucchetti. I took a seat in a berlin with a lady who was taking her daughter to Loreto to fulfill a vow she had made at the crisis of an illness which, but for the vow, might well have brought her to the grave. The girl was ugly. I was bored during the whole journey.

Volume Two

My short and too lively stay in Ancona. Cecilia, Marina, Bellino. The Greek slave girl from the Lazaretto. Bellino unmasks.

I REACHED Ancona at nightfall on the 25th of February in the year 1744 and put up at the best inn in the town. Satisfied with my room, I tell the host that I wish to eat meat. He replies that in Lent Christians eat fish. I say that the Pope has given me permission to eat meat; he tells me to show him the permission; I say that he gave it to me by word of mouth; he will not believe me; I call him a fool; he tells me to go and lodge elsewhere; and this last proposition of his, which I do not expect, astonishes me. I swear, I curse; whereupon a solemn-looking individual comes out of a room and proceeds to tell me that I was wrong to want to eat meat, since fish was better in Ancona; that I was wrong to expect the innkeeper to take my word for it that I had permission; that, if I had permission, I was wrong to have asked for it at my age; that I was wrong to have called the innkeeper a fool, since he was free to refuse to lodge me; and, finally, that I was wrong to raise such a row.

This man who was sticking his nose into my business unasked, and who had come out of his room only to tell me how unimaginably wrong I was, had very nearly set me laughing.

"Sir," I said, "I subscribe to all your accusations. But it is raining, I am extremely hungry, and I have no wish to go out looking for another lodging at this hour. So I ask you if, since our host refuses, you will provide me with supper."

"No, for I am a Catholic and hence am keeping the fast; but I will undertake to calm our ruffled host, who will give you a good supper, though of fish."

So saying, he started downstairs; and I, comparing his cool common sense with my hasty petulance, acknowledge that he is worthy of teaching me a thing or two. He comes back upstairs, enters my room, says that all is well again, that I shall have a good supper, and that he will keep me company at it. I reply that I shall consider it an honor and, to oblige him to tell me his name, I tell him mine, adding that I am Cardinal Acquaviva's secretary.

"My name," he says, "is Sancho Pico, I am a Castilian and Proveditor of the army of His Catholic Majesty, which is commanded by the Count de Gages[1] under orders from the Generalissimo, the Duke of Modena.[2]

After exclaiming over the appetite with which I ate all that was set before me, he asked me if I had dined; and he seemed relieved when I answered that I had not.

"Will the supper you have eaten," he asked, "make you ill?"

"I have reason to hope that, on the contrary, it will do me good."

"Then you have deceived the Pope. Follow me to the next room. You will have the pleasure of hearing some good music. The first actress is lodging there."

The word "actress" arouses my curiosity, and I follow him. I see a woman rather well on in years eating supper at a table with two girls and two handsome youths. I look in vain for the actress. Don Sancho introduces her to me in the person of one of the youths, who was ravishingly handsome and could not have been more than sixteen or seventeen years old. I think at once that he is the castrato who had played the part of first actress at the theater in Ancona,[3] which was subject to the same regulations as the theaters in Rome. The mother introduces her other son, a good-looking boy too, but not a castrato, whose name was Petronio and who appeared as prima ballerina, and her two daughters, the elder of whom, named Cecilia, was studying music and was twelve years old; the other, who was a dancer, was eleven and named Marina; they were both pretty. The family came from Bologna and made a living by its talents. Affability and lightheartedness made up for their poverty.

When Bellino (for such was the name of the castrato who was first actress) rose from table he yielded to Don Sancho's urging and sat down at the harpsichord and accompanied himself in an air which he sang with the voice of an angel and enchanting fioriture. The Spaniard listened with his eyes closed and seemed to be in ecstasy. For my part, far from keeping my eyes closed, I was admiring Bellino's which, black as carbuncles, sparkled with a fire which burned my soul. This anomalous being had some of Donna Lucrezia's features and certain gestures reminiscent of the Marchesa G. The face seemed to me feminine. And the masculine attire did not prevent my seeing a certain fullness of bosom, which put it into my head that despite the billing, this must be a girl. In this conviction, I made no resistance to the desires which he aroused in me.

After two pleasant hours Don Sancho saw me to my room and told me that he was leaving early in the morning for Sinigaglia[4] with the Abate Vilmarcati, and would return the following day in time for supper. Wishing him a good journey, I said that I should meet him on the road, since I wished to sup at Sinigaglia that day. I was stopping in Ancona only for a day, to present my bill of exchange to the banker and get another for Bologna.

I went to bed full of the impression which Bellino had made on me and sorry to leave without having given him proof of the justice I did him in not being hoodwinked by his disguise. But the next morning I had no more than opened my door when he appears before me and offers me his brother to serve me instead of a hired manservant. I agree, he comes at once, and I send him to bring coffee for the whole family. I make Bellino sit down on my bed, intending to treat him as a girl; but his two sisters come running to me and thwart my plan. I could not but delight in the charming picture I had before my eyes: gaiety, of three different kinds, unadorned beauty, familiarity without presumption, the verve of the theater, a pretty playfulness, little Bolognese grimaces with which I was not yet familiar and which I found most charming. The two little girls were perfect living rosebuds, and more than worthy of being preferred to Bellino if I had not taken it into my head that Bellino was a girl too. Despite their extreme youth the sign of their precocious puberty was visible on their white bosoms.

The coffee came, brought by Petronio, who served us and took some to his mother, who never left her own room. Petronio was a true Giton,[5] and a professional at that. This is not unusual in outlandish Italy, where intolerance in this matter is not unreasonable, as it is in England, nor ferocious, as it is in Spain. I gave him a zecchino to pay for the coffee and made him a present of the eighteen paoli in change, which he accepted with such a mark of his gratitude as clearly revealed his tastes. It was a kiss from half-open lips, which he planted on mine in the belief that I was a devotee of the pretty practice. I had no difficulty in setting him right, but I saw no sign that he felt humiliated. When I told him to order dinner for six, he answered that he would order it only for four, since he had to keep his dear mother company, who ate in bed.

Two minutes later the innkeeper came up and said that the people I was having to dinner each ate at least enough for two, so he would serve me only if I paid six paoli apiece. I agreed. Thinking it proper to say good day to the obliging mother, I go to her room and congratulate her on her charming family. She thanks me for the eighteen paoli I had given her dear son and proceeds to confide her poverty-stricken circumstances to me.

"The impresario Rocco Argenti," she tells me, "is a hardhearted monster who has given me only fifty Roman scudi for the whole Carnival. We have spent it all, and can only get back to Bologna on foot and begging for alms on the road."

I gave her a doblon de a ocho, at which she wept for joy. I promise her another if she will tell me a secret.

"Admit," I say, "that Bellino is a girl."

"You may be sure he is not; but he does look it. So much so, indeed, that he had to submit to being examined."

"By whom?"

"By the very reverend confessor of Monsignor the Bishop."

"I will not believe a word of it until I have examined him myself."

"Very well; but in conscience I can have nothing to do with it for, God forgive me, I do not know what your intentions are."

I go to my room, I send Petronio out to buy a bottle of Cyprus wine, he gives me seven zecchini in change from a doblon I had given him, and I divide it among Bellino, Cecilia, and Marina; then I ask the two girls to leave me alone with their brother.

"My dear Bellino," I say, "I am sure that you are not of my sex."

"I am of your sex, but a castrato; I have been examined."

"Let me examine you too, and here is a doblon for you."

"No, for it is clear that you are in love with me, and religion forbids me to let you."

"You were not so scrupulous with the Bishop's confessor."

"He was old, and all he did was take a hasty look at my unfortunate condition."

I put out my hand, he pushes it away and rises. This obstinacy angers me, for I had already spent fifteen or sixteen zecchini to satisfy my curiosity. I sit down to dinner in the sulks, but the appetite of the three pretty creatures restores my good humor and I make up my mind to obtain a return for the money I had spent from the two younger sisters.

With the three of us sitting before the fire eating chestnuts, I begin distributing kisses; and Bellino, on his side, shows no want of compliance. I touch and then kiss the budding breasts of Cecilia and Marina; and Bellino, with a smile, does nothing to stop my hand from slipping behind his shirt ruffle and laying hold of a breast which leaves me in no possible doubt.

"This breast," I said, "proclaims you a girl, and you cannot deny it."

"All we castrati have the same deformity."

"So I am aware. But I know enough about it to tell the one kind from the other. This alabaster breast, my dear Bellino, is the charming breast of a girl of seventeen."

Completely on fire, and seeing that he offered no resistance to my hand, which was delighting in possessing such a breast, I make to approach it with my panting lips, which were pale from the intensity of my ardor; but the impostor, as if he had only that moment become aware of the forbidden pleasure I was enjoying, rises and walks off. I am left raging, yet unable to blame him, for I should first have had to blame myself. Needing to recover my calm, I asked Cecilia, who was his pupil, to sing me some Neapolitan songs; then I went out to see the Ragusan Bucchetti, who gave me a bill of sight on Bologna in exchange for the one I presented to him. Back at the inn, I went to bed after eating a dish of macaroni in the company of the girls. I told Petronio to have a post chaise ready for me at daybreak, as I wished to leave.

Just as I was going to shut my door, I see Cecilia, wearing little more than a shift, coming to tell me that Bellino would consider it a favor if I would take him with me as far as Rimini, where he was engaged to sing in an opera which was to be produced after Easter.

"Go and tell him, my little angel, that I am ready to do him the favor if he will first do me that of showing me, in your presence, whether he is a girl or a boy."

She goes, and comes back to tell me he is already in bed, but that if I would put off my departure for only one day he promised to satisfy my curiosity.

"Tell me the truth and I will give you six zecchini."

"I cannot earn them, for I have never seen him naked and so cannot be sure of my own knowledge; but he is certainly a boy, otherwise he would not have been allowed to sing in this city."

"Very well. I will not leave until day after tomorrow, if you will spend the night with me."

"So you love me?"

"Very much; but you must be kind to me."

"That I will, because I love you too. I'll go and let my mother know."

"You have surely had a lover."

"Never."

She came back in high spirits, saying that her mother thought me a man of honor. She fastened my door and fell into my arms with all the abandon of love. I found that she might be a virgin; but as I was not in love with her I did not catechize her. Love is the divine sauce which makes that morsel delicious. Cecilia was charming, but I had not had time to desire her; hence I could not say to her, "You have made me happy"; it was she who said it to me; but I did not feel much flattered. However, I was willing to believe her, she was tender, I was tender, I fell asleep in her arms, and when I woke, after giving her love's morning salutation, I presented her with three doblones, which could not but please her better than vows of eternal constancy. Ridiculous vows, which no man can make to the most beautiful of women. Cecilia left to carry her wealth to her mother, who wept for joy as she renewed her trust in Divine Providence.

I sent for the innkeeper and ordered him to prepare a supper for five regardless of expense. I was sure that the noble Don Sancho, who was to be back toward evening, would not refuse me the honor of supping with me. I ate no dinner; but the Bolognese family did not feel that any such abstinence was necessary to give them an appetite for supper. When I sent for Bellino and demanded that he keep his promise, he replied with a smile that the day was not over yet and that he was sure he would travel to Rimini with me. I asked him if he would like to take a walk with me, and he went to dress.

Just then in comes Marina, looking sulky, and says that she does not know how she had deserved the proof of my disfavor I was about to give her.

"Cecilia spent the night with you, you go off tomorrow with Bellino, I am the only unlucky one of us."

"Do you want money?"

"No, I love you."

"You are too young."

"Age has nothing to do with it. I am better developed than my sister."

"Then perhaps you have had a lover."

"Certainly not."

"So much the better. We'll find out this evening."

"Then I'll tell my mother to have some sheets ready for tomorrow, otherwise the maid would guess what happened."

I found these comedies in the highest degree entertaining. Coming to the port with Bellino, I bought a small barrel of oysters at the Venetian arsenal as a treat for Don Sancho, and after arranging to have them delivered to the inn, I took Bellino out to the roads with me and went on board a Venetian ship of the line which had just finished its quarantine. Finding no one I knew in it, I went on board a Turkish vessel which was making ready to sail for Alexandria.

Scarcely aboard, the first person I see is the beautiful Greek girl whom I had left in the lazaretto at Ancona seven months earlier. She was beside the old captain. I pretend not to see her and ask him if he has any fine merchandise to sell. He takes us to his cabin and opens his closets. I read in the Greek girl's eyes her joy at seeing me again. Nothing that the Turk showed me having suited me, I told him that I would be glad to buy something pretty, such as might please his fairer half. He laughs, she speaks to him in Turkish, and he goes off. She comes running and throws herself on my neck, and, clasping me to her bosom, says: "Fortune gives us this one moment." My courage being no less than hers, I sit down, accommodate her to my position, and in less than a minute do what her master had never done to her in five years. I plucked the fruit, and I was eating it; but to swallow it I needed another minute. The poor Greek girl, hearing her master coming back, left my arms and turned her back to me, thus giving me time to set myself to rights without his seeing my disordered state, which could well have cost me my life, or all the money I possessed, to bring to an amicable settlement. What amused me in this really serious situation was to see Bellino struck motionless by surprise and shaking with fear.

The knickknacks which the beautiful slave chose cost me only twenty or thirty zecchini. "Spolaitis,"[6] she said to me in her native language; but she ran away when her master told her she ought to kiss me. I left more sad than gay, feeling sorry for the charming creature whom, for all her courage, Heaven had obstinately determined to grant only a partial favor. In the felucca,[7] when Bellino had recovered from his fright, he said that I had shown him a prodigy which he could not believe he had really seen but which gave him a strange idea of my character; as for the Greek girl's, he was completely at a loss, unless I were to tell him that all women from her country were of the same nature. Bellino said that they must be unhappy.

"Then you must believe," said I, "that coquettes are happy?"

"I don't want either kind. I want a woman to yield to love sincerely, and to surrender after she has struggled with herself; I don't want her to give in to the first sensation a man who attracts her arouses in her and abandon herself to him like a bitch whose only law is instinct. Admit that this Greek girl certainly showed you that you were attractive to her, but at the same time gave you unequivocal proof of her animality and of an effrontery which exposed her to the shame of being refused, for she could not know that she had attracted you as much as you attracted her. She is very pretty, and it all went well; but I was terrified."

I could have calmed Bellino and put an end to his perfectly sound argument by telling him the whole story; but that would not have served my purpose. If he was a girl, it was to my advantage to convince him that I attached little importance to the great affair and that it was not worth employing trickery to prevent it from following its course unimpeded.

We returned to the inn, and toward nightfall we saw

Don Sancho enter the courtyard in his carriage. I went to meet him and asked him to excuse me for having assumed that he would do me the honor of supping with Bellino and myself. Acknowledging with dignity and politeness the favor which I had been so kind as to do him, he accepted.

The choice and well-prepared dishes, the good Spanish wines, the excellent oysters, and still more the high spirits and the voices of Bellino and Cecilia, who performed duets and seguidillas[8] for us, gave the Spaniard five hours of paradise. Leaving us at midnight, he said he would only go to bed easy if I would promise to sup with him in his room the next evening, in the same company. This meant that I must put off my departure for another day. I surprised him by accepting.

I then urged Bellino to keep his promise to me; but he answered that Marina had something to say to me and that we should have plenty of time to be together the next day, and so left me. I remained alone with Marina, who happily locked my door.

More well developed, though younger, than Cecilia, the girl felt she owed it to herself to convince me that she deserved to be preferred to her sister. I could well believe it, merely from seeing the fire in her eyes. Fearing that she would be slighted by a man who might have been exhausted by the previous night, she poured out all the amorous ideas which occupied her soul; she told me in detail all that she knew how to do, she set forth all her theories, and gave me a full account of all the occasions she had had to become a past mistress in the mysteries of love, together with her notion of love's pleasures and the means she had employed to obtain a taste of them. I finally made out that she was afraid that, not finding her a virgin, I would reproach her. Her anxiety pleased me, and I amused myself by assuring her that virginity in girls seemed to me only childish imagination, since nature had not even given most of them the tokens of it. I ridiculed those who only too often made the mistake of chiding them on the subject.

I saw that my doctrine pleased her and that she came into my arms full of confidence. And in fact she proved herself superior to her sister in every way, and she was exultant when I told her so; but when she wanted to fill my cup by assuring me she would stay awake the whole night with me, I persuaded her not to, arguing that we would be the losers by it, since if we granted nature the sweet respite of sleep she would show her gratitude by the increased energy of her fire when we woke.

So, having enjoyed ourselves sufficiently and slept well, we renewed the celebration in the morning; and Marina left me well satisfied when she saw the three doblones which she happily carried to her mother, who was insatiable in contracting ever greater obligations to Divine Providence.

I went out to get money from Bucchetti, since I did not know what might happen to me on my journey before I reached Bologna. I had enjoyed myself, but I had spent too much. I still had to consider Bellino, who, if he was a girl, must not find me less generous than his sisters had done. Whether he was must inevitably come out during the course of the day; and I thought I was certain of it.

Those who say that life is only a combination of misfortunes mean that life itself is a misfortune. If it is a misfortune, then death is a happiness. Such people did not write in good health, with their purses stuffed with money, and contentment in their souls from having held Cecilias and Marinas in their arms and being sure that there were more of them to come. Such men are a race of pessimists[9] (forgive me, my dear French language!) which can have existed only among ragged philosophers and rascally or atrabilious theologians. If pleasure exists, and we can only enjoy it in life, then life is a happiness.

There are misfortunes, of course, as I should be the first to know. But the very existence of these misfortunes proves that the sum of good is greater. I am infinitely happy when I am in a dark room and see the light coming through a window which opens on a vast horizon.

At suppertime I waited on Don Sancho, whom I found alone and in a very decent room. His table was laid with silver dishes and his servants were in livery. Bellino, whether from whim or as a ruse, enters dressed as a girl, followed by his two very pretty sisters but whom he totally eclipsed, and at that moment I became so sure of his sex that I would have staked my life against a paolo. It was impossible to imagine a prettier girl.

"Are you convinced," I asked Don Sancho, "that Bellino is not a girl?"

"Girl or boy, what does it matter? I think he is a very handsome castrato; and I have seen others as good-looking as he."

"But are you sure of it?"

"Valgame Dios![10] I am not interested in making sure."

Respecting the Spaniard for possessing a wisdom which I lacked, I made no answer; but at table I could not take my eyes from this being whom my depraved nature impelled me to love and to believe a member of the sex to which it was necessary to my purposes that he should belong.

Don Sancho's supper was exquisite and, as was to be expected, better than mine, for otherwise he would have considered himself dishonored. He gave us white truffles, several kinds of shellfish, the best fish from the Adriatic, still champagne, Peralta, sherry, and Pedro Ximenes.[11] After supper Bellino sang in a fashion to make us lose the little reason the excellent wines had left us. His gestures, the way he moved his eyes, his gait, his bearing, his manner, his face, his voice, and above all my instinct, which I concluded could not make me feel its power for a castrato, all combined to confirm me in my idea. Yet I still needed to make certain from the testimony of my own eyes.

After duly thanking the noble Castilian, we wished him a good sleep and went to my room, where Bellino must either keep his promise to me or earn my contempt and resign himself to seeing me set off alone at dawn.

I take his hand and I make him sit down beside me before the fire, and I ask his two young sisters to leave us alone. They go at once.

"This business," I said, "will not take long if you are of my sex, and if you are of the other you will have only to spend the night with me. I will give you a hundred zecchini in the morning and we will leave together."

"You will leave alone, and you will be generous enough to forgive my weakness if I cannot keep my promise to you. I am a castrato, and I cannot bring myself either to let you see my shame or to expose myself to the loathsome consequences which convincing you of it may have."

"It will have none, for as soon as I have seen, or touched, I will myself beg you to go to bed in your own room; we will leave tomorrow the best of friends and there will be no more of this matter between us."

"No, my mind is made up: I cannot satisfy your curiosity."

At these words I am out of all patience, but I control myself and try gently to advance my hand to the place where I should find if I was right or wrong; but he uses his to stop mine from pursuing the investigation I was set on making.

"Take your hand away, my dear Bellino."

"No, absolutely not! For I see you are in a state which horrifies me. I knew it, and I shall never consent to such infamies. I will go and send my sisters to you."

I hold him back, and pretend to regain my calm; but suddenly, thinking I could take him unawares, I stretch out my arm to the bottom of his back, and my quick hand would have learned the truth from that direction if he had not parried the thrust by rising and blocking my hand, by which I was still holding on, with his, which he had been keeping over what he called his shame. It was at this moment that I saw he was a man, and believed that I saw it against his will. Astonished, angered, mortified, disgusted, I let him leave. I saw that Bellino was in truth a man; but a man to be scorned both for his degradation and for the shameful calm I observed in him at a moment when I ought not to have seen the most patent evidence of his insensibility.

A little later his sisters appeared, but I asked them to leave since I needed sleep. I told them to inform Bellino that he would leave with me and that he would no longer find me in the least curious. I fastened my door and went to bed, but very much dissatisfied, for despite the fact that what I had seen should have disillusioned me, I felt that it had not. But what more did I want? Alas! I thought about it and I could not imagine.

Next morning, after eating an excellent soup, I set off with him, and with my heart torn by the tears of his sisters and of their mother, who, mumbling paternosters and telling her beads, kept repeating "Dio provvederà" [12] over and over.

Belief in Eternal Providence on the part of most of those who live by practices forbidden by laws or religion is neither absurd nor feigned nor the fruit of hypocrisy; it is true, real, and, such as it is, pious, for its source is unimpeachable. Whatever ways it takes, it is always Providence which acts, and those who worship it regardless of everything else can only be good souls though guilty of sinning.

Pulchra Laverna
Da mihi fallere; da justo, sanctoque videri;
Noctem peccatis, et fraudibus objice nubem!

> ("Fair Laverna, let me deceive, let me appear just and good; cover my sins with darkness and my stealth with a cloud.")[13]

Such was the Latin which Roman thieves talked to their goddess in Horace's day, who, so a Jesuit told me, would not have known his language if he had said justo sanctoque.[14] There were ignorant men among the Jesuits too. Thieves laugh at grammar.

So now I was traveling with Bellino, who, believing that he had disillusioned me, might well hope that I would no longer be curious about him. But a quarter of an hour had not passed before he found that he was mistaken. I could not look into his eyes and not burn with love. I told him that since his eyes were a woman's and not a man's, I needed to convince myself by touch that what I had seen when he had run away was not a monstrous clitoris.

"It may be that," I said, "and I feel that I shall have no difficulty in forgiving you for such a defect, which in any case is merely a trifle; but if it is not a clitoris, I need to convince myself of it, which is a very easy matter. I no longer want to see; all I ask is to touch, and you may be sure that as soon as I am certain I will become as gentle as a dove, for once I discover that you are a man, I cannot possibly continue to love you. That is an abomination for which—God be praised!—I feel no inclination in myself. Your magnetism and, what is more, your breasts, which you abandoned to my eyes and my hands expecting that they would convince me I was mistaken, instead of doing so gave me an invincible impression which makes me still believe that you are a girl. Your build, your legs, your knees, your thighs, your hips, your buttocks are a perfect replica of the Anadyomene,[15] which I have seen a hundred times. If after all that it is true that you are simply a castrato, permit me to believe that, knowing you look exactly like a girl, you hatched the cruel scheme of making me fall in love and then driving me mad by refusing me the proof which alone can restore me to sanity. An excellent physician, you have learned in the most diabolical of schools that the one way to make it impossible for a young man to be cured of an amorous passion to which he has succumbed is to aggravate it; but, my dear Bellino, you must admit that you cannot practice this tyranny unless you hate the person upon whom it is to produce such an effect; and, that being the case, I should use what reason I have left to hate you in the same measure, whether you are a girl or a boy. You must also be aware that your obstinate refusal to give me the certainty which I ask of you forces me to despise you as a castrato. The importance you attribute to the matter is childish and malicious. If you have human feelings, you cannot persist in your refusal, which, as the logical consequence of my reasoning, reduces me to the painful necessity of doubt. Such being my state of mind, you must finally realize that I cannot but resolve to use force, for if you are my enemy I must treat you as such without further scruples.''

At the end of this too threatening harangue, to which he listened without once interrupting me, he answered only in the following few words:

''Consider that you are not my master, that I am in your hands on the strength of the promise which you sent me by Cecilia, and that you will be guilty of murder if you use force on me. Tell the postilion to stop; I will get out, and I will complain of your conduct to no one.''

After this short answer, he melted into tears which reduced my poor soul to utter desolation. I almost believed that I was wrong—I say ''almost,'' for if I had been sure of it I would have begged him to forgive me. I was unwilling to set myself up as the judge of my own cause. I withdrew into the bleakest possible silence, and found the strength of mind not to speak another word until halfway through the third post, which ended at Sinigaglia, where I intended to sup and spend the night.

Before we reached there, things had to be settled. I thought there was still hope that I could make him see reason.

"We could," I said, "have parted at Rimini good friends, and that would have been the case if you had felt any friendship for me. At the price of a compliance which would have led to nothing, you could have cured me of my passion."

"It would not have cured you," answered Bellino, firmly, but with a sweetness which surprised me, "for you are in love with me whether I am a girl or a boy, and when you found that I am a boy, you would have continued to love me, and my refusals would have made you even more furious. Finding me still inexorably determined, you would have run into excesses which would later have made you shed useless tears."

"So you say, and think you are proving that your obstinacy is reasonable; but I have every right to contradict you. Convince me, and you will find me a good and loyal friend."

"You will be furious, I tell you."

"What has infuriated me is the way you deliberately displayed your charms, when, you must admit, you knew the effect they would have on me. You did not fear my amorous fury then; and do you expect me to believe that you fear it now, when all that I ask of you is to let me touch an object which cannot but fill me with disgust?"

"Ah! disgust! I am certain of the contrary. Here is my reasoning, and let it be the end of the matter. If I were a girl, I could not help loving you, and I know it. But since I am a boy, my duty is not to comply in the least with what you demand, for your passion, which is now only natural, would at once become monstrous. Your ardent nature would become the enemy of your reason, and your reason itself would soon surrender, to the point of becoming the accomplice of your frenzy, thus seconding your nature. This inflammatory revelation which you desire, which you do not fear, which you demand of me, would leave you with no control over yourself. Your sight and your touch, seeking what they cannot find, would want to avenge themselves on what they found, and the most loathsome thing that can happen between men would happen between you and me. How can you, with your intelligence, cozen yourself into thinking that when you found me a man you would cease to love me? Do you believe that after your discovery what you call my charms, which you say have made you fall in love, would vanish? No, they might even grow more powerful, and then your ardor, become merely animal, would employ every means your amorous mind could conjure up to calm itself. You would manage to persuade yourself that you could change me into a woman, or, imagining that you could become a woman yourself, you would want me to treat you as such. Led astray by your passion, your reason would invent sophism after sophism. You would say that your love for me, a man, is more reasonable than it would be if I were a girl, for you would find the source of it in the purest friendship, and you would not fail to cite me examples of such anomalies. Led astray yourself by the specious brilliance of your arguments, you would become a torrent which no dam could hold back, and I should be at a loss for words to demolish your specious reasoning, and lack the strength to repulse your furious efforts. You would finally threaten me with death, if I denied you entrance to an inviolable temple, whose gate wise nature made to open only outward. It would be a loathsome profanation, which could not be accomplished without my consent, and you would find me ready to die before I would give it."

"Nothing of the sort would happen," I answered, rather shaken by his cogent reasoning, "and you exaggerate. Yet I feel obliged to tell you, if only as a matter of form, that even if all you say should happen, it seems to me there would be less harm in allowing nature an aberration of this kind, which philosophy may well consider a mere folly without consequences, than to follow a course which will make an incurable disease of a sickness of the mind which reason would render only momentary.''

Thus does the poor philosopher reason when he undertakes to reason at moments when a tumultuous passion leads the divine faculties of his soul astray. To reason rightly one must be neither in love nor in anger; for those two passions reduce us to the level of animals; and unfortunately we are never so much inclined to reason as when we are agitated by one or the other of them.

Having reached Sinigaglia in comparative calm, and the night being dark, we stopped at the posthouse inn. After having our trunks untied and brought to a good room I ordered supper. As there was only one bed I asked Bellino in a perfectly calm voice if he wished to have a fire lighted for him in another room. He surprised me by gently answering that he had no objection to sleeping in my bed.

My reader can easily imagine the astonishment I felt at this answer, which I could never have expected and which I greatly needed to purge my mind of all the dark humor which was troubling it. I saw that I had come to the dénouement of the play, and I was afraid to congratulate myself, for I could not foresee if it would be pleasant or tragic. The one thing I was sure of was that in bed he would not escape me, even if he were insolent enough to refuse to undress. Satisfied that I would be victorious, I was determined to win a second victory by leaving him alone if I found he was a man, though I did not believe it. If I found him a girl, I had no doubt that I would be gratified by all the compliance which he ought to show, if only in reparation.

We sat down to supper; and in his words, his manner, the expression of his eyes, his smiles, he seemed to me to have become a different person.

Feeling relieved of a great burden, I got through supper more quickly than usual and we rose from the table. After sending for a night lamp, Bellino fastened the door, undressed, and got into bed. I had done the same without uttering a word. And so we were in bed together.

CHAPTER II

Bellino unmasks; his story. I am arrested. My involuntary flight. My return to Rimini and my arrival in Bologna.

I HAD scarcely got into the bed before I was overcome to see him moving toward me. I clasp him to me, I see that he is fired by the same transport. The exordium of our dialogue was a deluge of mingling kisses. His arms were first to slip down from my back to my loins. I stretch mine still lower, it is revelation enough that I am happy, I sense it, I feel it, I am convinced of it. I am right, I am vindicated, I cannot doubt it, I do not want to know how, I fear that if I speak I shall no longer be happy, or be happy as I would not wish to be, and I give myself, body and soul, to the joy which flooded my entire being and which I saw was shared. The excess of my bliss seizes all my senses with such force that it reaches the degree at which nature, drowning in the highest of all pleasures, is exhausted. For the space of a minute I remain motionless in the act of mentally contemplating and worshiping my own apotheosis.

Sight and touch, which I had thought would be the leading actors in this drama, play only secondary roles. My eyes ask no greater bliss than to remain fixed on the face of the being who held them spellbound, and my sense of touch, concentrated in my fingertips, fears to move elsewhere since it cannot imagine that it could find anything more. I should have accused nature of the most despicable cowardice if, without my permission, it had dared to leave the place of which I could feel I was in possession.

Scarcely two minutes had passed before, without breaking our eloquent silence, we set to work together to give each other fresh assurances of the reality of our mutual happiness—Bellino by assuring me of it every quarter of an hour by the sweetest moans; I by refusing to reach the end of my course again. I have all my life been dominated by the fear that my steed would flinch from beginning another race; and I never found this restraint painful, for the visible pleasure which I gave always made up four fifths of mine. For this reason nature must abhor old age, which can itself attain to pleasure, but can never give it. Youth shuns its presence, for youth's deadly enemy is age, sad, weak, deformed, hideous age, which drives it into lonely seclusion at last, and always too soon.

We finally broke off. We needed an interval. We were not exhausted; but our senses demanded that our minds be calm so that they could return to their proper seats.

Bellino, the first to break the silence, asked me if I had found him a good mistress.

"Mistress? Then you admit you are a woman? Tell me, tigress, if it is true that you loved me, how could you put off your happiness, and mine, for so long? But is it really true that you belong to the bewitching sex of which I believe I have found you to be?"

"You are the master now. Make certain."

"Yes. I need to convince myself. Good God! what has become of the monstrous clitoris I saw yesterday?"

After a complete conviction, which was followed by a long outpouring of gratitude, the fascinating creature told me her story as follows:

"My name is Teresa. The poor daughter of an employee at the Institute at Bologna,[1] I made the acquaintance of the celebrated castrato singer Salimbeni,[2] who lodged in our house. I was twelve years old and had a good voice. Salimbeni was handsome; I was delighted to find that I pleased him, and to have him praise me, and eager to learn music from him and to play the harpsichord. Within a year I had acquired a fairly good grounding and was able to accompany myself in an air, imitating the fioriture of the great master, whom the Elector of Saxony, the King of Poland,[3] had summoned to serve him. His reward was such as his affection made him demand of me; I did not feel ashamed to grant it to him, for I worshiped him. Men like yourself are certainly to be preferred to men like my first lover; but Salimbeni was an exception. His good looks, his intelligence, his manners, his talent, and the rare qualities of his heart and soul made him preferable to all the whole men I had known until that time. Modesty and discretion were his favorite virtues, and he was rich and generous. He could never have found a woman to resist him; but I never heard him boast of conquering any woman. In short, his mutilation made him a monster, as it could not but do, but a monster of adorable qualities. I know that when I gave myself to him he made me happy; but he did so much that I can only believe I made him happy too.

"Salimbeni had a protégé whom he was boarding in the house of a music teacher in Rimini, a boy of my own age whom his dying father had had castrated to preserve his voice, so that he could turn it to profit for the benefit of the numerous family he was leaving behind, by appearing on the stage. The boy was named Bellino and was the son of the good woman whose acquaintance you just made at Ancona and whom everyone believes to be my mother.

"A year after I first came to know this being so favored by Heaven, it was he himself who told me the unhappy news that he must leave me to go to Rome. I was in despair, even though he assured me that I would soon see him again. He left my father the charge and the means to continue the cultivation of my talent; but within a few days a malignant fever carried him off; and I was left an orphan. After that Salimbeni could no longer resist my tears. He decided to take me with him as far as Rimini and leave me to board with the same music teacher in whose house he was keeping the young castrato, the brother of Cecilia and Marina. We left Bologna at midnight. No one knew that he was taking me with him—which was easy enough, for I knew no one, and no one took any interest in me, except my dear Salimbeni.

"As soon as we reached Rimini he left me at the inn and himself went to see the music teacher and make all the necessary arrangements with him for me. But half an hour later he is back at the inn, lost in thought. Bellino had died the day before our arrival. Thinking of the grief his mother would feel when he wrote her the news, it occurs to him to take me back to Bologna under the name of the Bellino who had just died and put me to board with his mother, who, being poor, would find it to her advantage to keep the secret. 'I would give her,' he said, 'sufficient means to have you complete your musical studies, and four years from now I will bring you to Dresden, not as a girl but as a castrato. We will live there together, and no one can say anything against it. You will make me happy until I die. All that is necessary is to make everyone believe you are Bellino, which you will find easy enough, since no one knows you. Only Bellino's mother will know the truth. Her children will not suspect that you are not their brother, for they were infants when I sent him to Rimini. If you love me, you must renounce your sex and even forget it completely. You must now take the name of Bellino and leave with me at once for Bologna. Within two hours you will be dressed as a boy; all you need do is to keep anyone from knowing that you are a girl. You will sleep alone; you will keep out of sight when you dress; and when in a year or two your breasts begin to develop it will be of no consequence, for having too much bosom is a defect in which all we castrati share. In addition, before I leave you I will give you a little apparatus and teach you how to adjust it so well to the place which shows the difference of sex that the deceit will pass unnoticed if it ever happens that you have to undergo an examination. If you like my plan, you will enable me to live in Dresden with you without giving the Queen,[4] who is very devout, any occasion to object. Tell me if you consent.'

"He could be sure that I would. I could have no greater pleasure than to do whatever he wished. He had me dressed as a boy, he made me leave all my girls' clothes behind, and after ordering his servant to wait for him in Rimini, he took me to Bologna. We arrive there at nightfall, he leaves me at the inn, and goes at once to see Bellino's mother. He explains his plan to her, she assents to it, and it consoles her for the death of her son. He brings her back to the inn with him, she calls me her son, I address her as 'Mother'; Salimbeni goes off, telling us to wait. He comes back an hour later and takes from his pocket the apparatus which in case of necessity would make me pass as a man. You have seen it. It is a sort of long, soft gut, as thick as one's thumb, white and with a very smooth surface. I had to laugh to myself this morning when you called it a clitoris. It was attached to the center of an oval piece of very fine transparent hide, which was five or six inches long and two inches wide. When this is fixed with gum tragacanth to the place where sex can be distinguished, it obliterates the female organ. He dissolves the gum, tries the apparatus on me in the presence of my new mother, and I find that I have become like my dear lover. I should really have laughed if the imminent departure of the person I adored had not pierced my heart. I was left more dead than alive, with a presentiment that I should never see him again. People laugh at presentiments, and with good reason, for not everyone can hear the voice of his heart; but mine did not deceive me. Salimbeni died still a young man in the Tyrol last year,[5] with the resignation of a philosopher. I was left under the necessity of turning my talent to account. My mother thought it a good plan to continue passing me off as a man, for she hoped she could send me to Rome to sing. In the meanwhile she accepted an offer from the theater in Ancona, where she also put Petronio to dance as a girl.

"After Salimbeni, you are the only man in whose arms Teresa has truly sacrificed to perfect love; and you have but to ask and I will from this day on abandon the name of Bellino, which I loathe since Salimbeni's death and which is beginning to cause me difficulties for which I have no patience. I have appeared in only two theaters, and to be admitted to both of them I had to submit to the same degrading examination, for wherever I go people think I look so much like a girl that they will not believe I am a man until they have been convinced. Until now I have had to deal only with old priests, who were innocently satisfied with having seen, and then certified me to the bishop; but I have continually to defend myself against two kinds of people, who assail me to obtain illicit and loathsome favors. Those who, like you, fall in love with me and so cannot believe that I am a man, insist upon my showing them the truth; and that I cannot bring myself to do for fear they will want to convince themselves by touch as well; in such a case I am afraid not only that they will strip off my mask but that, becoming curious, they will want to use the apparatus to satisfy monstrous desires which may come to them. But the wretches who persecute me beyond endurance are those who declare their monstrous love to me as the castrato I pretend to be. I fear, my dear one, that I will stab one of them. Alas, my angel! Rescue me from my shame. Take me with you. I do not ask to become your wife, I will only be your loving mistress, as I would have been to Salimbeni; my heart is pure, I know that my nature is such that I can live faithfully with my lover. Do not forsake me. The affection you have inspired in me is true love; what Salimbeni inspired in me was the fondness of innocence. I believe I did not become truly a woman until I tasted the perfect pleasure of love in your arms."

Moved to tears, I wiped hers away and promised her in all sincerity that she should share my fate. Infinitely affected though I was by the extraordinary story she had told me, in which I could see nothing but truth, I yet could not convince myself that I had awakened a genuine love in her during my stay in Ancona. "How could you bear, if you loved me," I said, "to let me suffer so greatly and to give myself to your sisters?"

"Alas, my dear! Consider our great poverty, and how very hard it would have been for me to disclose myself. I loved you; but could I be sure that the liking you showed for me was not a passing fancy? When I saw you change so readily from Cecilia to Marina, I thought that you would treat me in the same way as soon as you had satisfied your desires. But I could no longer doubt of your fickle nature, and of the little importance you attached to the happiness of love, when I saw what you did with that Greek slave girl on the Turkish ship, without my presence troubling you in the least. It would have troubled you if you had loved me. I was afraid that you would scorn me afterward, and God alone knows how I suffered! You insulted me, my dear one, in a hundred different ways, but I pleaded your cause. I saw your anger and your determination to be revenged. Did you not threaten me today in the carriage? I confess that you frightened me; but do not go thinking that it was my fear which decided me to satisfy your desire. No, my dear—I had made up my mind to give myself to you as soon as you took me away from Ancona, even from the moment when I sent Cecilia to ask you if you would take me to Rimini."

"Break your engagement in Rimini, and let us go on. We will stay in Bologna only three days, you shall come to Venice with me and, dressed in the clothing of your real sex and under another name, I defy the impresario of the opera at Rimini to find you."

"I agree. Your will shall always be mine. Salimbeni is dead. I am my own mistress, and I give myself to you; you shall have my heart, and I hope that I shall be able to keep yours."

"Please let me see you once again with the strange device which Salimbeni gave you."

"At once."

She gets out of bed, pours water into a glass, opens her trunk, takes out her apparatus and her gums, dissolves them, and fits on the mask. I see something unbelievable. A charming girl, who looked it in every part of her body, and who, with this extraordinary attachment, seemed to me even more interesting, for the white pendant offered no obstruction to the well of her sex. I told her that she had been wise not to let me touch it, for it would have intoxicated me and made me become what I was not, unless she had instantly calmed me by revealing the truth. I wanted to convince her that I was not lying, and our skirmish was comical. We fell asleep afterwards and did not wake until very late.

Struck by all that I had heard from the girl's lips, by her beauty, her talent, the innocence of her soul, her feelings, and her misfortunes, the most cruel of which was certainly the false role she had been obliged to play, for it exposed her to humiliation and infamy, I determined to make her the partner of my fate, or myself the partner of hers, for we were very nearly in the same situation.

Thinking further, I saw that now that I was resolved to make her mine, and to give myself to her, I ought to set the seal of marriage on our union. According to the notions I then held, this should only increase our affection, our mutual esteem, and that of society at large, which could never have considered our union legitimate or accept it as such unless it was validated by the civil law. Her talent assured me that we should never lack the necessaries of life, nor was I without hope of mine, though I did not know either in what direction or how I was to turn it to advantage. Our mutual love would have been not only impaired but reduced to nothing if the idea of living at her expense could have humiliated me, or if she could have grown proud, begun to domineer over me, and changed the nature of her feeling because, instead of seeing me as her benefactor, she had come to regard herself as my benefactress. If Teresa had a soul capable of such baseness, she deserved my utmost contempt. This I must know, I must sound her out, I must submit her to a test which would reveal her soul to me completely. With this idea in mind, I addressed her as follows:

"My dear Teresa, all that you have told me makes me sure that you love me, and your own certainty that you have become the mistress of my heart has made me so completely in love with you that I feel ready to do anything to convince you that you have not made a mistake. I must show you that I am worthy of a trust of which I know none higher, by treating you with a sincerity equal to your own. Our hearts, that is, must be placed in exactly the same position toward each other. I know you now, but you do not know me. You tell me it is all the same to you, and your trustfulness is proof of the most perfect love; but it sets me too far below you at the very moment when you believe you have made yourself even more adorable by setting me above you. You ask to know nothing, you ask only to be mine, you aspire to nothing but to possess my heart. It is noble, my beautiful Teresa, but it humiliates me. You have confided your secrets to me, I must confide mine to you. Promise me that when you have learned all, you will tell me sincerely if anything has changed in your soul."

"I swear it. I will hide nothing from you; but do not be so cruel as to tell me things that are not true. I warn you that they will accomplish nothing if you expect them to show you that I am less worthy of your love, but they will lower you a little in my soul. I should not want to find you capable of trickery. Trust in me as I trust in you. Tell me the plain truth."

"Here it is. You assume that I am rich; I am not. I shall have nothing once I have emptied my purse. You perhaps suppose that I am a man of high birth, and I am of a rank either lower than your own or equal to it. I have no talent which can earn money, no employment, no reason to be sure that I shall have anything to eat a few months hence. I have neither relatives nor friends nor rightful claims nor any settled plan. In short, all that I have is youth, health, courage, a modicum of intelligence, a sense of honor and of decency, with a little reading and the bare beginnings of a career in literature. My great treasure is that I am my own master, that I am not dependent upon anyone, and that I am not afraid of misfortunes. My nature tends toward extravagance. Such is the man I am. Now answer me, my beautiful Teresa."

"To begin with, I want you to know that I am sure that all you have told me is pure truth, and that nothing in your account surprised me except the noble courage with which you gave it to me. Know, too, that there were times in Ancona when I thought you were such as you have just described yourself to be, and that far from being frightened off, I hoped that I was not mistaken, for if I was not I had better reason to hope I might win you. But to be brief. Since it is true that you are poor, that you have nothing to rely on, and that you are even no good at economizing, permit me to tell you that all this makes me very glad, for if you love me you naturally cannot scorn the present I am about to give you. The present is the person you love. I give myself to you; I am yours; I will take care of you. Hereafter think of nothing but loving me; but it must be me alone. From this moment I am Bellino no longer. Let us go to Venice, and my talent will earn our living; and if you do not want to go to Venice, let us go wherever you please."

"I must go to Constantinople."

"Let us go there. If you are afraid you will lose me because I will be inconstant, marry me and then your right over me will be legal. I do not say that I will love you better as my husband; but it will please me to bear the flattering title of your wife, and we will laugh at it."

"Very well. Day after tomorrow at the latest, I will marry you in Bologna; for I want to make you mine by every possible tie."

"Now I am happy. We have nothing to do here in Rimini. We will leave tomorrow morning. There is no use in our getting up. Let us eat in bed, and then make love."

"An excellent idea."

After spending a second night in pleasure and content, we set off at dawn; and after traveling for four hours we thought it time to eat breakfast. We were at Pesaro.[6] Just as we were entering the carriage again to continue our journey, up comes a noncommissioned officer with two fusiliers and asks our names and then for our passports. Bellino hands him hers; I look for mine and cannot find it. I had put it with my letters from the Cardinal and the Cavaliere da Lezze; I find the letters and cannot find the passport; all my searching is in vain. The corporal makes off, after ordering the postilion to wait. A half hour later he comes back and hands Bellino his passport, telling him that he is free to leave; but as for me, he has been ordered to take me to the commandant. The commandant asks me why I have no passport.

"Because I have lost it."

"No one loses a passport."

"Indeed they do, and the proof is that I have lost mine."

"You cannot go farther."

"I came here from Rome, and I am on my way to Constantinople to deliver a letter from Cardinal Acquaviva. Here is his letter, sealed with his arms."

"I will have you taken to Signor de Gages."

I was led into the presence of the famous General, who was standing surrounded by his staff. After telling him what I had told the commandant, I asked him to let me continue my journey.

"The only favor I can do you is to hold you under arrest here until a new passport reaches you from Rome, in the same name under which you registered here. Only a fool loses a passport, and the Cardinal will learn not to entrust his errands to fools."

He then ordered that I be put under arrest at the principal guardpost, which was outside the city and was called the Santa Maria,[7] after I had written to Rome for a new passport. So I was taken back to the posthouse, where I wrote to the Cardinal telling him of my misfortune and begging him to send me the passport without delay, and sent my letter off by courier. I asked him to send the passport directly to the military secretariat. After that I embraced Bellino-Teresa, whom this untimely mishap had plunged in gloom. I told her to go to Rimini and wait for me there, and I made her accept a hundred zecchini.

She wanted to stay in Pesaro; but I would not let her. I had my trunk untied and, after watching her leave, I allowed myself to be taken to the guardpost. These are moments when every optimist doubts his theory; but a stoicism which it is not difficult to assume has the power to blunt their influence for evil. What distressed me greatly was the anguish of Teresa, who, seeing me thus torn from her arms in the first moment of our union, almost choked with trying to hold back her tears. She would not have left me if I had not convinced her she would see me again at Rimini within ten days. She was also well aware that she should not remain at Pesaro.

At Santa Maria the officer put me in the guardhouse, where I sat down on my trunk. He was an accursed Catalan, who did not even honor me with an answer when I told him that I had money, that I wanted a bed and a servant to attend to all my wants. I had to spend the night on a heap of straw, among Catalan soldiers, and without having eaten anything. It was the second night I spent in this fashion after delicious ones. My Genius diverted himself by treating me in this fashion in order to give me the pleasure of making comparisons. It is a harsh school; but its effect is certain, especially on men who have something of the stockfish[8] in their nature.

To close the lips of a philosopher who presumes to tell you that in the life of men the sum of pains is greater than the sum of pleasures, ask him if he would want a life in which there was neither pain nor pleasure. He will not answer you, or he will tergiversate; for if he says he would not, he likes life, and if he likes it, he admits that it is pleasant, which it could not be if it were painful; and if he says he would, he proves himself a fool, for then he must conceive of pleasure as indifference.

When we suffer, we gain the pleasure of hoping for the end of our suffering; and we are never wrong, for we have at least the resource of sleep, in which good dreams console and soothe us; and when we are happy, the thought that our happiness will be followed by misery never comes to trouble us. Pleasure, then, when it is present, is always pure; pain is always tempered.

You are twenty years old. The regent of the universe comes to you and says: "I give you thirty years of life; fifteen of them will be painful and fifteen delicious. Each fifteen will be consecutive. Choose. Do you wish to begin with the painful years or with the delicious years?"

Admit, reader, whoever you may be, that you would answer: "God in Heaven, I will begin with the fifteen unhappy years. In the certain expectation of the fifteen delicious years, I am sure that I shall have the strength to make light of my sufferings."

You see, my dear reader, the conclusion which follows from these considerations. Believe me, the wise man can never be wholly unhappy. Indeed he is always happy, says my master Horace, nisi quum pituita molesta est ("except when phlegm troubles him").[9]

But what man always has catarrh?

The fact is that during that accursed night at Santa Maria in Pesaro, I lost little and gained much, for, so far as Teresa was concerned, since I was sure I should be with her again in ten days, it meant nothing. What I gained was some schooling in the life of man. I gained a system against stupidity. Foresight. It is a hundred to one that a young man who has lost his purse on one occasion and his passport on another will never lose either again. And in fact neither of these misfortunes ever again befell me. They would have befallen me if I had not always been afraid that they would befall me. A fool is never afraid.

When the guard was changed the next morning, I was turned over to a pleasant-looking officer. He was French. I have always liked Frenchmen, even as I have an aversion to Spaniards. Yet I have often been gulled by Frenchmen, never by Spaniards. We should not trust our likes and dislikes.

"By what chance, Signor Abate," the officer asked me, "have I the honor to have you in my custody?"

Such language allays apprehension at once. I tell him the whole story and after hearing it to the end, he says it is very "amusing." I really found nothing "amusing" in my wretched adventure; but a man who found it "amusing" was one whom I could not dislike. He immediately put a soldier at my service who, for a price, found me a bed, chairs, a table, and everything I needed. The officer ordered my bed put in his own room.

After dinner, to which he invited me, he suggested a game of piquet,[10] and by evening I had lost three or four ducati; but he warned me that my skill was not equal to his, and still less to that of the officer who would take over guard duty the next day. He therefore advised me not to play with him, and I followed his advice. He also told me that he was having guests for supper, and that there would be a bank at faro;[11] he added that the banker would be a man against whom I ought not to play. He said he was a "Greek."[12] The players arrived, the play went on all night, the punters lost and berated the banker, who let them talk and pocketed the money, after giving his share to my friend the officer, who had put money in the bank. The banker was called Don Bepe il cadetto;[13] recognizing from his speech that he was a Neapolitan, I asked the officer why he had told me he was a "Greek." He thereupon explained the meaning of the word to me, and the lesson he read me on the subject proved useful to me afterwards.

For the next five or six days nothing happened to me. On the sixth, the same French officer who had treated me so well reappeared. When he saw me he said that he was sincerely glad to find me still there; I accepted the compliment for what it was worth. Toward evening the same players arrived; and the same Don Bepe, after winning, was treated to the epithet "sharper" and a blow from a cane, which he intrepidly pretended not to notice. Nine years later I saw him in Vienna, become a captain in the service of the Empress Maria Theresa under the name of Afflisio. Ten years after that I found him a colonel; still later I found him a millionaire, and finally, thirteen or fourteen years ago, sentenced to the galleys. He was handsome but, oddly enough, despite his good features he had the look of a gallows bird. I have seen others of the same cast of countenance—Cagliostro,[14] for example, and another man who has not yet been sent to the galleys but who will certainly not escape it, for nolentem trahit ("he who is unwilling is dragged").[15] If my reader is curious, I will whisper the rest into his ear.

In nine or ten days, during which I waited for my passport, which must arrive soon, the whole army came to know me and like me. I went walking even out of sight of the sentinel; no one had any fear that I would try to escape, and rightly, for I should have been a fool to think of it; but now comes one of the strangest things that has happened to me in all my life.

Walking at six o'clock in the morning a hundred paces from the guardhouse, I see an officer dismount from his horse, drop the reins on its neck, and go off somewhere. Meditating on how quietly the horse was standing there, like a trusty servant his master had told to wait for him, I approach and, for no particular reason, I pick up the reins, put my foot in the stirrup, and mount. It was the first time in my life I had ever been on the back of a horse. I do not know if I touched it with my cane or with my heels; the horse starts off like a thunderbolt, and at full gallop, when it feels my heels, with which I was pressing against it only to keep from falling off, my right foot even being out of the stirrup. The sentry at the last advanced post orders me to halt; it was an order which I was incapable of obeying. The horse keeps on. I hear musketshots, which miss me. At the first advanced post of the Austrians, my horse is stopped, and I thank God that I can dismount. The officer of hussars asks me where I am going in such a hurry, and without thinking, I answer that I cannot tell anyone except Prince Lobkowitz,[16] who was in command of the army and was at Rimini. The officer thereupon orders two hussars to mount their horses, and after mounting me on another, they take me at full gallop to Rimini and present me to the officer at the principal guardpost, who at once has me taken to the Prince.

He was alone, I tell him the unvarnished truth, at which he laughs and says that my story is none too plausible. He says that he ought to put me under arrest, but that he was willing to spare me that vexation. He summons an adjutant and orders him to accompany me outside the Porta Cesena. Then, turning to me, he says in the officer's presence that from there I could go wherever I pleased; but he tells me to take good care not to come back into his army again without a passport, for he would give me a bad time. I ask him if I may have back my horse. He answers that the horse does not belong to me.

I was sorry I had not asked him to send me back to the Spanish army.

The officer who was to take me out of the city asked me, as we passed a coffeehouse, if I would like to drink a cup of chocolate, and we went in. I see Petronio and, when the officer is speaking to someone, I tell him to pretend not to know me and at the same time ask him where he was lodging, which he tells me. When we have drunk our chocolate, the officer pays, we set off, and as we ride along he tells me his name, I tell him mine, and the story of the strange chance which accounted for my being in Rimini. He asks me if I had stopped a few days in Ancona, I answer yes, and I see him smile. He tells me that I can obtain a passport in Bologna, return to Rimini and Pesaro without any fear, and recover my trunk by paying the value of the horse to the officer from whom

I had taken it. So conversing, we arrived outside the gate, and he wished me a good journey.

I am free again, with money and jewels, but without my trunk. Teresa was in Rimini, and I was forbidden to return there. I decide to hurry on to Bologna, obtain a passport, and return to the Spanish army, where I was sure that the passport from Rome would come. I could not bring myself either to abandon my trunk or to do without Teresa until the end of her engagement with the impresario of the opera at Rimini.

It was raining; I had on silk stockings, I needed a carriage. I stop under the door of a chapel to wait for the rain to end. I turn my handsome redingote inside out so as not to be recognized as an abate. I ask a peasant if he had a conveyance to take me to Cesena, and he answers that he has one half an hour's walk away. I tell him to go and fetch it, assuring him that I would wait; but then this befell me. Some forty loaded mules pass by, on their way to Rimini. It was still raining. I approach one of the mules, put my hand on its neck, really with no particular intention, and slowly keeping pace with the mule, I re-enter the city of Rimini, and since I appear to be a muleteer no one says a word to me; even the muleteers themselves may not have noticed me. In Rimini I gave two baiocchi to the first urchin I saw to show me the way to the house where Teresa was lodging. With my hair under a nightcap, my hat brim pulled down, my fine cane hidden under my reversed redingote, I looked like a nobody. As soon as I was safely in the house, I asked a maid where Bellino's mother was to be found; she takes me to her room, and I see Bellino, but dressed as a girl. She was there with the whole family. Petronio had forewarned them. After telling them the whole brief story, I made them understand the necessity for secrecy, and they each swore that no one should learn from him that I was there; but Teresa was in despair to find me in such great danger, and despite her love and her joy at seeing me again she reproves me for what I have done. She says that I absolutely must find a way to leave for Bologna and come back with a passport, as Signor Weiss[17] had advised me to do. She said that she knew him, that he was a very decent sort, and that he came to visit her every evening, and that consequently I must hide. We had time to think about it. It was only eight o'clock. I promised her that I would leave, and calmed her by telling her that I would find a way to do it without being seen by anyone. Meanwhile Petronio went to find out if any muleteers were leaving. It would be easy for me to go as I had come.

When Teresa had taken me to her room she told me that even before entering Rimini she had met the opera impresario, who immediately took her to the apartment she was to occupy with her family. Being alone with him there, she had told him that, as she was really a girl, she no longer wished to appear as a castrato, and that he would thenceforth see her only in the dress of her sex. The impresario had congratulated her. Rimini belonged to a different legateship,[18] where it was not forbidden, as it was in Ancona, for women to appear on the stage. She ended by saying that, as she was only engaged for twenty performances, to begin after Easter, she would be free at the beginning of May and so, if I could not stay in Rimini, she would come and join me wherever I wished at the end of her engagement. I answered that as soon as I had obtained a passport and so would have nothing to fear in Rimini, nothing would prevent me from spending the six weeks there with her. Knowing that Baron Weiss visited her, I asked her if it was she who had told him that I had spent three days in Ancona, and she said that she had and had even told him that I had been arrested for not having a passport. I then understood why he had smiled.

After this necessary conversation, I received the compliments of the mother and of my little wives, whom I thought less gay and less unreserved because they felt certain that Bellino, who was no longer a castrato or their brother, must have pre-empted me in the character of Teresa. They were not mistaken, and I was careful not to give them even a single kiss. I listened patiently to all the mother's lamentations, who insisted that by admitting that she was a girl Teresa had thrown away her hope of fortune, since she would have had a thousand zecchini for the coming Carnival at Rome. I said that she would have been unmasked at Rome and put in some wretched convent for the rest of her life.

Despite my state of agitation and the dangerous situation I was in, I spent the whole day alone with my dear Teresa, with whom I felt I was more in love every minute. She freed herself from my arms at eight o'clock in the evening, having heard someone arrive, and left me in the dark. I saw Baron Weiss come in and Teresa give him her hand to kiss in the style of a princess. The first news he gave her was mine; she pretended to be glad, and listened with apparent indifference when he told her he had advised me to come back to Rimini with a passport. He spent an hour with her, and I thought her adorable in everything she did, for she maintained a behavior which could not possibly kindle the least spark of jealousy in my soul. It was Marina who lit him downstairs about ten o'clock, and Teresa at once returned to my arms. We had a pleasant supper and were about to go to bed, when Petronio told us that six muleteers were leaving for Cesena with thirty mules two hours before dawn, and that he was sure if I went to the stable only a quarter of an hour before they left and drank with them, I could easily leave in their company without even trying to keep them in the dark. I felt sure he was right and instantly resolved to follow his advice, and he promised to wake me at two in the morning. He did not have to wake me. I dressed quickly and set off with Petronio, leaving my dear Teresa sure that I adored her and would be faithful to her, but uneasy about my getting away from Rimini. She wanted to give me back the sixty zecchini she had left. I kissed her and asked her what she would think of me if I took them.

When I told a muleteer, with whom I drank, that I wanted to ride one of his mules as far as Savignano, he replied that I was at liberty to do so, but that it would be best if I did not mount until I was outside of the city and had gone through the gate on foot, as if I were one of them.

This was just what I wanted. Petronio went with me as far as the gate, where I gave him a handsome token of my gratitude. My departure from Rimini went off as well as my entrance. I left the muleteers at Savignano, where, after sleeping for four hours, I took the post to Bologna and put up at a wretched inn.

In that city it took me only a day to discover that I could not possibly obtain a passport. I was told that I did not need one, and rightly; but I knew that I did need one. I decided to write to the French officer who had treated me so courteously on the second day I was under arrest, asking him to inquire at the military secretariat if my passport had arrived and, if it had, to send it to me and, meanwhile, to find out who was the owner of the horse I had absconded with, for I thought it only right that I should pay him for it. In any case, I resolved to wait for Teresa in Bologna, and I informed her of my decision the same day, begging her never to leave me without letters from her.

What I decided to do the same day after posting these two letters, the reader will see.

CHAPTER III

I lay aside my clerical garb and put on a uniform. Teresa leaves for Naples, and I go to Venice, where I enter my country's service. I sail for Corfu and go ashore at Orsara to take a walk.

AT Bologna, to escape observation, I put up at an inn which no one frequented. After writing my letters and resolving to wait for Teresa there, I bought some shirts and, being far from certain that my trunk would be returned, I considered getting some clothes. Reflecting that there was now little likelihood of my achieving fortune in my ecclesiastical career, I decided to dress as a soldier in a uniform of my own invention, since I was certain that I would not be called upon to explain my business to anyone. Coming from two armies in which I had seen no dress but a soldier's respected, I wished to inspire the same respect. Then, too, I was very well pleased with the idea of returning to my country under the ensign of honor, where I had been not a little ill-treated under that of religion.

I inquire for a good tailor; I am sent one named Morte.[1] I explain to him of what cut and what colors I want my uniform made, he takes my measurements, he gives me samples of cloth, I choose, and no later than the next morning he brings me everything I need to impersonate a follower of Mars. I bought a long sword, and with my handsome cane in hand, a trim hat with a black cockade, with my hair cut in side whiskers and a long false pigtail, I set forth to impress the whole city. I at once took lodging at the Albergo al Pellegrino.[2] I have never had a pleasure in this kind equal to that which I felt when I saw myself in a mirror dressed as I now was. I decided I had been born to be a soldier, I thought I was astonishing. Certain that no one would recognize me, I relished the stories which would be invented about me when I made my appearance at the most frequented coffeehouse in the city.

My uniform was white, with a blue vest, a shoulder knot of silver and gold, and a sword knot to match. Very well pleased with my appearance, I go to the principal coffeehouse, where I take chocolate and try to read the gazette, but my thoughts were elsewhere. I was delighted to find myself the center of attention, though I pretended to be unaware of it. I aroused such curiosity that everyone was whispering into his neighbor's ear. One brazen fellow, hoping to draw me into conversation, ventured to speak to me; but my monosyllabic answer discouraged even the most hardened questioners in the coffeehouse. After strolling for a considerable time under the finest of the arcades,[3] I went to my inn and dined alone.

When I had finished, the innkeeper came up with a book to register my name.

"Casanova."

"Your profession?"

"Officer."

"In what service?"

"None."

"Your country?"

"Venice."

"Where have you come from?"

"That is none of your business."

I am well satisfied with my answers. I see that the innkeeper has come to ask me all these questions only at the instigation of some busybody, for I knew that Bologna was a city in which people lived in perfect freedom.

The next morning I went to the banker Orsi to draw money on my bill of exchange. I took a hundred zecchini and a bill for six hundred on Venice. Then I went for a walk on La Montagnola.[4] Two days later, just as I was drinking coffee after dinner, a servant announces the banker Orsi. Surprised that he should call on me, I have him shown in, and I see that he is accompanied by Monsignor Cornaro,[5] whom I pretend not to know. After saying that he has come to offer me money on my drafts, he introduces the prelate to me. I rise, saying that I am delighted to make his acquaintance. He tells me that we had already met in Venice and in Rome; with an injured air, I answer that he was certainly mistaken. The prelate looks grave and, instead of persisting, begs my pardon, the more so since he thought he knew the reason for my reserve. After taking coffee he leaves, inviting me to come and breakfast with him the following morning.

Firmly resolved to continue denying my identity, I went. I did not want to admit that I was the person whom Monsignor Cornaro knew, because of the bogus officer's rank I had bestowed on myself. Unschooled in imposture as I was, I did not know that in Bologna I had nothing to fear.

The prelate, who at that time was only an apostolic protonotary, said, as he drank chocolate with me, that I might have very good reasons for my reserve, but that I was mistaken in not trusting him, since the affair in question did me honor. Upon my answering that I did not know to what affair he was referring, he asked me to read an article in the gazette published in Pesaro, which he had before him: "Signor Casanova, an officer in the Queen's Regiment, has deserted after killing his captain in a duel. The circumstances of the duel are not known; it is only known that the aforesaid officer took the road to Rimini, riding the horse of the other officer, who was left dead on the field."

Greatly surprised at this farrago, in which falsehood was mixed with a very small proportion of truth, I managed to keep a straight face and said that the Casanova of the article must be another man of the same name.

"Possibly, but you are certainly the Casanova I met a month ago at Cardinal Acquaviva's and two years ago in Venice at the house of my sister Signora Loredan. Furthermore, Bucchetti of Ancona gives you the title of abate in his bill of exchange on Orsi."

"Very well, Monsignore. Your Excellency forces me to admit it; I am he; but I beg you not to ask any of the further questions you have in mind. Honor compels me to observe the strictest silence."

"You have said enough and I am satisfied."

"Let us talk of something else."

After a little polite conversation, I thanked him for all his offers and left. I did not see him again until sixteen years later. I will give my reader an account of that meeting when we get there.

Laughing to myself over all unfounded stories and over the combinations of circumstances which give them a semblance of veracity, from that time on I became a great Pyrrhonist[6] in respect to historical truths. It gave me the greatest pleasure to see that my very reserve was encouraging the Abate Cornaro in his belief that I was the Casanova who was mentioned by the Pesaro gazette. I felt sure that he would write to Venice, where the incident would do me honor, at least until people learned the truth, which would then justify my denial. For this reason I resolved to go there as soon as I had received a letter from Teresa. I thought I would have her come to Venice, since I could wait for her much more comfortably there than in Bologna, and in my own country there could be nothing to prevent me from marrying her openly. Meanwhile, the fallacious tale amused me. I expected every day to see it cleared up in the gazette. The officer Casanova must be laughing over the horse the gazette writer in Pesaro had sent him off on, just as I was laughing over the whim which had taken me to dress as an officer in Bologna and which had laid the foundation for the whole story.

On the fourth day of my stay in Bologna, an express messenger handed me a thick letter from Teresa. The letter contained two enclosures. She told me that the day after I left Rimini, Baron Weiss had brought the Duke of Castropiñano[7] to see her and that, after hearing her sing to her own accompaniment on the harpsichord, he had offered her a thousand once and her traveling expenses to sing at the Teatro San Carlo[8] for a year. She must be there in May. She was sending me a copy of the contract he had drawn up for her. She had asked him to give her a week to consider it, and he had agreed. She only awaited my answer to her letter before either signing the Duke's contract or refusing his offer.

The second enclosure was a document in her own hand in which she undertook to serve me as long as she lived. She told me that if I wanted to go to Naples with her, she would meet me at whatever place I would designate, and that if I felt any aversion to going back to Naples, I must disregard her piece of good fortune and be certain that she could conceive of no good fortune and no happiness except doing all that she could to make me content and happy.

Her letter having made it necessary for me to reflect, I told the messenger to come back the next day. I was in a state of the greatest irresolution. It was the first time in my life that I found myself unable to make up my mind. Two equally strong motives in the scales kept them from inclining in one direction or the other. I could neither command Teresa to reject such good fortune, nor let her go to Naples without me, nor bring myself to go to Naples with her. The mere thought that my love could stand in the way of Teresa's prospects of fortune made me shudder; and what prevented me from going to Naples with her was my self-esteem, which was even stronger than the fire with which I burned for her. How could I bring myself to go back to Naples seven or eight months after I had left it, and appear there without any position in the world but that of a dastard living at the expense of his wife or his mistress? What would my cousin Don Antonio have said, and Don Gennaro Palo and his son, and Don Lelio Caraffa, and all my acquaintances among the nobility? The thought of Donna Lucrezia and her husband made me shudder too. If I went there and found everyone despising me, would the love which I would feel for Teresa keep me from being unhappy? Sharing her destiny, whether as husband or lover, I should find myself degraded, humiliated, and condemned to servility both by my position and as my only possible profession. The reflection that now, at the fairest time of my youth, I was about to renounce all hope of the high fortune for which I considered that I was born gave the scales such a push that my reason silenced my heart. I decided on a course which would gain me time. I wrote to Teresa to go to Naples and to be sure that I would join her there either in July or when I returned from Constantinople. I advised her to take a respectable-looking chambermaid with her, so that she could appear with decency in the great city of Naples, and to conduct herself in such a way that I could marry her without blushing. I foresaw that Teresa's fortune would owe even more to her beauty than to her talent, and knowing myself as I did, I knew that neither as a lover nor as a husband could I brook even the semblance of a rival.

My love yielded to my reason; but my love would not have been so accommodating a week earlier. I wrote to her to answer me at Bologna by the same express messenger, and three days later I received her last letter, in which she told me that she had signed the contract, that she had engaged a chambermaid who could pass as her mother, that she would leave in the middle of May, and that she would wait for me until the time came when I wrote her that I no longer thought of her. On the fourth day after receiving her letter I set off for Venice; but first for what happened to me before I left.

The French officer to whom I had written about retrieving my trunk, offering to pay him for the horse I had absconded with, or which had absconded with me, wrote me that my passport had arrived and was at the war chancellery and that he could easily send it to me with my trunk if I would go to the trouble of paying fifty doblones[9] in compensation for the horse I had taken to Don Marcello Birac, business agent for the Spanish army, who lived at an address which he gave me. He said that he had written, explaining the whole matter, to the said Birac, who, upon receiving the money, would give me a written undertaking to have my trunk and my passport delivered to me.

Delighted that all was well in this respect, I lost not a moment in repairing to the business agent, who lived with a Venetian I knew named Batagia. I paid over the money, and received my trunk and my passport on the morning of the day I left Bologna. Everyone in Bologna heard that I had paid for the horse, which made the Abate Cornaro still more certain that I was the Casanova who had killed his captain in a duel.

To get to Venice, I had to go through being quarantined, which I was determined not to do. The quarantine was still enforced because the two governments[10] concerned were at odds. The Venetians insisted that the Pope be the first to open his frontiers to travelers, and the Pope maintained the contrary. The matter was not yet settled, and commerce suffered from it. Here is how I went about it, without fear for the result, though it was a delicate undertaking, for Venice was particularly strict in matters of health; but in those days one of my greatest pleasures was to do anything which was forbidden or at any rate difficult.

As I knew that passage was free from the State of Mantua to the State of Venice, and from the State of Modena to that of Mantua, I saw that if I could enter the State of Mantua under color of coming from Modena, all would be accomplished. I would cross the Po somewhere, and go straight to Venice. So I hired a vetturino to take me to Revere. This is a city on the Po, belonging to the State of Mantua. The vetturino told me that he could take byroads to Revere and say that he had come from Modena; but that we would be in difficulties when we were asked for a health certificate made out at Modena. I told him to say that he had lost it and to leave the rest to me. My money persuaded him.

At the Revere gate, I said that I was an officer of the Spanish army on my way to Venice to discuss a matter of great importance with the Duke of Modena, who was there at the time.

Not only was the vetturino not asked to produce the health certificate from Modena, but in addition to being accorded military honors I was treated with great politeness. No difficulty was made over giving me a certificate of departure from Revere, with which, after crossing the Po at Ostiglia, I went on to Legnago, where I left my vetturino handsomely paid and thoroughly satisfied. At Legnago I took post horses, and arrived that evening at Venice, putting up at an inn in the Rialto[11] quarter on April 12, 1744, my birthday, which in the course of my life has on ten different occasions been remarkable for some unusual event. The next day at noon I went to the Exchange, intending to engage passage on a vessel and leave for Constantinople at once; but since I found none intending to sail for two or three months, I took a room on a Venetian ship of the line which was to sail for Corfu in the course of the month. The vessel was named Our Lady of the Rosary, and was commanded by Captain Zane.[12]

Having thus obeyed my destiny, which according to my superstitious fancy was summoning me to Constantinople, where I felt that I had irretrievably engaged myself to go, I set out toward the Piazza San Marco, very curious to see and to be seen by all my acquaintances, who could not but be surprised to see me no longer dressed as an abate. From Revere on, I had worn a red cockade[13] on my hat.

My first visit was to the Abate Grimani, who loudly exclaimed when he saw me. He sees me in a military uniform when he has every reason to think I am with Cardinal Acquaviva and on the road to political office. He was just getting up from dinner and had a number of visitors. Among them I notice an officer in Spanish uniform; but I do not let that daunt me. I tell the Abate Grimani that as I am passing through Venice, I am delighted that it gives me the opportunity to pay him my respects.

"I did not expect to see you in this attire."

"I came to the wise decision of abandoning that of the Church, wearing which I could not hope for a destiny capable of satisfying me."

"Where are you going?"

"To Constantinople, to which I hope to find a quick passage from Corfu. I am on a mission from Cardinal Acquaviva."

"Where have you come from now?"

"From the Spanish army, which I left ten days ago."

At these words I hear the voice of a young nobleman saying, with a look in my direction, "That is not true." I answer him that my profession does not permit me to stomach the lie direct, and, so saying, I bow all around and leave, paying no attention to anyone who told me to stop.

Since I had on a uniform, I considered that I should also have all the pride and touchiness which go with it. As I was no longer a priest, I must not pass over being given the lie. I go to call on Signora Manzoni, whom I was most anxious to see, and her reception of me is all that I could wish. She reminds me of her predictions and plumes herself on their accuracy. She insists on my telling her all that has happened to me, I oblige, and she smiles and says that if I am going to Constantinople it is more than likely that she will never see me again.

On leaving her house, I go to Signora Orio's. It was there that I enjoyed the surprise which greeted my appearance. She, the old advocate Rosa, and Nanetta and Marta were as if turned to stone. I thought the two girls had grown prettier in the last nine months, of which they vainly asked me to give them an account. The story of those nine months was not of a nature to please Signora Orio and her nieces; it would have lowered me in the estimation of those innocent souls; even so, I gave them three delicious hours. Seeing that the old lady was in raptures, I told her that she had only to say the word and she could keep me for all of the four or five weeks I had to wait for my ship to sail, by giving me a room and supper, but on condition that I should be no trouble to her. She answered that she would be happy if only she had a room, and Rosa told her that she had one and that he would undertake to get it furnished within two hours. It was the room next to the one occupied by her nieces. Nanetta said that in that case she would move downstairs with her sister and they would sleep in the kitchen; and

I immediately said that, not wanting to cause them any inconvenience, I would remain at the inn where I was. Signora Orio at once told her nieces that there was no need for them to move downstairs, since they could fasten their door.

"They would not need to, Signora," I said gravely.

"I know that; but they are prudes with a high opinion of themselves."

I then made her accept fifteen zecchini, assuring her that I was rich and that it was an advantageous arrangement for me even so, for a month at the inn would cost me more. I said that I would send her my trunk and would come the next day to take supper and spend the night. I saw joy on the faces of my two little wives, who regained their empire over my heart despite the image of Teresa which was before the eyes of my soul at every moment.

The next morning, after sending my trunk to Signora Orio's, I went to the War Office; but to avoid any difficulties I went without a cockade. Major Pelodoro flung himself on my neck when he saw me in uniform. As soon as I told him that I had to go to Constantinople and that, despite the uniform he saw me wearing, I was at liberty, he said that it would be a great advantage to me to go to Constantinople with the Bailo,[14] who was to set off in two months at the latest, and that I should try to arrange it and even try to enter the Venetian service.

I thought it good advice. The Savio for War,[15] who was the same one who had made my acquaintance the year before, saw me there and called me over. He said he had received a letter from Bologna informing him of a duel which did me honor, and that he knew I refused to admit it. He asked if I had been given a discharge when I left the Spanish service, and I answered that I could not have a discharge since I had never served. He asked how I could be in Venice without having gone through quarantine, and I answered that travelers entering by way of the State of Mantua were not quarantined. He, too, advised me to enter the service of my country.

Leaving the Doges' Palace, I found the Abate Grimani under the Procuratie[16] and he told me that my abrupt departure from his house had displeased everyone present.

"Including the Spanish officer?"

"No. On the contrary, he says that if it is true you were with the Spanish army ten days ago, you were right to act as you did; what is more, he told me that you were with it and showed me a copy of a gazette which gives an account of a duel and says that you killed your captain. Surely this is sheer invention."

"Who told you it is sheer invention?"

"Then it is true?"

"I do not say that; but it could be true, as it is true that I was with the Spanish army ten days ago."

"That is impossible, unless you violated the contumacia." [17]

"There was no violation. I openly crossed the Po at Revere, and here I am. I regret that I can no longer call on Your Excellency unless the person who gave me the lie accords me proper satisfaction. I could stomach insults when I belonged to a calling which professes humility, but now I belong to one which professes honor."

"You are wrong to take this tone. The person who gave you the lie is Signor Valmarana, at present a Proveditor for Health,[18] who maintains that since all entries are closed, you cannot be here. Satisfaction! Have you forgotten who you are?"

"No. I know that last year I could let myself be thought a coward, but now I will give anyone who slights me cause to repent it."

"Come and dine with me."

"No, for the officer would hear of it."

"He would even see you, for he dines with me every day."

"Very well. I will let him judge my cause."

Dining with Pelodoro and three or four officers, who all told me that I ought to enter the Venetian service, I decided to do so. A young lieutenant, whose health prevented him from going to the Levant, wanted to sell his commission;[19] he asked a hundred zecchini for it; but, beyond that, it was necessary to obtain the approval of the Savio. I told Pelodoro that the hundred zecchini were ready, and he promised to speak to the Savio on my behalf.

Toward nightfall I went to Signora Orio's, where I found my quarters very comfortably furnished. After quite a good supper, I had the pleasure of seeing the aunt herself order her two nieces to make me at home in my room.

The first night they both slept with me, and on the following nights they took turns, removing a plank from the wall and thus leaving an aperture by which the mistress of the moment came and went. We did all this very carefully and had no fear of being caught. Our doors were fastened, so, if the aunt came to see her nieces, the one who was missing would have time to go back, replacing the plank; but no such visit was ever made. Signora Orio counted on our good behavior.

Two or three days later the Abate Grimani arranged an interview between me and Signor Valmarana at the Sultana coffeehouse; he told me that if he had known that the quarantine could be eluded he would never have said that what I had said was impossible, and that he thanked me for making the fact known to him; the matter was thus amicably settled, and I always dined at the Abate Grimani's until my departure.

Toward the end of the month I entered the service of the Republic as an ensign in the Bala[20] regiment, which was at Corfu. The officer who had left it in consequence of the hundred zecchini I had paid him was a lieutenant; but the Savio for War advanced arguments to which, if I wanted to enter the service, I was obliged to yield. He promised that at the end of the year I would be promoted to the rank of lieutenant, and that I would at once be granted the leave I needed to go to Constantinople. I accepted because I wanted to serve.

The person who obtained me the favor of traveling to Constantinople with the Cavaliere Venier, who was going there as Bailo, was Signor Pietro Vendramin, the illustrious Senator. He introduced me to the Cavaliere Venier,[21] who promised to take me with him from Corfu, which he would reach a month after I did.

Some days before I left I received a letter from Teresa, telling me that the Duke who had engaged her for Naples was taking her there in person. She said that he was old, but that even if he were young, I had nothing to fear. She said that if I needed money I should draw bills of exchange on her and be sure that she would pay them even if she had to sell everything she possessed.

Another passenger on the ship which would take me to Corfu was to be a Venetian nobleman who was going to Zante[22] as Councilor. He had a very large retinue, and the captain of the vessel, after warning me that if I had to eat by myself I would not eat any too well, advised me to obtain an introduction to the nobleman, and so assure myself of being invited to his table. His name was Antonio Dolfin,[23] but he was generally known by his byname of Bucintoro.[24] He had been given the name of that magnificent ship because of his manner and the elegance of his attire.

As soon as Signor Grimani learned that I had engaged a room on the same ship in which this nobleman was going to Zante, he did not wait for me to ask before presenting me to him and thus gaining me the honor and benefit of eating at his table. Signor Dolfin said with the greatest affability that he would be happy if I would present myself to his wife, who was to sail with him. I called on her the following day, and saw before me a charming woman for her years, but totally deaf. I had nothing to hope for. She had a charming young daughter,[25] whom she left in a convent and who later became celebrated. I think she is still alive, the widow of the Procurator Tron, whose family is now extinct.

I have rarely seen a handsomer man or one who bore himself better than this lady's father, Signor Dolfin. Withal he was highly intelligent, and no less remarkable for his eloquence and perfect breeding; a dashing gamester, though he always lost, loved by every woman whose love he sought, always courageous and unruffled, in good fortune and bad. He had traveled without obtaining permission, which had brought him into disgrace with the government, so that he had entered the service of a foreign country. A Venetian nobleman cannot commit a greater crime; representations were made and he was forced to return to Venice and suffer the punishment of spending some time under "the Leads."[26]

This charming, generous, but not wealthy man had to ask the Great Council[27] for a lucrative governorship, and he was appointed Councilor for the island of Zante; but he was going there with such a suite that he could not hope to profit by it.

This noble Venetian, Dolfin, being such a man as I have described, could not make his fortune in Venice. An aristocratic government cannot hope for peace unless it is based upon the fundamental principle of equality among aristocrats. Now, it is impossible to judge of equality, whether physical or moral, except by appearances; from which it follows that the citizen who wants to avoid persecution must, if he is not like everyone else or worse, bend his every effort to appearing to be so. If he has much talent, he must hide it; if he is ambitious, he must pretend to scorn honors; if he wants to obtain anything, he must ask for nothing; if his person is handsome, he must neglect it: he must look slovenly and dress badly, his accessories must be of the plainest, he must ridicule everything foreign; he must bow awkwardly, not pride himself on being well-mannered, care little for the fine arts, conceal his good taste if he has it; not have a foreign cook; he must wear an ill-combed wig and be a little dirty. As Signor Dolfin Bucintoro had none of these qualifications, it follows that he could not make his fortune in his native country, Venice.

The day before I sailed, I did not leave Signora Orio's house. She shed as many tears as her nieces, and I shed no fewer. A hundred times over as they perished from love in my arms on that last night they said that they would never see me again, and they predicted rightly. If they had seen me again, they would have predicted wrongly. Such is all the value of prophecies!

I went on board on the 5th of May, very well off in clothing, jewels, and ready money. I had five hundred zecchini. Our ship was armed with twenty-four cannon and had a garrison of two hundred Slavonians. We sailed from Malamocco[28] to Istria during the night and dropped anchor in the port of Orsara[29] for the operation called savorna.[30] This means filling the bottom of the hold with a sufficient quantity of stones, for if the ship is too light it cannot be sailed properly. I landed with several others to take a walk, in spite of my knowing the ugly place, where I had spent three days not nine months before. I laughed as I reflected on the difference between my present profession and the one I had abandoned. I was sure that no one would recognize in the imposing figure I now presented the miserable abate who, but for the ill-omened Frate Steffano, would have become God knows what.

CHAPTER IV

Laughable meeting at Orsara. Voyage to Corfu. Stay in Constantinople. Bonneval. My return to Corfu. Signora F. The pretended prince. My flight from Corfu. My pranks on the island of Casopo. I submit to arrest at Corfu. My speedy deliverance and my triumphs. My success with Signora F.

STUPIDITY is far more dangerous in a housemaid than malice, and more costly to her master, for he may be justified in punishing one who is malicious but not one who is a fool; he can only discharge her, and learn another lesson in the conduct of life. Mine has just used three notebooks, containing a detailed account of what I am about to set down in outline in this one, because she needed paper for her housekeeping. To excuse herself, she tells me that since the sheets were old and scrawled all over and even blotted in places, she thought them more fit for her to use than the clean white sheets on my table. If I had thought about it I would not have flown into a rage; but the first effect of rage is precisely to render the mind incapable of thought. I can say to my credit that my anger is always short-lived; irasci celerem tamen ut placabilis essem ("I become angry quickly, even as I am quickly appeased").[1] After wasting my time treating her to epithets whose application escaped her entirely and proving to her by the most lucid reasoning that she was a fool, she refuted all my arguments by never answering a word. I resigned myself to writing all over again, angrily and consequently badly, what had I been in a good humor I should have written well; but my reader can console himself with the thought that, as in mechanics, he will gain in time what he loses in energy.

Having, then, gone ashore at Orsara while ballast was being loaded into the hold of our vessel, whose excessive lightness made it difficult to maintain the equilibrium necessary for navigation, I noticed a decent-looking man, who stopped and looked at me with great attention. Certain that he could not be a creditor, I imagined that my face interested him and, since I could hardly be offended by that, I was proceeding on my way when he addressed me.

"May I make bold to ask you, Captain, if this is the first time you have been in this city?"

"No, Signore. I was here once before."

"Was it not last year?"

"It was."

"But you were not in uniform?"

"You are right again; but I think your curiosity is a trifle indiscreet."

"You must forgive me for it, Signore, since it arises from my gratitude. You are the man to whom I am under the greatest obligation, and I must believe that God sent you to this city a second time in order that I may become yet more in your debt."

"But what did I do for you, and what can I do now? I cannot imagine."

"Be so good as to come and breakfast with me at my house. My door stands open. Come and taste my rare refosco,[2] and I will tell you a very short story which will convince you that you are my true benefactor and that

I am justified in hoping that you have returned here only to renew your benefactions.''

Seeing no indication that the man was mad, I supposed that he wanted to persuade me to buy some of his refosco, and I let him take me to his house. We go up to the second floor and enter a room, where he leaves me to order the good breakfast he had promised me. Seeing all the paraphernalia of a surgeon, I suppose that he is one and, when he reappears, I tell him so.

''Yes, Captain, I am a surgeon. I have lived in this city for twenty years in poverty, for I never found occasion to practice my profession except to bleed, to cup, to treat some scratch, or to put a sprained ankle back in joint. What I earned was not enough to keep me alive; but since last year, I may say that my situation has changed; I have earned a great deal of money, I have invested it to advantage, and it is you—God bless you! —who have made me rich.''

''How?''

''Here is the whole brief story. You communicated a certain love-token to Don Gerolamo's housekeeper, who gave it to a friend, who honorably shared it with his wife. She in turn gave it to a libertine, who distributed it so effectively that in less than a month I had fifty patients under my care, all of whom I cured, of course for a proper fee. I still have a few patients, but within a month I shall have none, for the disease has died out. When I saw you I could not but rejoice. I saw you as a bird of good omen. Can I hope that you will remain here for a few days and give the disease a fresh start?''

After I had laughed heartily, I saw him look gloomy when I said that I was perfectly well. He told me that I would not be able to say as much on my return, for the country to which I was going was full of the same shoddy merchandise, in the arcana of getting rid of which he had no equal. He begged me to rely on him and not to believe the charlatans who would offer me remedies. I promised to do whatever he asked, I thanked him, and went back on board.

Signor Dolfin had a good laugh when I told him the story. We set sail the next morning and on the fourth day weathered out a bad storm behind Curzola.[3] This storm very nearly cost me my life, in the following way.

A Slavonian priest who served as ship's chaplain, an ignorant, insolent, brutish fellow whom I derided at every opportunity, had quite justifiably become my enemy. At the height of the storm he was standing on deck with his breviary in his hand, exorcising the devils which he saw in the clouds and which he made all the sailors see, so that, giving themselves up for lost, they did nothing but weep and, in their desperation, neglected to do what would save the ship from the rocks which were visible on either hand. Seeing the obvious peril, and the evil consequences produced by the exorcisms of the priest, who was driving the crew to despair just when they needed to be heartened, I very imprudently considered it my duty to intervene. Climbing up into the rigging, I urged the sailors to keep working and to brave the danger, telling them that there were no devils and that the priest who was pointing them out was a madman; but the energy of my harangues did not prevent the priest from proclaiming me an atheist and setting the greater part of the crew against me. The winds continued to be bad the next day, and on the third day the rabid priest convinced his disciples among the sailors that so long as I was on board fair weather would never return. One of them saw that he could accomplish what the priest wanted by creeping up on me from behind as I stood at the edge of the deck and pushing me overboard by hitting me such a blow with a rope as could not but knock me down. No sooner planned than done. Only the arm of an anchor catching in my coat kept me from falling into the sea. Help came, and I was saved.

A corporal pointed out the murderous sailor to me, I took his stick and was proceeding to give him a sound thrashing when other sailors came running with the priest, and I should have been killed if the soldiers had not defended me. The ship's captain appeared with Signor Dolfin, and after hearing what the priest had to say they were obliged, in order to quiet the mob, to promise that they would put me ashore as soon as possible; but the priest insisted that I give him a parchment scroll I had bought from a Greek at Malamocco just before going on board. I had forgotten all about it, but it was true. I burst out laughing, and at once gave it to Signor Dolfin, who handed it to the priest, who triumphantly called for a brazier and threw it on the burning coals. Before being reduced to ashes the parchment performed contortions for half an hour—a phenomenon which convinced all the sailors that it was black magic. Its supposed virtue was to make every woman fall in love with the man who had it on his person. I hope that my reader will be good enough to believe that I had no faith in philters of any kind, and that I had only spent half a scudo on the parchment for the fun of it. All over Italy, and in ancient and modern Greece, there are Greeks, Jews, and astrologers who sell their dupes pieces of paper whose virtues are prodigious. Among others, "charms" to make one invulnerable; likewise little bags filled with drugs containing what they call "spirits."[4] This sort of merchandise finds no sale in Germany, in France, in England, and throughout the North; but to make up for it people in those countries are taken in by a far more serious kind of charlatanism. They search for the philosophers' stone,[5] and their belief in it never dies.

The storm ceased during the same half hour which it took to burn my parchment, and the conspirators forgot all about getting rid of me. At the end of a week of excellent sailing, we arrived at Corfu, where, after finding comfortable lodgings, I took my letters to His Excellency the Proveditor-General,[6] then to all the capi di mar[7] to whom I had letters of introduction. After paying my respects to my Colonel and to all the officers of my regiment, I thought of nothing but amusing myself until the arrival of the Cavaliere Venier, who was going on to Constantinople and was to take me with him. He arrived about the middle of June, and in the meanwhile, having taken to playing basset,[8] I lost all my money and sold or pawned all my jewels. Such is the fate of every man who is addicted to games of chance, unless he can put Fortune on his side by playing with a real advantage arising from calculation or from skill. A wise player can do both without risk of being called a cheat.

During the month I spent in Corfu before the Bailo's arrival, I did not give a thought to studying the country either in its physical or its moral aspect. Except on the days when I had guard duty I lived in the coffeehouse in a desperate assault on the faro bank and falling a victim, of course, to the bad luck which I persisted in defying. I never went home with the consolation of having won, and I never had the firmness to stop so long as, having lost all my money, I still had some possessions. The only stupid satisfaction I had was hearing myself called a "fine player" by the banker himself each time I lost a crucial card.

In this miserable situation I felt I was being restored to life when the boom of cannons announced the arrival of the Bailo.[9] He was on board the Europa, a warship of seventy-two guns, and had taken only a week to come from Venice. The anchor had scarcely been dropped before he broke out the flag of captain-general of the naval forces of the Republic, and the Proveditor-General of Corfu lowered his. The Republic of Venice has no higher office on the sea than that of Bailo to the Ottoman Porte. The Cavaliere Venier had a most distinguished suite. Count Annibale Gambara and Count Carlo Zenobio, both Venetian noblemen, and the Marquis Archetti, a nobleman of Brescia, were accompanying him to Constantinople to satisfy their curiosity. During the week they spent in Corfu all the naval commanders in turn entertained the Bailo and his staff with great suppers and balls. As soon as I presented myself His Excellency told me that he had already spoken to the Proveditor-General and that he was granting me a leave of six months to accompany him to Constantinople as an adjutant. After receiving it, I went on board with my modest baggage, and the next morning the ship raised anchor, and His Excellency the Bailo came on board in the Proveditor-General's felucca. We set sail at once and, the wind remaining constant, on the sixth day we arrived off Cerigo,[10] where we anchored to send a number of sailors ashore to replenish the water supply. My curiosity to see Cerigo, which is said to be the ancient Cythera, induced me to ask permission to go ashore. I would have done better to stay on board, for I made an unfortunate acquaintance. I went with a captain who was in command of the soldiers on board.

Two sorry-looking, ill-dressed men come up to us and ask for charity. I ask them who they are, and the one who seemed the brighter of the two answers me as follows:

"We are condemned to live, and perhaps to die, on this island by the despotism of the Council of Ten, with thirty or forty other unfortunates; and we were all born subjects of the Republic. Our alleged crime, which is a crime nowhere, is the custom we had of living with our mistresses and not being jealous of those among our friends who, finding them pretty, obtained the enjoyment of their charms with our consent. As we were not rich, we even felt no qualms over profiting by it. Our practices were denounced as illicit and we were sent here, where we are given ten soldi a day in 'long money.'[11] We are called 'mangiamarroni.'[12] We are worse off than the galley slaves, for we are perishing of boredom and devoured by hunger. I am Antonio Pocchini, a nobleman of Padua, and my mother is of the illustrious house of Camposampiero."

We gave them some money, then walked about the island and, after seeing the fortress, went back on board. We shall speak of this Pocchini fifteen or sixteen years hence.

The still favorable winds brought us to the Dardanelles in a week or ten days; then Turkish boats took us on board and carried us to Constantinople. The view of the city from a league away is astonishing. Nowhere in the world is there such a beautiful spectacle. This magnificent view was the cause of the end of the Roman Empire and the beginning of the Greek. Constantine the Great, arriving at Constantinople by sea, was so fascinated by the view of Byzantium that he cried: "Here is the seat for the empire of the whole world," and to make his prophecy inevitable he left Rome and settled there. If he had read, or believed, Horace's prophecy,[13] he would never have done anything so foolish. The poet had written that the Roman Empire would not near its end until a successor of Augustus should take it into his head to move the seat of it to the place of its birth. The Troad is not far from Thrace.

We arrived at the Venctian palace in Pera about the middle of July. The plague was not prevalent in the great city at the time, which was a rare occurrence. We were all most comfortably lodged; but the extreme heat persuaded the two Baili[14] to enjoy the coolness of a country house which the Bailo Donà had rented. It was in Buyukderé.[15] The first order I received was never to venture out without the Bailo's knowledge and without a janissary.[16] I obeyed it to the letter. In those days the Russians had not yet quelled the insolence of the Turkish people.[17] I am told that nowadays foreigners can go where they please without any fear.

It was on the second day after my arrival that I had my guard conduct me to the house of Osman, Pasha of Karamania. This was the name which Count de Bonneval assumed after his apostasy.[18]

After sending my letter in to him, I was shown into a room on the ground floor furnished in the French fashion, where I saw a stout elderly gentleman, in complete French apparel, rise and ask me with a smile what he could do in Constantinople for a protégé of a cardinal of the Church which he could no longer call his mother. My only answer was to narrate the train of events which had led me, in my despair, to ask the Cardinal for a letter of recommendation for Constantinople, having received which I felt superstitiously obligated to deliver it to him. "It follows," he replied, "that but for the letter you would never have thought of coming here, where you have absolutely no need of me."

"None whatever; but I consider myself very fortunate thus to have secured the honor of meeting in Your Excellency a man of whom all Europe has talked, still talks, and will talk for a long time to come."

After indulging in some reflections on the happy situation of a young man like myself, who without either cares or plans or any fixed abode abandoned himself to Fortune fearing nothing and expecting nothing, he said that since Cardinal Acquaviva's letter obliged him to do something for me, he would introduce me to three or four of his Turkish friends who were well worth knowing. He invited me to dine with him every Thursday, and promised to send me a janissary who would protect me from the insolence of the mob and show me everything worth seeing.

Since the Cardinal's letter described me as a literary man, he rose and said that he would show me his library. I followed him across the garden. We entered a room furnished with cupboards with doors of grillwork; behind the brass wire grilles were curtains; and presumably behind the curtains were books.

But I had a good laugh with the stout Pasha when he opened the locked cupboards and, instead of books, I saw bottles full of all sorts of wines.

"There," he said, "is my library and my seraglio, for at my age women would shorten my life, whereas good wine can only lengthen it or at least make it pleasanter."

"I suppose Your Excellency has obtained a dispensation from the Mufti?"[19]

"You are mistaken, for the Pope of the Turks is far from having as much power as yours. He cannot permit anything which the Koran prohibits; but that is no bar to anyone's being free to damn himself if he pleases. The devout Turks pity libertines, but they do not persecute them. There is no Inquisition here. Those, they say, who do not obey the precepts of religion will be unhappy enough in the next life without being punished in this world too. The dispensation for which I asked, and which I had no difficulty in obtaining, was from what you call circumcision, for properly speaking it cannot be called circumcision. At my age it would have been dangerous. It is a ceremony which is usually observed; but it is not compulsory."

In the course of the two hours I spent with him he asked me for news of several Venetian friends of his, particularly Signor Marcantonio Diedo; I told him that his friends still loved him, and were only sorry for him because of his apostasy; he answered that he was a Turk as he had been a Christian, and that he did not know the Koran any better than he had known the Gospels.

"I am certain," he added, "that I shall die in peace and shall be far happier when that time comes than Prince Eugene[20] was. I had to say that God is God and that Mohammed is his prophet. I said it, and the Turks do not bother their heads over whether I thought it or not. In addition I wear the turban, as it is my duty to wear the uniform of my master."

He said that, as he knew no profession but that of a soldier, he had not resolved to serve the "Grand Turk"[21] as Lieutenant-General until he had found himself reduced to having nothing to live on. "When I left Venice," he said, "the soup had eaten up the china; if the Jewish nation had decided to put me at the head of fifty thousand men, I would have gone to besiege Jerusalem."

He was a handsome man, though too stout. In consequence of a saber cut he wore a silver plate over his abdomen to prevent a hernia. He had been exiled to Asia, but not, he said, for long, since cabals are not as long-lived in Turkey as they are in Europe, especially at the Court of Vienna. When I left him he said that in all the time he had been a Turk he had not spent two such pleasant hours as those I had whiled away for him, and he asked me to present his compliments to the two Baili.

His Excellency the Bailo Giovanni Donà, who had known him well in Vienna, asked me to convey his warm compliments to him, and the Cavaliere Venier expressed his regret at not being able to make his personal acquaintance.[22]

The next day but one after this first interview was the Thursday on which he had promised to send me the janissary, and he kept his word. He arrived at eleven o'clock and conducted me to the Pasha, whom on this occasion I found dressed in the Turkish fashion. His guests soon appeared, and we sat down at table to the number of eight, all in high spirits. The whole dinner was served in the French fashion, both as to the ceremonial observed and the dishes; his steward was French and his cook an honest renegade too. He had not failed to introduce me to all his guests; but he did not set me talking until toward the end of dinner. Only Italian was spoken, and I noticed that the Turks never once opened their mouths to speak even a word to each other in their own language. Each had at his left a bottle which might be white wine or else hydromel;[23] I do not know what it was. Like Monsieur de Bonneval, who was on my right, I drank an excellent white Burgundy.

I was encouraged to talk of Venice, but still more of Rome, which brought the conversation round to religion; not to dogma, though, but to discipline and liturgical ceremonies. A pleasant Turk, who was addressed as Effendi,[24] because he had been Minister of Foreign Affairs, said that the Venetian Ambassador[25] in Rome was a friend of his and launched into his praises; I echoed them and said that he had given me a letter to a Moslem gentleman whom he likewise called his intimate friend. He asked me the gentleman's name, and as I had forgotten it, I took my portfolio, in which I had the letter, from my pocket. He was most gratified when, reading out the address, I uttered his name. After asking my permission, he read the letter, then kissed the signature, rose, and embraced me. This scene delighted Monsieur de Bonneval and the entire company. The Effendi, whose name was Ismail, obtained Pasha Osman's promise to bring me to dinner at his house on such-and-such a day.

But at this dinner, which I greatly enjoyed, the Turk who most interested me was not Ismail. It was a handsome man who appeared to be about sixty years of age and whose noble countenance betokened both wisdom and kindness. I found the same characteristics two years later in the fine face of Signor Bragadin, Senator of Venice, of whom I shall speak when we come to that time. During all the discussions into which I had been led at table he had listened to me with the greatest attention but had never uttered a word. A man whose face and bearing are interesting, and who says nothing, cannot but arouse the curiosity of any member of the company to whom he is unknown. As we left the room in which we had dined, I asked Monsieur de Bonneval who he was; he replied that he was a rich and wise philosopher, whose probity was unquestioned and whose purity of life was equal to his attachment to his religion. He advised me to cultivate his acquaintance if he gave me an opening.

I was glad to hear this, and after we had strolled in the shade and had entered a room furnished in the style of the country, I sat down on a sofa beside Yusuf Ali, for such was the name of the Turk who had aroused my interest and who at once offered me his pipe. I politely refused, and accepted the one brought me by a servant of Monsieur de Bonneval's. When one is in the company of people who are smoking, one must either smoke or leave, for otherwise one cannot but suppose that one is breathing in the smoke which escapes from the mouths of the rest. This idea, which has an element of truth, is disgusting and revolting.

Yusuf Ali, pleased to have me sitting beside him, at once led me to talk on subjects similar to those which had been brought up at table, but more especially on the reasons which had induced me to leave the peaceful career of a cleric and choose the life of a soldier. To satisfy his curiosity without giving him a bad opinion of me, I thought I should give him a brief account of my whole life, for I thought I ought to convince him that I had not entered the career of the priesthood from vocation. He seemed satisfied. When I heard him speak of vocation in the terms of a Stoic philosopher, I saw that he was a fatalist; and I had the tact not to launch an attack on his whole system, so that my objections gratified him because he found that he was strong enough to destroy them. He must, I suppose, have thought highly of me to consider me worthy to become his pupil, for at the age of nineteen and lost in a false religion, it was impossible that I should be his teacher. After spending an hour questioning me and listening to my principles, he said that he thought I was born to know the truth, since he saw that I was concerned for it and was not sure that I had found it. He invited me to spend a day with him, and told me on what days of the week I would find him at home; but he added that before promising to give him the pleasure I should consult Pasha Osman. I then told him that the Pasha had already described his character to me, which greatly pleased him. I promised to dine with him on a certain day, and we parted.

When I told Monsieur de Bonneval all this, he was delighted and said that his janissary would be at the palace of the Venetian Baili every day, ready to serve me.

When I told Their Excellencies the Baili of the acquaintances I had made that day at Count de Bonneval's, I saw that they were well pleased. And the Cavaliere Venier advised me not to neglect such acquaintances in a country where boredom is more of a threat to foreigners than the plague.

On the appointed day I called on Yusuf very early in the morning, but he had already gone out. His gardener, to whom he had given instructions, showed me every politeness and whiled away two hours most pleasantly for me by taking me to see all the beauties of his master's gardens, and especially the flowers. This gardener was a Neapolitan who had belonged to him for thirty years. From his manners I supposed that he had been well born and brought up; but he frankly told me that he had never learned to read, that he was a sailor when he was made a slave, and that he was so happy in Yusuf's service that he would consider it a punishment if he gave him his freedom. I took great care not to ask him anything about his master's affairs. The man's discretion might have put my curiosity to shame.

Yusuf arrived on horseback, and after the usual compliments we went to dine, with no other company, in a pavilion from which we had a view of the sea and where we enjoyed a gentle wind which tempered the intense heat. This wind, which comes up every day at the same hour, is the northwest wind known as the "maestrale." [26] We ate well, though the only made dish was a kavurma.[27] I drank water and some excellent hydromel, assuring my host that I preferred it to wine. In those days I very seldom drank it. Praising his hydromel, I said that Mussulmans who broke the law by drinking wine deserved no mercy, since they could only be drinking it because it was forbidden; he assured me that many thought its use was justified since they considered it simply a medicine. He said that it was the physician to the Grand Turk who had brought it into fashion as a medicine and so had made his fortune and gained the complete confidence of his master, who really was always ill but only because he drank to excess. He was amazed when I told him that drunkards were very infrequent among us and that the vice was common only among the dregs of the populace. When he said that he did not understand how wine could be permitted by all other religions, since it deprived men of their reason, I answered that all religions forbade its excessive use and that the crime lay only in the excess. I persuaded him by saying that since the effect of opium was the same, and even more violent, his religion should have forbidden it too; he answered that he had never in all his life taken either opium or wine.

After our dinner, pipes and tobacco were brought. We filled them ourselves. In those days I smoked and enjoyed it, but I had the habit of spitting. Yusuf, who did not spit, said that the tobacco I was smoking was an excellent crab's-eye and that it was a pity I did not swallow its balsamic component, which must be in the saliva which I was wrong to discard in this fashion. He ended by saying that one should spit only when the tobacco was bad. Pleased with his reasoning, I said that he was right and that a pipe could not be considered a real pleasure unless the tobacco was perfect.

"Perfect tobacco," he answered, "is certainly necessary to the pleasure of smoking; but it is not the chief thing, for the pleasure which good tobacco gives is only sensual. True pleasures are those which affect only the soul, quite independently of the senses.''

''I cannot, my dear Yusuf, imagine pleasures which my soul can enjoy without the intervention of my senses.''

''Listen to me. When you fill your pipe, do you feel pleasure?''

''Yes.''

''To which of your senses will you attribute it, if you do not attribute it to your soul? Let us go on. Is it not true that you feel satisfied when you do not put it down until you have completely finished it? You are glad when you see that nothing remains but ashes.''

''True.''

''Then here are two pleasures in which your senses certainly have no share; but now please try to guess the third, which is the chief one.''

''The chief pleasure? The fragrance of the tobacco.''

''No, no. That is a pleasure of the olfactory organ; it is sensual.''

''I have no idea.''

''Then listen. The chief pleasure in smoking consists in the sight of the smoke. You must never see it coming out of the pipe, but entirely from the corner of your mouth, at just the right intervals which must not be too frequent. So true is it that this is the chief pleasure, that you will nowhere see a blind man enjoy smoking. Try smoking yourself at night in a room without a light, and no more than a minute after you have lighted your pipe you will put it down.''

''What you say is very true; but you will forgive me if I consider that a number of pleasures which affect my senses deserve my preferring them to those which affect only my soul.''

''Forty years ago I thought as you do. Forty years from now, if you succeed in attaining to wisdom, you will think as I do. The pleasures, my dear son, which stimulate the passions trouble the soul; and so you must admit that they cannot rightly be called pleasures."

"But it seems to me that if one sees them as pleasures, that is enough to make them so."

"Right. But if you would take the trouble to examine them after you have experienced them, you would find them impure."

"Possibly. But why should I trouble myself to do something which can only lessen the pleasure I have felt?"

"When you have grown old enough, you will find pleasure in going to that trouble."

"I think, my dear father, that you prefer maturity to youth."

"Say old age, and you will be right."

"You surprise me. Am I to suppose that you were unhappy in your youth?"

"Not at all. I was always healthy and happy and never the victim of my passions; but all that I saw among my equals in age was an excellent school to teach me to know mankind and show me the road to happiness. The happiest man is not the most pleasure-loving but the one who is wise enough to choose the greatest pleasures; and the greatest pleasures, I repeat, can only be those which, as they do not excite the passions, increase the peace of the soul."

"Those are the pleasures which you call 'pure.'"

"The sight of a great, grass-covered meadow is one such. The color green, so highly praised by our divine Prophet,[28] strikes my vision, and then I feel my mind bathed in a peace so delicious that I think I am drawing near to the Author of Nature. I feel the same peace, an equal calm, when I sit on the bank of a river and see the flowing water pass before me without ever disappearing from view and without its continual movement clouding its transparency. It shows me the image of my life, and the tranquillity which I wish it to have, so that, like the water I am watching, it will reach that end which I do not see but which must await it when its course is run.''

In such fashion did this Turk reason; and so we spent four hours together. He had had two wives, who had given him two sons and a daughter. His elder son, who had received his inheritance, lived in Salonica where he was a merchant, and was wealthy. The younger son was in the Grand Seraglio, in the Sultan's service, and his inheritance was in the hands of a guardian. His daughter, whom he called Zelmi, and who was fifteen years of age, was to inherit all his property at his death. He had given her all the education she could possibly need to make the husband God had destined for her happy. We shall speak of this girl a little later. His wives were dead, and five years ago he had taken a third wife, a very young girl, a native of Scio[29] and a perfect beauty; but he said that he could not hope to have either a son or a daughter by her, for he was already old. Yet he was only sixty. When I left, I had to promise him that I would come and spend at least one day a week with him.

At supper, when I gave Their Excellencies the Baili on account of my day, they said I was very fortunate to have the prospect of spending three months agreeably in a country where, as foreign diplomats, they could expect only boredom.

Two or three days later, Monsieur de Bonneval took me to dine at Ismail's residence, where I saw a great display of Asiatic luxury. But as the guests were numerous and for the most part spoke only in Turkish, I was as bored as I believed Monsieur de Bonneval to be. Ismail noticed this and, when we left, asked me to breakfast with him as often as I could, assuring me that I should be giving him a real pleasure. I promised to do so, and I went there some ten days later. The reader will learn the particulars when we reach that point. For the present, I must return to Yusuf, who on my second visit displayed a nature which made me conceive the highest esteem and the greatest fondness for him.

Dining alone together, as we had done on the first occasion, and the conversation turning to the arts, I expressed my opinion on a precept in the Koran which forbade the Ottomans the innocent pleasure of enjoying the productions of painting and sculpture. He answered that, as a true sage, Mahomet was obliged to keep all images from the sight of Islamites.

"Observe," he said, "that all the peoples to which our great Prophet imparted the knowledge of God were idolaters. Men are weak, and if they saw the same objects again they could easily relapse into the same errors."

"I am of the opinion, my dear father, that no people ever worshiped an image, but rather the divinity whom the image represented."

"I am willing to believe it, too; but since God cannot be matter, the minds of the vulgar must be kept from thinking that he can be. You Christians stand alone in believing that you see God."

"That is true; we are sure of it, but pray observe that what makes us sure is faith."

"I know it; but you are idolaters nonetheless, for what you see is only matter, and you are perfectly certain of what you see, unless you tell me that faith makes you less certain."

"God preserve me from saying any such thing, for on the contrary faith strengthens our certainty."

"That is an illusion for which, thank God, we have no need; and there is not a philosopher in the world who can prove to me that it is necessary."

"The proof, my dear father, does not lie in the province of philosophy but of theology, which is a far higher science."

"You speak the same language as our theologians, who, however, differ from yours in not using their science to make the truths we must know more obscure, but more evident."

"Consider, my dear Yusuf, that this is a mystery."

"The existence of God is a mystery, and so great a mystery that men dare add nothing to it. God can only be simple, and this is the God whom his Prophet announced to us. Admit that nothing can be added to his essence without destroying his simplicity. We say that he is one, which is simplicity itself. You say that he is one and at the same time three; such a definition is contradictory, absurd, and impious."

"It is a mystery."

"Do you mean God, or the definition? I mean the definition, which must not be a mystery, and a mystery which reason must reject. Common sense, my dear son, can see no relevance in a statement whose very substance is an absurdity. Prove to me that three is not a compound, or that it can possibly not be one, and I will instantly become a Christian."

"My religion commands me to believe without arguing, and I tremble, my dear Yusuf, when I think that a strong argument might lead me to renounce the religion of my dear father. I should first have to be convinced that he lived in error. Tell me if, respecting his memory as I do, I can be so presumptuous as to set myself up as his judge to pronounce his condemnation."

After this remonstrance I saw that the good Yusuf was touched. After two minutes of silence he said that, thinking as I did, I could not but be dear to God and hence predestined;[30] but that if I was wrong, only God could set me right, for he knew no just man who would undertake to refute the sentiment I had expressed to him. We then talked pleasantly of lighter things, and toward evening I left, but not before he had given me endless assurances of the purest friendship.

On my way home I reflected that all that Yusuf had said to me concerning the essence of God could well be true, for certainly the being of beings must be essentially the simplest of all beings; but that I could not, because of an error in the Christian religion, let myself be persuaded to embrace the Turkish creed, which might have an extremely just conception of God but at which I could only laugh because it owed its entire doctrine only to the most arrant of all impostors. But I did not think that Yusuf had had any intention of making me a convert.

It was when I was dining with him for the third time, and the conversation, as it always did, had turned to religion, that I asked him if he was certain that his religion was the only one which could lead mortal man to eternal salvation. He answered that he was not sure it was the only one, but he was sure that the Christian religion was false, because it could not be universal.

"Why?"

"Because there is neither bread nor wine in two thirds of our globe. Note that the Koran can be obeyed everywhere."

I was at a loss for an answer, and I declined to fall back on evasions. When, continuing the discussion, I said that since God was not matter, he must be spirit, he answered that we knew what he was not, but not what he was, hence we could not affirm that he was spirit, for we could have only an abstract idea of him.

"God," he said, "is immaterial; that is all that we know of him, and we shall never know more."

I remembered that Plato says the same thing, and Yusuf had certainly not read Plato.

On the same day he said that the existence of God could be useful only to those who did not doubt it, and hence the most wretched of mortals were the atheists.

"God," he said, "made man in his likeness so that, among all the animals he created, there should be one capable of doing homage to his existence. Without man God would have no witness to his own glory; hence man must understand that his first duty is to glorify him by practicing justice and trusting in his Providence. Note that God never abandons the man who bows down to him in his adversities and implores him for help, and that he leaves the wretch who does not believe in prayer to perish in despair.''

''Yet there are atheists who are happy.''

''True; but despite their peace of soul, I think they are to be pitied, for they hope for nothing after this life and do not consider themselves superior to the brute beasts. In addition, they must languish in ignorance if they are philosophers, and if they do not think at all, they have no resource in adversity. God, in short, made man such that he cannot be happy unless he does not doubt his divine existence. Whatever his condition, he has an indispensable need to admit it, for without that need man would never have admitted a God who created all things.''

''But I should like to know why atheism has never existed except in the system of some philosopher, whereas we have no example of its existence in the system of an entire people.''

''It is because the poor man feels his needs much more strongly than the rich man. Among us there are many godless men who laugh at the believers who put all their faith in the pilgrimage to Mecca. Woe unto them! They ought to respect our ancient monuments which, by exciting the devotion of the faithful, foster their religion and encourage them to bear their adversities. Without these consoling objects, the ignorant masses would give way to all the excesses of despair.''

Delighted by the attention with which I listened to his views, Yusuf yielded more and more to his inclination to teach me. I began spending the day with him uninvited, which made him still fonder of me.

One morning I had my janissary take me to Ismail Effendi's, so that I could breakfast with him, as I had promised to do; but after receiving and treating me with the utmost politeness the Turk invited me to take a walk with him in a small garden where, when we had entered a summerhouse, he suddenly proposed something which was not to my taste; I smiled and said that I was not of that persuasion, then, wearying of his fond assiduity, I rose rather abruptly. Ismail then pretended to approve my repugnance and said that he had only been joking. After addressing the usual compliments to him, I left, intending not to visit his house again; but I had to return there, and we shall speak of it when the proper time comes. When I recounted this little incident to Monsieur de Bonneval, he said that, according to Turkish manners, Ismail had wished to give me proof of his great friendship for me, but that I could be sure he would make no such proposal to me again if I returned there for, in all other respects, Ismail was a thorough gentleman, who owned a number of most beautiful slaves. He said that politeness demanded that I visit him again.

Five or six weeks after the beginning of our friendship, Yusuf asked me if I was married, and upon my answering no, the conversation turned to chastity, which, he maintained, could be considered a virtue only in so far as it represented a form of abstinence, but that, far from being pleasing to God, it must be displeasing to him, since it violated the first law he had given to man.

''But I should like to know,'' he said, ''what is meant by the chastity of your Knights of Malta.[31] They take a vow of chastity. This cannot mean that they will abstain from all the work of the flesh, for if that is criminal, all Christians took the same vow when they were baptized. Hence the vow of chastity can only consist in an undertaking not to marry. It follows that chastity can be violated only by marriage, and I observe that marriage is one of your sacraments. So all that these gentlemen promise is that they will never perform the work of the flesh when the law of God would make it permissible for them, while they remain free to perform it to their heart's content illegitimately, even to the point of legally recognizing children whom they can only have had by a twofold crime. They call them 'natural children,' as if the offspring of the conjugal union which Christians consider a sacrament were not natural. In short, the vow of chastity can be pleasing neither to God nor to men nor to the individuals who take it."

He asked me if I was married. I answered that I was not and that I hoped circumstances would never compel me to contract that obligation.

"What!" he answered. "Then I must either believe that you are not a complete man or that you want to damn yourself, unless you tell me that you are a Christian only in show."

"I am a complete man, and I am a Christian. I will further tell you that I love the fair sex and that I hope to enjoy many conquests among them."

"Your religion says that you will be damned."

"I am sure that I shall not, for when we confess our crimes to our priests they are obliged to absolve us."

"So I know. But admit that it is idiocy to claim that God will forgive you for a crime which you perhaps would not commit unless you were sure that by confessing it you would be forgiven for it. God forgives only the repentant."

"There is no doubt of that; and confession presupposes it. If there is no repentance, the absolution has no power."

"Is masturbation a crime among you too?"

"An even greater crime than unlawful copulation."

"So I know; and it has always surprised me, for any legislator who promulgates a law which cannot be enforced is a fool. A man who has no woman and who is in good health cannot but masturbate when imperious nature makes him feel the need for it. A man whose fear of sullying his soul by the act could give him the firmness to abstain from it would contract a mortal disease.''

''We Christians believe just the contrary. We claim that young men who indulge in the practice impair their constitutions and shorten their lives. In many communities they are closely watched, left absolutely no time to commit this crime on themselves.''

''Those who watch them are ignoramuses and those who pay them to do so are fools, for the prohibition itself must increase the desire to break a law so tyrannical and so contrary to nature.''

''Yet it seems to me that practicing this aberration to excess must be harmful to health, for it enervates and debilitates.''

''I agree; but there can be no excess here unless it is provoked; and those who forbid the thing provoke it. If you Christians lay no restraint on girls in this respect, I do not see why you should think it proper to restrain boys.''

''Girls do not run so great a risk, for they can lose only a very small amount of substance, and even that does not come from the same source from which the seed of life in man derives.''

''I know nothing about that, but we have doctors who maintain that pallor in girls comes from the practice.''

After this discussion, and several others in which, even when he found that I did not agree with him, he seemed to consider my arguments more than reasonable, Yusuf Ali made me a proposal which greatly surprised me, if not quite in the following words at least in something very like them.

''I have two sons and a daughter. I am not concerned about my sons, for they have already received their due share of my estates; but as for my daughter, when I die she will have all that I possess, and I am in a position to make a rich man of anyone who marries her while I am alive. I took a young wife five years ago, but she has not given me a child, and I am sure that she will not, since I am already old. My daughter, whom I call Zelmi, is fifteen years of age, she is beautiful, with dark eyes and dark hair like her late mother, tall, with a good figure, gentle in nature, and the education I have given her makes her worthy to possess the heart of our master.[32] She speaks Greek and Italian, she sings, accompanying herself on the harp, she draws, she embroiders, and she is always in good spirits. There is not a man on earth who can boast of having seen her face, and she loves me so dearly that she would never presume to have another will than mine. The girl is a treasure, and I offer her to you if you will go and live in Adrianople for a year with a relative of mine, in whose house you will learn our language, our religion, and our customs. At the end of a year you shall return to Constantinople, and here, as soon as you have declared yourself a Mussulman, my daughter shall become your wife, and you shall have a house, slaves of your own, and an income which will permit you to live in luxury. That is what I have to say. I do not want you to answer me now, or tomorrow, or at any set time. You shall answer me when you feel your Genius prompting you to answer me, and it will be to accept my offer, for if you do not accept it there is no use in our discussing it again. I do not advise you to think the matter over, for now that I have sown the seed of it in your soul you will find that you are no longer free either to consent to its realization or to oppose it. Neither hurrying, nor delaying, nor taking thought, you will but obey the will of God according to the irrevocable decree of your destiny. Such as I know you, you need only the companionship of Zelmi to make you happy. You will become—I foresee it—a pillar of the Ottoman Empire."

After this short harangue, Yusuf embraced me and to make certain that I would not answer him, he left me. I returned home with my mind so occupied with Yusuf's proposal that I was unconscious of making the journey. The Baili remarked that I was thoughtful, as did Monsieur de Bonneval two days later, and they asked me why; but I took good care not to tell them. I found that what Yusuf had said was only too true. This was a matter of such great importance that not only must I not confide it to anyone, I must myself abstain from thinking about it until the time came when I found my mind calm enough to be certain that the least breath could not affect the scales which were to decide my course. All my passions must be silent, and with them my preconceptions, my prejudices, and even some part of my self-interest. Waking the next morning and barely beginning to reflect on the subject, I realized that thinking about it could prevent me from deciding, and that if I was to decide it must be as the result of not having thought about it. It was a case of the Stoics' sequere Deum ("follow the God," "follow your destiny").[38] I did not go to see Yusuf for four days, and when I went on the fifth, we were very animated and did not even think of saying a word on the subject, which nevertheless could not but be in our minds. We spent two weeks in the same way; but since our silence on the matter arose neither from dissimulation nor from any determination incompatible with the friendship and esteem we felt for each other, he brought the conversation around to the proposal he had made me and said he imagined I had confided it to some wise man who would arm me with good counsel. I assured him that I had not, adding that in a matter of such importance I believed that I should take no one's advice.

"I have abandoned myself to God," I said, "and since I have perfect trust in him, I am sure that I shall make the right choice, whether I decide to become your son or to remain as I am. Meanwhile, reflection on the matter occupies my soul morning and night at those moments when, alone and communing with myself, it is most at peace. When I have made up my mind, it is to you alone, Pateramu,[34] that I will tell it, and from that moment you shall begin to exercise the authority of a father over me."

As I finished this exposition, I saw his eyes fill with tears. He put his left hand on my head and the second and third fingers of his right on the center of my forehead and told me to continue in the same course and I could be sure that I would not go wrong. I said that it might turn out that his daughter Zelmi did not like me.

"My daughter loves you," he answered; "she has seen you, and she sees you, in the company of my wife and of her governess, every time we dine together; and she greatly enjoys listening to what you say."

"But she does not know that you are thinking of making her my wife."

"She knows that I hope you will become a believer, so that I can unite her destiny with yours."

"I am very glad that you are forbidden to let me see her, for she might dazzle me, and then it would be passion which would tip the scales, and then I could not have the satisfaction of having decided in all the purity of my soul."

Yusuf's delight at my train of reasoning was extreme, and I was not speaking as a hypocrite but in perfect good faith. The mere thought of seeing Zelmi set me trembling. I felt certain that I should not have hesitated to become a Turk if she had made me fall in love with her; whereas I was no less certain that in a state of indifference I would never resolve upon a course which in any case did not appeal to me and which, on the contrary, presented me with a very unpleasant prospect both for the present and for my life in the future. For the sake of a wealth of which, if Fortune favored me, I could expect to find the equal anywhere in Europe without the disgrace of changing my religion, I thought that I should not be indifferent to the scorn of all those who knew me and whose esteem I sought. I could not bring myself to renounce the fair hope of achieving fame among polished nations, whether in the fine arts or in literature or in some other profession, and I could not bear the idea of abandoning to my equals triumphs which would perhaps fall to my share if I continued to live among them. I thought—and I was right—that the decision to assume the turban was such as only the desperate were justified in making, and I did not count myself among them. But what I could not stomach was the thought of going to live for a year in Adrianople to learn to speak a barbarous language for which I had no liking and which I therefore could have no hope of learning perfectly. I could not easily renounce my pride in being known as a fine conversationalist, a reputation which I had already acquired wherever I had stayed for any length of time. Then, too, it occurred to me that the charming Zelmi might prove not to be charming in my eyes; and that alone would be enough to make me unhappy, for Yusuf might live another twenty years, and I felt that respect and gratitude would never let me presume to mortify the good old man by ceasing to show his daughter the affection which was her due. Such were my thoughts, which Yusuf could not divine and which there was no need for me to impart to him.

Some days later I found Ismail Effendi also present when I dined with my dear Pasha Osman. He showed me friendly attentions, which I reciprocated, and I made light of the reproaches he addressed to me for not having come to breakfast with him again; but I could not avoid dining at his house once more, with Monsieur de Bonneval. I went on the appointed day, and after dinner enjoyed watching some handsome Neapolitan slaves of both sexes performing a farce in pantomime and dancing calabreselle.[35] Monsieur de Bonneval mentioned the Venetian dance called the furlana,[36] and Ismail wanting to know what it was like, I said that I could not show it to him without a woman of my own country to dance it with me and a fiddler who knew the tune. I then took a violin and played him the tune, but even if a dancing partner were found for me, I could not play and dance at once. Ismail then rose and spoke privately to a eunuch, who came back a few minutes later and whispered something to him. Ismail told me that my dancing partner was already found, and I answered that I would find the violinist too if he would send a note to the Venetian Embassy. It was soon done. I wrote the note, he sent it, and a half hour later one of the Bailo Donà's servants appeared with his violin. A moment later the door in the corner of the room opened, and I see a beautiful woman, her face concealed by an oval black velvet mask of the sort known in Venice as a moretta.[37] The appearance of the masker surprised and delighted the whole company, for it was impossible to imagine a more interesting object, both for the beauty of her figure and the elegance of her attire. The goddess strikes the opening pose, I join her, and we dance six furlane one after the other. I am now out of breath, for there is no national dance more violent; but the beauty still stands there, motionless and without the least sign of fatigue, as if to defy me. During the whirl, which is the most tiring part of the dance, she seemed to float; I was beside myself with amazement. I did not remember having seen the dance performed so well in Venice itself. After a brief rest, feeling a little ashamed of my weakness, I went to her and said: "Ancora sei, e poi basta, se non volete vedermi a morire." ("Six more, and an end, if you do not want to see me dying.") She might have answered me if she had been able, for with a mask of this sort it is impossible to utter a word; but a pressure of her hand which no one could see told me a great deal. After the second six furlane, the eunuch opened the same door and she vanished.

Ismail thanked me endlessly, but it was I who should have thanked him, for it was the only real pleasure I enjoyed in Constantinople. I asked him if the lady was a Venetian, but he answered only with a knowing smile. We all left toward nightfall.

"Our worthy host," Monsieur de Bonneval said, "was the dupe of his lavishness today, and I am sure he is already regretting that he had his beautiful slave dance with you. According to the Turkish notion, what he has done injured his dignity, and I advise you to be most careful, for you must certainly have found favor with the girl, who will therefore look for a way to draw you into an intrigue. Be prudent, for considering the stringency of Turkish customs, all intrigues are dangerous."

I promised him I would not enter into any intrigue, but I did not keep my word.

Three or four days later an old female slave whom I met in the street showed me a gold-embroidered tobacco pouch, offering to sell it to me for a piaster and putting it into my hands so that I could feel there was a letter inside it; I noticed that she avoided the eyes of my janissary, who was walking behind me. I paid her for the pouch; she made off, and I continued toward Yusuf's house, where, finding him not at home, I took a stroll in the garden. Since the letter was sealed and bore no address, and the slave might have made a mistake, my curiosity increased. Here is a translation of the letter, which was correctly written in good Italian: "If you are curious to see the person who danced the furlana with you, take a walk toward nightfall in the garden beyond the pool and make the acquaintance of the gardener's old servant by asking her for lemonade. You will perhaps see her without running any risk, even if you should happen to meet Ismail; she is Venetian; however, it is important that you tell no one of this invitation."

"I am not such a fool, my dear countrywoman," I exclaimed feelingly, as if she were present, and I put the letter in my pocket. But a handsome old woman appears from a shrubbery, comes up to me, asks me what I want and how I had happened to see her. I laughed and replied that I had been talking to myself, thinking that no one could hear me. She tells me point-blank that she is very glad to talk with me, that she is a Roman, and had brought Zelmi up and had taught her to sing and play the harp. She praises her pupil's beauties and fine qualities, and says that I would be sure to fall in love with her if I saw her, and that she was very sorry it was forbidden.

"She is watching us now," says she, "behind that green blind; and we have loved you from the time Yusuf told us that you could become Zelmi's husband as soon as you returned from Adrianople."

I asked her if I might tell Yusuf what she had just confided to me, and when she answered that I might not, I saw at once that if I urged her a little she would have decided to give me the pleasure of seeing her charming pupil. I could not tolerate even the thought of an action which could have displeased my dear host, but I was even more afraid of entering a labyrinth in which I could only too easily have lost my way. The turban which I seemed to see looming in the distance terrified me.

I saw Yusuf approaching me, and he showed no sign of being displeased at finding the Roman woman conversing with me. He congratulated me on the pleasure I must have taken in dancing with one of the beauties from the harem of the voluptuous Ismail.

"I suppose it must be a most unusual occurrence, since everyone is talking about it."

"It does not often happen, for the prejudice against exposing the beauties in our possession to the eyes of the envious is universal among us; but everyone may do as he chooses in his own house. And Ismail is a thorough gentleman and nobody's fool."

"Is it known with whom I danced?"

"That would be very unlikely. Besides, she was masked, and Ismail is known to have half a dozen slaves, all very beautiful."

We spent the day together as happily as usual; when I took my leave, I had my janissary conduct me to Ismail's house, which was on the same hillside.

I was known, so I was admitted. As I was making my way to the place indicated in the letter, the eunuch saw me and came to meet me, saying that Ismail had gone out but that he would be very glad when he learned that I had taken a walk in his grounds. I said I should like to drink a glass of lemonade, and he led me to the summer-house, where I recognized the old slave woman. At a word from the eunuch she handed me a glass of some delicious drink, but he would not let me hand her the silver piece I wanted to give her. After that we strolled about the pool; but the eunuch said we must turn back, pointing out three ladies whom good manners obliged us to avoid. I thanked him and asked him to convey my compliments to Ismail, then went home, not too dissatisfied with my excursion and hoping to have better luck another time.

No later than the next day I received a note from Ismail asking me to come the following day to go fishing with him with hook and line, coming toward evening so that we could fish by moonlight until late into the night. I immediately began hoping for what I desired. I imagined that Ismail was quite capable of arranging an interview with the Venetian girl for me, and my certainty that he would be present at it did not put me off. I asked the Cavaliere Venier for permission to spend the night away from the embassy, which he granted only with reluctance, for he feared an intrigue which might lead to some mishap. I could have calmed his fears by telling him the facts, but I thought that discretion was imperative.

Turk, who received me with the most cordial indications of friendship. I was surprised when, getting into the boat, I found that I was alone with him. He had two rowers and a steersman, and we caught a few fish, which we took to a summerhouse and ate there, grilled and seasoned with oil, in the moonlight which made the night brighter than day. Knowing his inclination, I was more subdued than usual; despite what Monsieur de Bonneval had told me, I was afraid he might take it into his head to give me the same sort of tokens of his affection as those he had tried to give me three weeks earlier and which I had received so ungraciously. His wanting to be alone with me seemed unnatural, and hence suspect. I could not get over my uneasiness. But here is the turn things took.

"Let us speak softly," he said suddenly. "I hear a certain sound from which I guess that something is about to happen which will amuse us."

He had scarcely said this when he dismisses his servants and, taking me by the hand:

"Let us conceal ourselves," he says, "in that garden house, of which I luckily have the key in my pocket; but let us not make the slightest sound. The garden house has a window which looks out on the pool, and I think that at this moment two or three of my young ladies have gone there to bathe. We will watch them, and it will be a very pretty sight, for they can have no idea that they are seen. They know that this place is inaccessible to anyone except myself."

So saying, and still leading me by the hand, he opens the door of the garden house; and we are in darkness. We see the whole length of the pool, lighted by the moon, which the shadow we were in prevented us from seeing; almost under our eyes we see three completely naked girls, now swimming, now coming out of the water to ascend some marble steps where, standing or sitting to dry off, they exhibited themselves in every conceivable posture. This charming spectacle could not fail to set me on fire at once, and Ismail, faint with delight, not only convinced me that I should not restrain myself, but encouraged me to surrender to the effects which the voluptuous sight could not but produce in my soul, by himself setting the example. Like him, I found myself reduced to making the best of the object beside me to extinguish the flame kindled by the three sirens, whom we saw now in the water, now out of it, and who, though they never looked at the window, seemed to be indulging in their voluptuous sports only to burn the spectators who were intently watching them through it. I chose to believe that such was the case, which gave me only the more pleasure, and Ismail triumphed when he found that his proximity condemned him to take the place of the distant object to which I could not attain. I also had to submit to his taking turnabout. It would have been impolite in me to refuse; then, too, I should have shown myself ungrateful, a thing which is not in my nature. Never in my life have I been so beside myself or so carried away. As I did not know which of the three nymphs was my Venetian, each of them had to play the part for me in turn, at the expense of Ismail, who seemed to have become calm. The worthy man refuted me in the pleasantest way possible and tasted the sweetest possible revenge, but if he wanted to be paid, he had to pay. I leave my reader the problem of calculating which of us profited most, for it seems to me that since Ismail had made all the expenditures the scales should tip to his side. For my part, I did not go back there again, and I told no one what had happened. The departure of the three sirens ended the orgy; as for us, since we did not know what to say to each other, we simply laughed. After pampering ourselves with some excellent preserves and drinking several cups of coffee, we parted. This was the only pleasure of the sort which I enjoyed at Constantinople, and imagination had a greater share in it than reality.

A few days later, having arrived at Yusuf's early and being prevented by a light rain from going to stroll in the garden, I entered the room where we usually dined and where I had never yet found anyone. On my appearance an attractive-looking woman rises and hastily covers her face with a heavy veil, letting it fall from where it was fixed above her forehead. A woman slave, who was seated with her back to us, working at an embroidery frame, does not stir. I apologize and make to leave; but she stops me, saying in good Italian and the voice of an angel that Yusuf, who had gone out, had charged her to entertain me. She tells me to sit down, pointing to a cushion placed on two larger ones, and I obey. At the same time she crosses her legs and seats herself on another, facing me. I felt certain that I was in the presence of Zelmi. I conclude that Yusuf must have resolved to convince me that he was no less daring than Ismail; but I am surprised that he should belie his principle by taking such a step, and should risk corrupting the purity of my consent to his plan by making me fall in love; but I felt I had nothing to fear for, to reach a decision, I had to see her face.

"I think," said the masker, "that you do not know who I am."

"I cannot even guess."

"I have been your friend's wife for five years, and I was born in Scio. I was thirteen when I was married to him."

Astonished though I was that Yusuf should have overcome his prejudices to the point of allowing me to converse with his wife, I felt more at ease and considered how I might best improve my good fortune, but I had to see her face. A beautiful clothed body, whose head is invisible, can only arouse desires which are easily satisfied; the fire it kindles is like burning straw. I saw an elegant and beautiful image; but I did not see its soul, for the veil concealed the eyes. I saw naked arms whose form and whiteness dazzled me, and hands like Alcina's, dove ne nodo appar ne vena eccede ("in which no knot appears nor vein stands out"),[38] and I imagined all the rest, of which the soft folds of the muslin could hide only the living surface from me, and knew that it must all be beautiful; but I needed to see in her eyes that all I was happily imagining was alive. The dress of the East delineates everything; indeed, it keeps nothing from desire, save as the fine glaze on a piece of Dresden china keeps the colors of the flowers and figures from being touched. The woman before me was not dressed in the garb of sultanas; like the Hyrcanians[39] of Scio she wore skirts which did not prevent me from seeing half of her legs, the shape of her thighs, the form of her swelling hips, which diminished into an admirably slender waist girt by a broad blue sash embroidered with silver arabesques. I saw a full bosom, whose slow and often irregular motion told me that the enchanting hillock was alive. The two small globes were separated by a narrow hollow, which seemed to me a rivulet of milk created to quench my thirst and for my lips to devour.

Beside myself with admiration, I almost involuntarily extend one arm, and my bold hand would have lifted her veil, if she had not pushed it away, risen to her full height, and, in a voice as imposing as her posture, reproached me for my perfidious temerity.

"Do you deserve Yusuf's friendship," she said, "when you violate hospitality by insulting his wife?"

"Signora, you must forgive me. Among us the lowest of men may fix his eyes on the face of a queen."

"But not tear away the veil which hid it from him. Yusuf shall avenge me."

Positive that her threat meant my ruin, I threw myself at her feet and talked to such purpose that she became calm, told me to sit down again, and sat down herself, crossing her legs in such a way that the disarrangement of her skirt gave me a moment's glimpse of charms which would have intoxicated me completely if they had been visible a moment longer. I now saw that I had made a mistake, and repented too late.

"You are on fire," she said.

"How can I be otherwise," I replied, "when you are burning me?"

Having learned wisdom, I was about to take her hand, dismissing any further thought of her face, when she says: "Here is Yusuf." He enters, we rise; he greets me with "Peace be with you," I thank him, the slave who was embroidering leaves, and he expresses his gratitude to his wife for having kept me entertained. At the same time he offers her his arm to take her back to her apartment. When she reaches the door she raises her veil and, kissing her husband, lets me see her profile, but she pretends not to be aware of it. I followed her with my eyes to the farthest room. Yusuf returns and says with a smile that his wife has offered to dine with us.

"I thought," I said, "that I was with Zelmi."

"That would have been too contrary to our rules of decorum. What I did is very little; but I cannot imagine a decent man thrusting his own daughter into the company of a stranger."

"I believe your wife is beautiful. Is she more beautiful than Zelmi?"

"My daughter's beauty is smiling and sweet. Sophia's is a haughty beauty. She will be happy after my death. The man who marries her will find her a virgin."

When I told Monsieur de Bonneval my adventure and dwelt on the risk I had run by trying to raise her veil,

"No," he answered, "you ran no risk, the Greek woman was only laughing at you with her tragicomic play-acting. Believe me, she was disappointed to find that she was dealing with a novice. You played a French farce when you should have played the man. What need had you to try to see her face? You should have gone straight to the point. If I were young I could probably avenge her and punish my friend Yusuf. You have given her a poor idea of Italian courage. The most reserved of Turkish women wears her modesty only on her face; as soon as that is covered, she is sure she will blush at nothing. I am sure this wife of Yusuf's keeps her face covered whenever he wants to have a little fun with her."

"She is a virgin."

"That is hardly possible, for I know these Scian women; but they have the skill to make people believe them virgins."

Yusuf did not pay me such a compliment again. A few days later he came into the shop of an Armenian as I was examining various articles which, thinking them too expensive, I was about to leave where they were. After looking at all the things which I had thought too expensive, Yusuf praised my taste; however, telling me that they were not at all too expensive, he bought the lot and left me. Early the next morning he sent them all to me as a present; but, to make it impossible for me to refuse them, he wrote me a charming letter saying that when I arrived at Corfu I would be informed to whom I was to deliver all the things he was sending me. There were rolls of Damascus cloth glazed with gold or silver, purses, portfolios, belts, scarves, handkerchiefs, and pipes. All together they were worth four or five hundred piasters. When I insisted on thanking him, I made him admit that he was making me a present of them.

The day before my departure I saw the good old man weep when I took leave of him; and my tears answered his. He said that by not accepting his offer I had so gained his esteem that he felt he could not have esteemed me more highly if I had accepted it. When I went on board ship with His Excellency the Bailo Giovanni Donà, I found a chest of presents from him. It contained two quintals of Mocha coffee, a hundred pounds of crab's-eye tobacco in the leaf, and two great flasks, one filled with Zapandi tobacco, the other with Camussades tobacco. Also a jasmine pipestem covered with gold filigree, which I sold in Corfu for a hundred zecchini. I could show him my gratitude only by a letter which I wrote him from Corfu, where the proceeds from the sale of his presents made me rich.

Ismail gave me a letter for the Cavaliere da Lezze, which I lost, and a cask of hydromel, which I also sold; Monsieur de Bonneval gave me a letter addressed to Cardinal Acquaviva, which I sent to him at Rome enclosed in one from me in which I told him the story of my journey; but His Eminence did not honor me with a reply. He also gave me a dozen bottles of malmsey from Ragusa and a dozen of genuine Scopolo wine.[40] The genuine Scopolo is very scarce. It provided a present which I made at Corfu and which was very useful to me, as will be seen in its proper place.

The only foreign minister whom I often saw in Constantinople, and who was extraordinarily kind to me, was His Lordship the Earl Marshal of Scotland, Keith,[41] who was in residence there for the King of Prussia. My acquaintance with him proved useful to me in Paris six years later. We will return to it.

We left at the beginning of September in the same warship by which we had come. We reached Corfu in two weeks, where His Excellency the Bailo declined to go ashore. He brought six splendid Turkish horses with him, one of which I found still alive at Görz in 1773.

Scarcely had I gone ashore with my few possessions and found a rather indifferent lodging before I waited on Signor Andrea[42] Dolfin, the Proveditor-General, who again assured me that I would be made a lieutenant at the first promotion. On leaving the Generalate,[43] I went to see Signor Camporese, my Captain. The general staff officers of my regiment were all away.

My third visit was to the Governor of Galleasses,[44] Signor D. R.,[45] to whom Signor Dolfin,[46] with whom I had arrived at Corfu, had recommended me. He at once inquired if I would come and serve him in the capacity of adjutant, and I did not hesitate for a moment before answering that I asked nothing better and that he would always find me obedient and quick to carry out his orders. He at once had me shown to the room he had designated for me, and no later than the next morning I was installed in it. My Captain gave me a French soldier[47] who had been a hairdresser, and with whom I was pleased because I needed practice in speaking French. He was a scapegrace, a drunkard and a debauchee, a peasant born in Picardy, who could scarcely write; but I did not care about that, all I needed was that he could speak. He was a clown, who knew any number of songs and funny stories, which made everyone laugh.

In three or four days I sold all the presents I had been given in Constantinople, and found myself possessed of almost five hundred zecchini. I kept only the wines. I recovered from the Jews all the things I had put in pawn when I was ruined by play before going to Constantinople, and sold them all; I was determined that I would no longer gamble as a dupe, but with all the advantages of which a prudent and intelligent young man can avail himself without being called a cheat. It is now time that I describe Corfu for my reader, to give him an idea of the life there. I will not speak of the place itself, about which anyone can obtain information.

In those days there was at Corfu the Proveditor-General, who exercises the authority of supreme ruler and lives magnificently; he was Signor Dolfin, then a septuagenarian, strict, stubborn, and ignorant; he was past caring for women, but he still liked having them pay court to him. He received every evening, and served supper at a table for twenty-four. There were three high officers of the light force[48] which is the force of galleys,[49] and three of the heavy force, as the force of ships is called. The light outranks the heavy. As each galley must have a commanding officer, called a sopracomito,[50] there were ten of these; and as each warship must have a commander, there were ten of these likewise, including the three capi di mar.[51] All these commanders were Venetian noblemen. Ten other Venetian noblemen, aged between twenty and twenty-two years, were noblemen of the fleet,[52] and were there to learn seamanship. Besides all these officers there were eight or ten other Venetian noblemen whose business on the island was to maintain order and administer justice; they were called high officers of "the Land." [53] Such of them as were married, if their wives were pretty, had the pleasure of seeing their houses frequented by the young men who aspired to their good graces; but there were no strong passions, for at Corfu in those days there were many courtesans, and since gaming was everywhere permitted, dalliance could not make much headway.

Among all the ladies the one who was most outstanding for her beauty and her intrigues was Signora F.[54] Her husband, the commander of a galley, had arrived at Corfu with her the year before; she dazzled all the officers and, considering that she had the right to choose, she gave the preference to Signor D. R. and their dismissal to all those who offered themselves as cicisbei.[55] Signor F. had married her the very day he had left Venice on his galley, and on the same day she had left the convent which she had entered at the age of seven. She was then seventeen. When I saw her across the table from me on the first day I took up residence in Signor D. R.'s house, she struck me with amazement. I thought I was seeing something supernatural, and so far above the women I had seen until then that I had no fear of falling in love with her. I thought that I was of a different species from hers and so much below her that I could see only the impossibility of my attaining to her. I at once thought that there was nothing between her and Signor D. R. except a cold friendship based on habit, and I concluded that Signor F. was right in not being jealous. In any case Signor F. was as stupid as possible. Such was the impression made on me by this beauty on the first day she appeared before my eyes; but it soon changed, and by a process which was wholly new to me.

My position as adjutant procured me the honor of eating with her; but that was all. My fellow adjutant, an ensign like myself and a fool of the first water, had the same honor; but we were not regarded as guests. Not only did no one ever speak to us, no one even looked at us. I could not put up with it. I knew perfectly well that it did not come from any conscious contempt; but even so I considered my situation very hard. I thought that Sansonio (such was my colleague's name) had no reason to complain of it, for he was an oaf; but I could not bear being treated in the same way myself. After a week or ten days, during which she never even glanced at my face, Signora F. began to displease me. I was the more piqued and angered and provoked because I could not suppose that she was avoiding my eyes deliberately. I should not have minded that. But I was convinced that, for her, I was nothing. It was too much. I knew that I was something, and I meant that she should know it too. At last an occasion arose when she thought it necessary to say a word to me, which naturally obliged her to look me in the face.

Signor D. R., having noticed the excellence of a roast turkey which had been placed before me, told me to carve it, and I set to work at once. I cut it into sixteen pieces and then saw that, having done it badly, I stood in need of indulgence; but Signora F., who could not suppress her laughter, looked at me and said that since I was not sure I could carve it properly, I should have let it alone. Not knowing what to answer, I blushed, I sat down, and

I hated her. One day, an occasion arising when she had to mention my name, she asked me what it was, though she ought to have known it since I had been living in Signor D. R.'s house for two weeks, to say nothing of the fact that my constant luck at cards had already made me well known. I had given my money to the town-major of the place, one Maroli, a professional gambler, who held the faro bank at the coffeehouse. I went halves with him, and I served him as croupier;[56] he did the same when I dealt, which happened very often since the punters did not like him. He held the cards in a way which made people afraid of him, whereas I did just the opposite; also, I was very lucky, and, in addition to that, my manner was easy and I smiled when I was losing and looked unhappy when I was winning. It was Maroli who had won all my money from me before I left for Constantinople; finding, on my return, that I was determined to play cards no more, he thought me worthy of being taught the wise precepts without which games of chance ruin all their devotees. However, since I was by no means confident of Maroli's good faith, I remained wary. Every night when we had finished dealing we made up the account, and the dealing box remained in the cashier's hands; after dividing the cash we had won, we went home to empty our purses.

Lucky at play, in good health, and liked by all my colleagues, who, when the occasion arose, never found me stingy, I should have been very content with my lot if I had only been a little more considered at Signor D. R.'s table and treated less haughtily by his lady, who, for no reason at all, seemed to take pleasure in humiliating me every now and again. I detested her and when, admiring her perfections, I reflected on the feeling of hatred she had inspired in me, I judged her not only impertinent but stupid, for I admitted to myself that it would have been completely in her power to conquer my heart, even without loving me. I wanted nothing but that she should stop obliging me to hate her. I thought it extraordinary, for if she was doing it deliberately, she could not possibly gain anything by it.

Nor could I attribute her behavior to a spirit of coquetry, for I had never given her the least indication of the extent to which I did her justice, or to a passion for someone which might have made me odious in her eyes, for even Signor D. R. did not interest her, while, as for her husband, she treated him like a nonentity. In short, the young woman was making me wretched, and I was angry at myself, for I concluded that, but for my feeling of hatred for her, I should never have given her a thought. This discovery that my soul was full of hatred made me dislike myself; I had never before found myself capable of such savagery.

"What do you do with your money?" she asked me point-blank one day after dinner when someone was paying me a sum which he had lost on his word.

"I keep it, Signora," I answered, "to offset my future losses."

"Since you spend no money, you would do better not to play, for you waste your time."

"Time spent in amusing oneself cannot be called wasted. The time to be shunned is time spent in boredom. A young man who is bored lays himself open to the misfortune of falling in love, and of being scorned."

"That may be so; but by finding your amusement in being the banker of your own money you declare yourself a miser, and a miser is no more to be esteemed than a lover. Why don't you buy yourself a pair of gloves?"

This brought a general burst of laughter, and I felt like a fool. She was right. It was an adjutant's duty to conduct a lady to her sedan chair or her carriage when she left, and in Corfu he did her this service by holding up her skirt with his left hand and putting his right under her arm. Without gloves the sweat from his hand might dirty her. I felt mortified, and the accusation of avarice pierced my soul. To attribute it to a faulty upbringing would have been to do me a kindness. To avenge myself, instead of buying gloves, I adopted the course of avoiding her, abandoning her to the stale gallantries of Sansonio, who had rotten teeth, a blond wig, a dirty complexion, and a stinking breath. But I remained chagrined and furious over my inability to stop hating this young woman, whom I could not dislike with a clear conscience, for in my calmer moments I could find no fault in her. She did not hate me and she did not love me, that was all; and, being very young and fond of a laugh, she had chosen me to amuse herself with, as she might with a jumping jack. Could I accept such a role? I wanted to punish her, to make her repent, and I hatched the most cruel schemes of revenge. The project of making her fall in love with me and then treating her like a trollop was one of them; but when I thought about it I dismissed it as beneath contempt, for I knew that I should not have the heart to resist the force of her charms, still less her advances if it should come to that. But now for a stroke of fate which changed my situation completely.

Immediately after dinner Signor D. R. sent me to Signor Condulmer, Captain of the Galleasses, to take him some letters and await his orders. This Capo di mar made me wait until midnight, so that when I got home, finding that Signor D. R. had already retired, I also went to bed. The next morning I entered his room when he woke to report to him on my errand. A minute later his valet comes in and hands him a note, saying that Signora F.'s adjutant was waiting outside for his answer. The valet gone, Signor D. R. unseals the note and reads. After reading, he tears it up and, in his fury, stamps on it, then walks up and down the room, and finally writes an answer, seals it, and rings for his valet to show in the adjutant, to whom he hands it. Then, to all appearances perfectly calm, he finishes reading what the Capo di mar had sent him, then orders me to copy out a letter. He was reading it when the valet entered and told me that Signora F. had occasion to speak with me. Signor D. R. said that I had no further business with him and that I might go and see what the Signora had to say to me. I leave, and he calls me back to warn me that it was my duty to be discreet. I did not need the warning. I hasten to Signora F.'s, at a loss to imagine why she had sent for me. I had been there several times, but never in answer to a summons from her. She kept me waiting only a minute. I enter, and am surprised to find her sitting up in bed, flushed, pretty as a picture, but with her eyes swollen and their whites reddish. She had been crying, there was no doubt of it. My heart was beating furiously, and I did not know why.

"Take that chair," she said, "for I must talk to you."

"I will listen to you standing, Signora, for I am unworthy of such a favor."

She did not press me, perhaps remembering that she had never shown me such politeness and had never received me when she was in bed. After thinking for a moment:

"My husband," she said, "last evening lost two hundred zecchini to your bank at the coffeehouse on his word, thinking that they were in my hands and that he could pay them immediately; but I have made use of the money and hence must find the sum for him. It occurred to me that you could tell Maroli that my husband had paid you the amount he lost. Here is a ring, keep it, and give it back to me the first of the year when I will pay you the two hundred ducati, for which I will now write you my note of hand."

"I will accept your note, Signora, but I do not want to deprive you of your ring. Permit me to tell you, furthermore, that Signor F. must pay the money directly to the bank, or send someone there with it, and in ten minutes I will be back here to put the amount in your hands."

After saying which, I did not wait for her to answer. I left, returned to Signor D. R.'s, put two rolls of a hundred in my pocket, and took them to her, pocketing the note in which she undertook to pay me that amount the first of the year.

When she saw me about to leave, she addressed me in these words:

"If I had foreseen that you would be so ready to oblige me, I believe I could not have brought myself to ask this favor of you."

"Well, Signora, in future you may foresee that there is not a man in the world who could refuse you so slight a favor, provided that you asked it of him in person."

"What you say is very flattering to me; but I hope I shall never again in my life be under the cruel necessity of making the experiment."

I left, thinking of the subtlety of her answer. She had not said that I was mistaken, as I expected her to do; that would have compromised her. She knew that I was in Signor D. R.'s room when her adjutant brought him her note, and that I must be certain that she had asked him for the two hundred zecchini, which he had refused her, and she said not a word to me about it. God! how that pleased me! I saw it all. I saw that she was jealous of her dignity, and I adored her. I became convinced that she could not love Signor D. R. and that he did not love her either, and my heart rejoiced in the discovery. From that day I began to fall desperately in love with her and to hope that I should succeed in winning her heart.

I had scarcely reached my room before I crossed out, in even blacker ink, everything that Signora F. had written in her note of hand except her name; then I sealed it, took it to a notary, and deposited it with him, having him give me a receipt in which he undertook to deliver the sealed note to no one but Signora F., upon her demand and into her own hands. That evening Signor F.

came to my bank, paid me the amount, played for cash, and won three or four dozen zecchini. What struck me in all this pretty adventure was that Signor D. R. continued to be as gracious as ever toward Signora F., and she toward him, and that he did not ask me what she had wanted of me when he next saw me after I got back; but from then on she changed her behavior toward me completely. She no longer sat opposite me at table without addressing a word to me, but often asked me questions which obliged me to make critical comments in a humorous style but keeping a straight face. The art of making people laugh without laughing myself was my great talent in those days. I had learned it from Signor Malipiero, my first master. "To make people cry," he would tell me, "one must cry oneself, and one must not laugh when one wishes to make people laugh." In all that I did and all that I said when Signora F. was present, I thought of nothing but pleasing her; but as I never looked at her without some reason for it, I never gave her any certain evidence that my sole aim was to please her. I wanted to force her to become curious, to suspect the truth, to guess my secret. I needed to proceed cautiously, and I had all the time in the world. Meanwhile I was delighted to see that money and good behavior gained me a consideration which I could not expect either from my position or my age or from any talent in keeping with the profession on which I had embarked.

Toward the middle of November my French soldier came down with pneumonia. Captain Camporese had him taken to the hospital as soon as I notified him. On the fourth day he told me that he would not recover, and that he had already received the last sacraments; and toward evening I was at his house when the priest who had commended his soul to God came to announce that he had died, handing him a small packet which the dead man had entrusted to him before his last agony, stipulating that he should not deliver it to the Captain until he was dead. It contained a brass seal bearing a coat of arms surrounded by a ducal mantling, a baptismal certificate, and a sheet of paper on which, since the Captain did not know French, I read the following, written in a very poor hand and spelled any which way:

"I intend that this paper which I have written and signed with my own hand shall not be placed in the hands of my Captain until I am well and duly dead: otherwise my confessor may not make any use of it, for I entrust it to him only under the sacred seal of confession. I ask my Captain, then, to have me buried in a vault, from which my body can be exhumed if the Duke my father should ask for it. I further ask him to send the French Ambassador at Venice my baptismal certificate, the seal with the arms of my family, and a certificate of my death in proper form, for him to send to His Grace the Duke, my father; my right of primogeniture having now to pass to the Prince my brother. In testimony of which my signature, François VI, Charles, Philippe, Louis FOUCAULD, Prince of LA ROCHEFOUCAULD."

The baptismal certificate, issued at Saint-Sulpice,[57] gave the same name, and that of the ducal father was François V. The mother's name was Gabrielle du Plessis.

When I finished reading this I could not hold back a great burst of laughter; but seeing that my stupid Captain considered my merriment quite out of place and was preparing to hasten off and communicate the matter to the Proveditor-General, I left him and went to the coffeehouse, certain that His Excellency would scoff at him and that the extravagance of the joke would set everyone in Corfu laughing. At Cardinal Acquaviva's in Rome I had known the Abbé de Liancourt, great grandson of Charles, whose sister Gabrielle du Plessis had been the wife of François V; but that had been at the beginning of the preceding century. In the Cardinal's secretariat I had copied out an item which the Abbé de Liancourt needed to communicate to the Court of Madrid and in which there were some other particulars concerning the house of Du Plessis. In any case, I thought La Valeur's imposture as absurd as it was strange, for since the whole matter was not to be known until he was dead, it could be of no possible use to him.

A half hour later, just as I was opening a new pack of cards, Adjutant Sansonio enters and relates the important piece of news in the most serious tone. He had just come from the Proveditor-General's, where he had seen Camporese arrive breathless and hand over the dead man's seal and papers to His Excellency. His Excellency had immediately given orders that the prince should be buried in a private vault, with the funeral ceremonies suitable to his birth. A half hour later Signor Minotto, the Proveditor-General's adjutant, came to tell me that His Excellency wished to speak with me. At the end of the deal, I give the cards to Major Maroli and go to the Proveditor's. I find His Excellency at table with the ranking ladies and three or four naval commanders; I see Signora F. and Signor D. R.

"So!" the old General[58] said, addressing me, "your servant was a prince."

"I should never have guessed it, Monsignore, and even now I do not believe it."

"What! He is dead and he was not insane. You have seen his baptismal certificate, his arms, the document in his hand. When a man is on his deathbed he is not inclined to play jokes."

"If His Excellency believes that all this is true, the respect which I owe him makes it my duty to be silent."

"It cannot but be true, and I am amazed that you doubt it."

"The reason, Monsignore, is that I am well informed concerning both the La Rochefoucauld and the Du Plessis families; besides which, I knew the man too well. He was not insane, but he was an extravagant jester. I never saw him write, and he has told me twenty times that he never learned to.''

''The document in his hand proves the contrary. His seal with the ducal mantling—perhaps you are unaware that Monsieur de la Rochefoucauld is a duke and peer of France.''

''I beg your pardon, Monsignore, I know all that, and even more, for I know that François VI[59] married a Mademoiselle de Vivonne.''

''You know nothing.''

At this pronouncement I condemned myself to silence. It was with pleasure that I saw all the men present delighted to see me humiliated by the words: ''You know nothing.'' An officer said that the dead man was handsome, that he had a look of nobility and a fine intelligence, and that he had played his part with such discretion that no one could ever have imagined he was what he was. A lady said that if she had known him she would have unmasked him. Another toady said that he was always in high spirits, never haughty to his fellows, and that he sang like an angel.

''He was twenty-five years old,'' said Signora Sagredo, looking at me, ''and if it is true that he had these qualities, you must have seen them in him.''

''I can only describe him for you, Signora, as he appeared to me: Always in high spirits, sometimes extravagantly so, for he would turn somersaults, singing licentious songs, and commanding an amazing stock of popular tales of magic and miracles and marvelous feats which offended common sense and which for that very reason could raise a laugh. His faults were being a drunkard, dirty, licentious, quarrelsome, and a bit of a rogue; but I put up with him because he dressed my hair well, and because I wanted to accustom myself to speaking French idiomatically, in accordance with the genius of the language. He always told me that he was from Picardy, the son of a peasant, and a deserter. When he told me he could not write, he may have been deceiving me."

Just as I was saying this, in comes Camporese and tells His Excellency that La Valeur was still breathing. The General then looks at me and says he would be delighted if he recovered from his illness.

"So should I, Monsignore; but his confessor will certainly kill him during the night."

"Why should you think he will kill him?"

"To escape the galleys, to which Your Excellency will sentence him for violating the seal of confession."

There was a burst of laughter, and the old General drew down his black brows and scowled. When the gathering dispersed, Signora F., whom I had preceded to her carriage since Signor D. R. was giving her his arm, told me to get in, saying that it was raining. It was the first time she had done me so great an honor.

"I think as you do," she said, "but you have displeased the General in the highest degree."

"It is a misfortune I could not avoid, Signora, for I cannot lie."

"You might," said Signor D. R., "have spared the General your excellent joke about the confessor killing the prince."

"I thought he would laugh at it, as I saw Your Excellency and the Signora laugh. Humor that rouses laughter is generally welcome."

"But not to those who have no sense of humor."

"I wager a hundred zecchini that the clown will recover and that, having the General on his side, he will reap the benefits of his imposture. I can hardly wait to see him treated as a prince and paying court to Signora Sagredo."

On hearing the lady's name, Signora F., who did not like her, burst out laughing; and as we got out of the carriage Signor D. R. told me to come up. It was his habit, when he supped with her at the General's, to spend half an hour alone with her at her house, for Signor F. never put in an appearance. So it was the first time that this noble couple were admitting a third person; I was delighted with the distinction and was far from thinking it inconsequential. The satisfaction which I felt, and was obliged to hide, could not be allowed to keep me from giving a gay, humorous turn to all the subjects which the Signore and the Signora brought up. Our trio continued for four hours. We went back home to Signor D. R.'s at two in the morning. It was on this night that Signor D. R. and Signora F. came to know me. Signora F. told Signor D. R. that she had never laughed so much, or believed that words alone could arouse so much laughter.

The fact is that her laughing at everything I said made me find her infinitely witty, and that her vivacity roused such a passion in me that I went to bed convinced I could no longer play my role of indifference toward her.

When I woke the next morning the new soldier who had come to wait on me told me that not only was La Valeur better but the doctor at the hospital had pronounced him out of danger. The news was discussed at table, and I did not open my lips. The next day but one he was taken, at the General's order, to a very decent apartment, where he was given a lackey; he was provided with a suit and shirts, and after the too indulgent Proveditor-General paid him a visit, all the capi di mar did likewise, not excepting Signor D. R. Curiosity played a part in this. Signora Sagredo went, and after that all the ladies wanted to make his acquaintance, except Signora F., who laughed and told me that she would not go unless I would be so good as to present her. I begged her to excuse me. He was addressed as "Your Highness," and he called Signora Sagredo his princess. I told Signor D. R., who tried to persuade me to go, that I had said too much to have either the courage or the baseness to recant. The whole imposture would have been discovered if anyone had had a copy of the French peerage book, which gives the genealogy of all the great French houses; but nobody owned one, and even the French consul, a blockhead of the first water, knew nothing about it. The fool began going out a week after his metamorphosis. He dined and supped at the General's table and attended his reception every evening, where he fell asleep because he was drunk. Despite all this he was still believed to be a prince, for two reasons: first, because he waited fearlessly for the answer the General was to receive from Venice, to which he had written at once; second, because he petitioned the Bishop's palace to inflict a severe punishment on the priest who, by violating the seal of confession, had betrayed his secret. The priest was already in prison, and the General did not have the strength of mind to defend him. All the capi di mar had invited him to dinner, but Signor D. R. did not dare to because Signora F. had told him in so many words that on that day she would dine in her own house. I had already respectfully informed him that on the day he invited him I should be absent from his table.

One day as I was coming out of the old fort, I met him[60] on the bridge which leads to the esplanade. He stops in front of me and makes me laugh by loftily reproaching me with never having come to see him. I stop laughing to tell him he should think of running away before the answer came from which the General would learn the truth and give him a bad time. I offer to help him and to arrange for the captain of a Neapolitan vessel, which was ready to sail, to take him aboard and hide him. Instead of accepting my offer, the wretched creature treats me to some insults.

The lady to whom the clown was paying court was Signora Sagredo, who, her pride soaring because a French prince had recognized her superiority to all the other ladies, treated him well. The same lady, at a large dinner party at Signor D. R.'s, asked me why I had advised the prince to run away.

"He told me about it himself," she said; "he is amazed at your obstinacy in considering him an impostor."

"I gave him the advice, Signora, because I have a kind heart and a clear head."

"Then we are all fools, including the General?"

"The conclusion is unsound, Signora. To hold a different opinion from someone else does not make one a fool. It is possible that in a week or ten days I shall find that I was wrong; but that will not make me think myself more of a fool than anyone else. In the meanwhile a lady of your intelligence may well have discovered whether the man is a prince or a peasant from his manners and his education. Does he dance well?"

"Not a step; but he does not care. He says he never wanted to learn."

"Is he mannerly at table?"

"He is no stickler for manners. He doesn't want his plate changed; he eats from the dish in the middle of the table with his own spoon. He does not know how to stifle a belch; he yawns, and he is the first to rise when he feels like it. It's perfectly simple, he has been badly brought up."

"But pleasant company, for all that, or so I must believe. Is he clean?"

"No, but he is not yet sufficiently provided with linen."

"I hear he is sober."

"You are joking. He gets up from the table drunk twice a day; but in that respect he is to be pitied. He cannot drink wine without its going to his head. He swears like a hussar, and we laugh; but he never takes offense at anything."

"Is he intelligent?"

"He has a prodigious memory, for he tells us new stories every day."

"Does he talk of his family?"

"A great deal about his mother, of whom he is very fond. She is a Du Plessis."

"If she is still alive she must, take or leave a year or two, be a hundred and fifty."

"What nonsense!"

"Yes, Signora. She was married in the days of Maria de' Medici." [61]

"But his baptismal certificate gives her name; but his seal[62] . . ."

"Does he know what arms his escutcheon bears?"

"Do you doubt it?"

"I believe he does not know the first thing about it."

The whole company rose from table. A moment afterward the prince is announced and arrives at the same instant, whereupon Signora Sagredo addresses him with:

"Casanova is certain, my dear Prince, that you do not know your arms."

At these words, he bears down on me, sneering, calls me a coward, and gives me a backhanded smack on the face which disorders my hair and astonishes me. I leave the room slowly, taking my hat and cane on the way, and go down the staircase, hearing Signor D. R. loudly ordering that the clown be thrown out of the window.

I leave the house and walk toward the esplanade to wait for him, but seeing him come out by the side door, I start down the street, certain that I shall meet him. I see him, I run up to him, and begin giving him blows fit to kill him in a corner formed by two walls which, affording him no escape, left him with no resource but to draw his sword; but it never occurred to him. I left him only when I saw him stretched on the ground and covered with blood. The crowd of onlookers divided to let me pass, and I went to the coffeehouse in the Spilea[63] quarter to wash down my bitter saliva with an unsugared lemonade. In four or five minutes I found myself surrounded by all the young officers of the garrison, who, since they did nothing but tell me with one voice that I should have killed him, began to annoy me; for I had handled him in such a manner that if he was not dead it was not my fault. I should perhaps have killed him if he had drawn his sword.

A half hour later, up comes one of the General's adjutants, with an order from His Excellency that I should put myself under arrest on board the bastarda.[64] This is the usual name for the flagship of the galleys, arrest on which means having one's feet chained like a convict. I answer that I had understood the message and he goes his way. I leave the coffeehouse; but when I reach the end of the street, instead of going toward the esplanade I turn to the left and proceed along the shore. After walking for a quarter of an hour I see a moored boat with two oars and no one in it. I get in; I untie it, and I row toward a big six-oared caïque[65] which was going to windward. Reaching it, I ask the carabuchiri[66] to sail with the wind and put me aboard a big fishing vessel which was in sight and heading for the rock island of Vido.[67] I leave my boat to drift. After paying liberally for my caïque, I board the big vessel and haggle with the captain for passage. As soon as we were agreed he spreads three sails and, with a fresh breeze, he tells me two hours later that we are fifteen miles from Corfu. The wind falling suddenly, I made him row against the current. Toward midnight they told me that they could not fish without a wind, and that they were exhausted. They say that I can sleep until dawn, I refuse. I pay a small sum and have myself put ashore, not asking what the place is for fear of arousing their suspicion. All I knew was that I was twenty miles from Corfu, and in a place where no one could suppose me to be. All that I saw by the moonlight was a small church adjoining a house, a long roofed shelter open at both ends, and, beyond a hundred paces of level ground, mountains. I stayed in the shelter until dawn, sleeping quite comfortably on straw despite the cold. It was the first of December; but despite the mildness of the climate, as I had no cloak and was wearing too light a uniform, I was chilled to the bone.

Hearing bells ringing, I go to the church. The long-bearded papa,[68] surprised at my sudden appearance, asks me in Greek if I am Romeo, Greek; I answer that I am Fragico, Italian;[69] and he turns his back on me and will hear no more. He goes into his house and shuts the door.

I turn toward the sea and see a boat leaving a tartan anchored a hundred paces from the island and making its way with four oars to disembark its passengers just where I was standing. I see a decent-looking Greek, a woman, and a boy ten or twelve years old. I ask the man if he has had a good journey and from where. He answers in Italian that he has come from Cephalonia[70] with his wife and son, the woman and the boy whom I saw before me, and is on his way to Venice; but that before going there he had come to hear mass at Our Lady of Casopo[71] to find out if his father-in-law is still living and if he will pay him his wife's dowry.

"How will you find that out?"

"From Papa Deldimopulo, who will faithfully transmit the Holy Virgin's oracle."

I bow my head; I follow him to the church. He speaks with the papa; he gives him money. The papa says mass, he enters the sancta sanctorum, he comes out a quarter of an hour later, goes up to the altar again, turns toward us, meditates, and, after setting his long beard to rights, he delivers his oracle in ten or twelve words. The Greek from Cephalonia, who was certainly no Ulysses, gives the impostor more money, looking completely satisfied, and leaves him. As I walk toward the boat with the Greek, I ask him if he is satisfied with the oracle.

"Perfectly satisfied. I know that my father-in-law is alive and that he will pay me the dowry if I will leave my son with him. I knew that it was his greatest desire, and I will leave him the boy."

"Does this papa know you?"

"Not even my name."

"Have you fine wares on your ship?"

"Fine enough. Come and breakfast with me and you shall see them all."

"Gladly."

Delighted to have learned that there are still oracles, and certain that there will be so long as there are Greek priests in the world, I accompany the worthy man aboard his tartan, where he orders a good breakfast. His merchandise consisted of cotton, linens, currants, oil, and excellent wines. He also had stockings, cotton nightcaps, cloaks with hoods in the Eastern fashion, umbrellas, and ration biscuits, which I liked very much since I then had thirty teeth, a finer set of which it would be hard to see. Of those thirty teeth, only two are left me today; twenty-eight have gone their way along with several other tools; but "dum vita superest, bene est" ("so long as life remains, all is well"[72]). I bought some of everything except cotton, with which I would not have known what to do; and, without haggling, paid him the thirty-five or forty zecchini he said it was worth. He then presented me with six magnificent botargos.[73]

Hearing me praise a wine from Zante which he called "Generoydes,"[74] he said that if I would accompany him to Venice he would give me a bottle of it every day, even during all our time in quarantine. Always a little superstitious, and so taking his invitation for a command from God, I was on the verge of accepting it for the most stupid of reasons: that this strange resolve would be wholly unpremeditated. Such I was, but unfortunately I am a different man today. The usual explanation is that age brings wisdom. I do not understand how anyone can like the effect of an accursed cause.

Just as I was on the point of taking him at his word, he offers me a fine gun for ten zecchini, assuring me that in Corfu anyone would offer me twelve for it. At the word "Corfu" I seemed to hear my same God ordering me to return there. I bought the gun, and the worthy Cephalonian gave me a beautiful Turkish gamebag, well supplied with lead and powder, into the bargain. I wished him a good voyage and, with my gun under an excellent cloak, and all that I had bought stowed in a sack, I went back to the beach, determined that the scoundrelly papa should lodge me, willingly or unwillingly. The lift which the Greek's wine had given me was to have consequences. In my pockets I had five or six hundred copper gazzette,[75] which I found very heavy; but I had had to get a supply of them. It was easy to foresee that I might need such small coins on the island of Casopo.

So, after putting my sack in the shelter, I proceed, with my gun on my shoulder, to the papa's house. The church was closed. But I must now give my readers a sufficient idea of what I was at that moment. I was calmly desperate. The three or four hundred zecchini I had in my purse could not prevent me from thinking that, where I stood, I did not have a leg to stand on; that I could not remain there long, that it would soon be discovered that I was there, and that, having deliberately defaulted to begin with, I should be treated accordingly. I was unable to make a decision, and that alone is enough to make any situation intolerable. I could not go back to Corfu of my own free will without being called a fool, for by going back I should give incontestable proof of inconsistency or of cowardice, and I did not have the courage to desert in good earnest. The chief cause for this moral impotence was neither the thousand zecchini I had entrusted to the cashier of the principal coffeehouse, nor my wardrobe, which was quite well stocked, nor fear of not being able to make a living elsewhere; it was Signora F. whom I adored, and whose hand I had not yet kissed. In this quandary I could only abandon myself to the demands of the moment. And at that moment I must think of finding a lodging and something to eat.

I knock loudly on the door of the priest's house. He comes to the window and, not waiting for me to speak, shuts it again. I knock again, I swear, I raise a racket, no one answers, and in my fury I fire my gun at the head of a sheep which was grazing with several others some twenty paces away. The shepherd shouts, the papa appears at the window, shouting "thieves," and at once orders the alarm rung. I see three bells ringing together. I foresee a general gathering, what will happen I have no idea. I reload my gun.

Eight or ten minutes later I see a great crowd of peasants coming down the mountain, armed with guns or pitchforks or long pikes. I withdraw into the shelter, and I do not feel afraid, for I think it unlikely that, since I am alone, these fellows will kill me without hearing what I have to say.

The first to come running up were ten or twelve youths with their guns at the ready. I stop them by pelting them with handfuls of gazzette, which they pick up and which amaze them, and I continue to do the same to the other squads as they come up, until I have no more gazzette and see no more people coming. The bumpkins stood there gaping, not knowing what action to take against a peaceable-looking young man who was throwing away his wealth in such a fashion. I could not speak until the deafening bells stopped ringing; but the shepherd, the papa, and his beadle interrupted me all the more easily because I was speaking Italian. All three of them talked at the same time to the mob. I sat down on my sack and remained there, perfectly calm.

One of the peasants, a sensible-looking man of advanced age, comes toward me and asks me in Italian why I had killed a sheep.

"To eat it after I have paid for it."

"But His Holiness can ask a zecchino for it."

The papa takes it and goes, and the whole fracas is over. The peasant who had spoken to me tells me that he had served in the war of the year '16,[76] and had defended Corfu. I congratulate him, and ask him to find me a comfortable lodging and a good servant who can cook for me. He answers that he can get me a whole house and that he will cook for me himself, but that I shall have to climb. I accept, and we set off uphill, followed by two tall youths one of whom carries my sack and the other my sheep. I tell the man that I want twenty-four youths like those two in my service, under military discipline, and will pay them twenty gazzette a day, with forty for himself as my lieutenant. He answers that I have come to the right person and that he will raise me a military guard with which I will be well satisfied.

We come to a very comfortable house, where I had, on the ground floor, three rooms, a kitchen, and a long stable, which I at once transformed into a guardroom. He left me to procure everything I needed, first of all a woman to make some shirts for me at once. It all arrived during the course of the day: bedding, furniture, a good dinner, pots and pans, twenty-four youths each with his gun, and an aged seamstress with young apprentices to cut out and sew shirts. After supper I was in the best humor imaginable in this company of thirty people, who treated me like a king and were at a loss to understand what could have brought me to their island. The only thing which irked me was that the girls did not speak Italian: I knew too little Greek to hope to improve their ideas by speech.

I did not see my guard mounted until the next morning. God, how I laughed! My fine soldiers were all palicari,[77] but a company of soldiers without uniforms and without discipline is comic. It looks worse than a flock of sheep. However, they learned to present arms and to obey their officers' orders. I posted three sentinels, one at the guardroom, another at the door of my bedroom, and the third at the foot of the mountain, whence he could see the beach. He was to warn us if he saw any armed ship arriving. For the first two or three days I thought I was merely having some fun; but I ceased to think it a joke when I saw that the time must come when I should have to use force to defend myself against force. I considered making my men swear allegiance to me; but I decided against it. My lieutenant assured me that I had only to say the word. My generosity had won me the love of the whole island. The woman who cooked for me, the same who had found me seamstresses to make my shirts, expected that I would fall in love with one of them, but not with them all; I outdid her expectations, she procured me the favors of all the ones who took my fancy, and she found me grateful. I was living a life of pure bliss, for my table was exquisite too. I ate nothing but juicy mutton, and woodcock of which I did not eat the like again until twenty-four years later in Petersburg. I drank nothing but Scopolo wine and the best muscats from the islands of the Archipelago. My lieutenant was my only companion at table. I never walked abroad without him and without two of my palicari, who followed me to defend me from some youths who bore me a grudge because they imagined that their mistresses, who were my seamstresses, had left them for my sake. It occurred to me that without money I should have been unhappy; but there is no way of knowing if, without money, I should have dared to leave Corfu.

When a week had passed and I was at table three hours before midnight, I heard the challenge of my sentinel at the guardroom, "Piosine aftou?"[78] My lieutenant goes out, and returns a moment later saying that a reliable man who spoke Italian had come to tell me something important. I have him brought in and, in the presence of my lieutenant, he surprises me by gloomily uttering the following words:

"Day after tomorrow, which is Sunday, the most holy Papa Deldimopulo will blast you with the cataramonachia.[79] If you do not stop him, a slow fever will send you to the other world in six weeks."

"I have never heard of such a drug."

"It is not a drug. It is a curse, fulminated with the Blessed Sacrament in hand, which has such a power."

"What reason can the priest have for murdering me in this fashion?"

"You are troubling the peace and order of his parish. You have made off with several virgins, whom their former suitors no longer wish to marry."

After offering him a drink and thanking him, I wished him good night. I thought the matter of some consequence, for if I did not believe in the cataramonachia, I believed strongly in poisons. At daybreak the next day, which was Saturday, I set off without a word to my lieutenant and made my way alone to the church, where I surprised the papa with the following words:

"At the first touch of fever that I feel, I will blow out your brains, so mind what you are about. Put a curse on me that will kill me in a day, or make your will. Farewell."

After giving him this warning, I returned to my palace. Very early on Monday he came to return my visit. I had a headache. On his asking me how I felt, I told him; but I could not help laughing when I saw him hasten to assure me, on his oath, that it was caused by the heavy air of the island of Casopo.

On the third day after his visit, just as I was sitting down at table, the sentinel at the advanced post, who could see the seashore, raises the alarm. My lieutenant goes out, and four minutes later returns and tells me that an officer had disembarked from an armed felucca which had just arrived. After ordering my troop armed, I go out and I see an officer, accompanied by a peasant, coming up the mountain toward my quarters. His hat was pulled down, and he was busy with his cane, pushing aside the shrubs that blocked his way. He was alone; so, having nothing to fear, I go to my room and order my lieutenant to pay him the honors of war and show him in. I put on my sword and wait for him, standing.

He enters and I see that it is the same Adjutant Minotto who had ordered me to go to the bastarda.

"You are alone," I said, "so you come as a friend. Let us embrace."

"I cannot but come as a friend, for as an enemy I should not have men enough to play the part. But what I see seems a dream."

"Sit down and we will dine together. You will eat the best."

"Very well. We will leave together afterward."

"You will leave by yourself, if you wish to leave. I will not leave here until I am assured that I will not only not be put under arrest but that I will be given satisfaction. The General must sentence that clown to the galleys."

"Be sensible and come with me of your own free will. I have orders to take you back by force, but since I have not strength enough, I will go and make my report, and they will send a force to capture you to which you cannot but surrender."

"Never, my dear friend; I will die before I will be taken."

"You must have gone mad, then; for you are in the wrong. You have disobeyed the order I brought you to go on board the bastarda. That is where you are wrong, for in the other matter you are right a thousand times over. The General himself says so."

"So I should put myself under arrest?"

"Certainly. Obedience is our first duty."

"In my place you would have gone?"

"I don't know; but I do know that if I had not, I should have committed a crime."

"But if I surrender now, I shall be treated as far more guilty than I should have been if I had obeyed that unjust order. Shall I not?"

"I don't believe so. Come, and you will find out."

"Come without knowing what my fate will be? You are wasting your hopes if you are hoping for that. Let us dine. Since my guilt is so great that force is used against me, I will surrender to force; and it will not make me any guiltier, even though blood will be shed."

"Yes, you will increase your guilt. Let us dine. Perhaps a good dinner will make you reason more soundly."

Toward the end of our dinner we heard a noise. My lieutenant tells me that it is bands of peasants gathering about my house to receive my orders, the rumor having got about that the felucca had come from Corfu for no reason but to carry me off. I told him to set the good, sturdy fellows right, and to send them away with the gift of a cask of Cavalla wine.[80]

As they left they fired their guns into the air. The adjutant smiled and said that this was all very pretty, but that it would turn into an ugly matter if I let him go to Corfu without me, for he would have to be very truthful in his report.

"I will come with you if you will give me your word of honor to land me on the island of Corfu a free man."

"My orders are to deliver you into the custody of Signor Foscari on board the bastarda."

"You will not carry out your orders this time."

"If the General does not find a way to make you obey, his honor is at stake, and, believe me, he will find one. But tell me, please, what would you do if the General should decide it would be a good joke to leave you here?

But you will not be left here. In view of the report I shall make, the decision will be to end this business without bloodshed.''

''It will go hard if there is not a massacre. With five hundred peasants here, I do not fear three thousand men.''

''Only one will be used, and you will be treated like a leader of rebels. All these men who are devoted to you cannot protect you from one man who will be paid to blow out your brains. I will say more. Of all the Greeks who surround you, there is not one who is not ready to assassinate you to earn twenty zecchini. Believe what I say. Come with me. Come and enjoy something not far from a triumph in Corfu. You will be applauded, made much of; you will tell the story of your escapade yourself, everyone will laugh and at the same time admire you for having yielded to reason as soon as I came and showed you a reasonable course. Everyone respects you. Signor D. R. thinks most highly of you for having had the courage not to run the clown through the body with your sword, out of respect for his house. The General himself must esteem you, for he must remember what you told him.''

''What has become of the wretch?''

''Four days ago Major Sordina's frigate arrived with dispatches which apparently gave the General all the information he needed to act as he has acted. He issued the necessary orders, and the clown has disappeared. Nobody knows what has become of him, and nobody dares mention him again before the General, whose blunder is only too obvious.''

''But after the caning I gave him, was he still received in society?''

''How can you ask? Don't you remember that he was wearing a sword? That was enough—no one would receive him. He was found with one forearm broken and his jaw shattered; a week later, for all his pitiable state, His Excellency arranged that he should disappear. The only thing that set people wondering in Corfu was your escape. For three days everyone believed that Signor D. R. was keeping you hidden in his house, and he was openly criticized for it, until he finally said at the General's table that he had no idea where you were. His Excellency himself was greatly concerned over your disappearance, until yesterday noon, when the whole story came out. The Protopapa[81] Bulgari had a letter from the Papa here complaining that an Italian officer had taken over the island and been indulging in every kind of violence for the past ten days. He accuses you of seducing all the girls and of having threatened him with death if he put the cataramonachia on you. When the letter was read aloud at the General's reception, he laughed; but that did not stop him from giving me orders this morning to take twelve grenadiers with me and capture you."

"Signora Sagredo is the cause of all this."

"That is true; and she has reason to regret it. You had better come and pay her a visit with me tomorrow."

"Tomorrow? Are you certain that I will not be arrested?"

"Yes, for I know that His Excellency is a man of honor."

"I know it too. Let us embrace. We will leave together after midnight."

"Why not now?"

"Because I do not want to risk spending the night on board the bastarda. I want to arrive in Corfu by broad daylight, so that your victory will be seen by everyone."

"But what shall we do for the next eight hours?"

"We'll go see some girls of a kind not to be found in Corfu, and afterwards we'll eat a good supper."

I then ordered my lieutenant to send food to the soldiers on board the felucca and to give us the best possible supper, sparing no expense, for I intended to leave at midnight. I made him a present of all my bulky stores, sending what I wished to keep to the felucca. My twenty-four soldiers, to whom I made a present of a week's pay, insisted on escorting me to the felucca under the command of my lieutenant, a spectacle which kept Minotto laughing all night. We reached Corfu at eight o'clock in the morning, alongside the bastarda, where he gave me into custody, assuring me that he would at once send all my belongings to Signor D. R.'s house and make his report to the General.

Signor Foscari, who was in command of the galley, gave me a very bad reception. Had he had the slightest nobility of feeling, he would not have been in such haste to order me put in chains. He could have put it off for a quarter of an hour by engaging me in conversation, and I should not have suffered that mortification. Without a word, he sent me off to the place where the capo di scala[82] made me sit down and hold out my leg to be fitted with the iron, which, however, is no dishonor in that country, unfortunately not even to galley slaves, who are more respected than soldiers.

The chain on my right foot was already fast, and my shoe was being unbuckled for the second to be attached, when one of His Excellency's adjutants arrived and ordered Signor Foscari to have my sword returned to me and to set me free. I asked permission to make my bow to the noble Governor; but his adjutant said that he excused me from doing so.

I at once went to pay my respects to the General, making him a low bow without saying a word. He gravely told me to behave more prudently in the future and to learn that my first duty in the profession I had chosen was to obey, and above all to be discreet and modest. The application of these two words was not lost on me, and I regulated my conduct accordingly.

When I made my appearance at Signor D. R.'s, I saw joy in every face. Happy moments have always made up to me for unhappy ones, and to such a degree that they make me love their cause. It is impossible to relish to the full a pleasure which has not been preceded by pain, and pleasure is great only in proportion to the pain suffered. Signor D. R. was so glad to see me that he embraced me. He told me, as he made me a present of a fine ring, that I had acted very rightly in not letting anyone, and particularly himself, know where I had gone into hiding.

"You can have no idea," he said, with noble candor, "what an interest Signora F. takes in you. You would please her greatly by going to call on her immediately."

What a pleasure to receive this advice from Signor D. R. himself! But the word "immediately" irked me, for I thought that, since I had spent the night on board the felucca, she would find my appearance shocking. Yet I had no choice but to go, tell her the reason for it, and even make her think it to my credit.

So I go; she was still asleep, and her maid lets me in, assuring me that she would soon ring and would be delighted to learn that I was there. During the half hour I spent with her the girl told me a great many of the things which had been said in the house on the subject of my encounter with the impostor and my flight. All that she told me could not but give me the greatest pleasure, for it convinced me that my behavior had been generally approved.

A minute after the maid went in, Signora F. summoned me. She ordered the curtains drawn, and I thought I beheld Aurora scattering roses, lilies, and jonquils. Having told her at once that if Signor D. R. had not ordered me to do so, I should never have dared to present myself before her in the condition in which she saw me, she answered that Signor D. R. knew what an interest she took in me, and that he esteemed me as highly as she did.

"I do not know, Signora, what I can have done to deserve such happiness, when all that I hoped for was indulgence."

"We all admired the self-control with which you refrained from drawing your sword and running it through the body of that clown, who would have been thrown out of the window if he had not run away first."

"I would have killed him, Signora, you may be sure, if you had not been there."

"You make me a very pretty compliment, but it is incredible that you should have thought of me at that trying moment."

At these words I looked down and turned my head away. She noticed my ring, and praised Signor D. R. when I told her how he had presented me with it, and then insisted that I give her a full account of the life I had been leading since my flight. I told her everything faithfully, except the chapter of the girls, which certainly would not have pleased her and would not have been to my credit. In social life one must learn to set a limit to one's confidences. The truths which must be left unspoken are far greater in number than the pretty truths which are fit for publication.

Signora F. laughed and, saying that she considered the whole of my behavior admirable, asked me if I should have the courage to tell my diverting story to the Proveditor-General in exactly the same terms. I assured her that I should if the General himself asked me to narrate it, and she replied that I should hold myself in readiness.

"I want him to like you," she said, "and to become your principal protector, so that you will be safe from injustices. Leave it to me."

I called on Major Maroli, to find out the state of our bank, and I was very glad to learn that he had not made me a partner from the time of my flight. I had four hundred zecchini in it, which I withdrew, reserving the right to go in again if the occasion arose.

It was almost evening when, having made my toilet, I joined Minotto to pay a visit to Signora Sagredo. She was the General's favorite and, with the exception of Signora F., the prettiest of the Venetian ladies then in Corfu. She was surprised to see me, since, having been the cause of the train of events which had made me take flight, she thought that I held it against her. I set her right, speaking with perfect candor. She answered in the most obliging manner and even asked me to spend the evening at her house now and again. I bowed, without either accepting or refusing the invitation. How could I have gone there, knowing that Signora F. could not abide her? In addition, the lady was fond of gambling and not fond of anyone who did not lose or did not manage to make her win. Minotto did not gamble, but he earned her good graces in the role of Mercury.

When I returned to Signor D. R.'s I found Signora F. there. She was alone, for he was busy writing. She asked me to tell her everything that had happened to me in Constantinople; and I had no reason to regret it. My encounter with Yusuf's wife interested her immensely, and the night I spent with Ismail watching his mistresses bathe stimulated her so greatly that I could not but see her excitement. I glossed over as much as I could; but when she found my account obscure she insisted on my explaining, and when I had done so she never failed to scold me, saying that I had been too clear. I felt certain that I should succeed in giving her a fancy for me by this course. He who rouses desires may well be destined to satisfy them; it was the reward to which I aspired, and for which I hoped despite the fact that I saw it only from very far off.

As it happened, Signor D. R. had that day invited a large company to supper, and I was naturally called upon to supply the entertainment by a circumstantial and detailed account of all that I had done after receiving the order to put myself under arrest on board the bastarda, whose commander, Signor Foscari, was seated beside me. My narrative delighted everyone, and it was decided that the Proveditor-General must have the pleasure of hearing it from my own lips. When I mentioned that Casopo had a good stock of hay, of which there was absolutely none in Corfu, Signor D. R. said that I should seize the occasion to deserve well of the General by hastening to inform him of the fact; I did so the next morning. His Excellency at once ordered the commanders of galleys each to send a sufficient number of galley slaves to cut it and bring it to Corfu.

Three or four days later Adjutant Minotto sought me out in the coffeehouse just before dark to tell me that the General wished to see me. I went at once.

CHAPTER V

Progress of my amour. I go to Otranto. I enter the service of Signora F. A fortunate injury.

THE reception room was crowded. I enter on tiptoe. His Excellency sees me, stops scowling, and draws the attention of the entire company to me with the words:

"There is a young man who knows his princes."

"What knowledge I have of them I have acquired by frequenting men of your stamp, Monsignore."

"These ladies are curious to know from your own lips all you have done since you disappeared from Corfu."

"Then I am condemned to make a public confession."

"Exactly. So be careful not to forget the least detail. Imagine that I am not present."

"On the contrary, it is only from Your Excellency that I can hope for absolution. But my story will be long."

"In that case, your confessor permits you to sit."

I thereupon told the whole story, omitting only my meetings with the shepherds' daughters.

"The whole experience," said the old man, "is instructive."

"Yes, Monsignore, it teaches that a young man is never in such danger of destruction as when, excited by some great passion, he is able to do as he will because he has a purse full of gold in his pocket."

I was about to leave, as the dishes were being brought in, when the major-domo told me that His Excellency "permitted" me to stay to supper. I had the honor of sitting at his table, but not of eating at it, for having to answer all the questions put to me made that impossible. As I was seated beside the Protopapa Bulgari, I asked him to excuse me if in my story I had ridiculed the Papa Deldimopulo's oracle. He answered that it was an ancient fraud to which it was difficult to put a stop.

At dessert the General, after Signora F. had whispered something to him, told me that he would be glad to hear what had happened to me in Constantinople with the wife of a certain Turk, and at the house of another one night at a bathing party. Greatly surprised by the question, I answered that they were mere pranks not worth recounting to him, and he did not press me; but what I thought incredible was the indiscretion of Signora F., who certainly should not be letting everyone in Corfu know what sort of stories I told her when we were alone together. As I cherished her reputation even more than her person, I could never have brought myself to compromise her.

Two or three days later, when I was alone with her on the terrace:

"Why," she asked, "would you not tell the General your adventures in Constantinople?"

"Because I do not want everyone to know that you permit me to tell you such stories. What stories I make bold to tell you, Signora, when we are alone together, I certainly would not tell you in public."

"Why not? On the contrary, it seems to me that if you are prompted by a feeling of respect, you owe me more respect when I am alone than when I am in company."

"Aspiring to the honor of amusing you, I took the risk of displeasing you; but it shall not happen again."

"I do not wish to read your intentions, but it seems to me that you are wrong to risk displeasing me in order to please me. We are to sup at the General's, who told Signor D. R. to bring you too; I am sure he will tell you that he would be glad to hear the two stories. You cannot decline."

Signor D. R. came to fetch her and we went to the General's. Despite the fact that she had tried to humiliate me in our dialogue on the terrace, I was glad that fortune had brought it about. By obliging me to justify myself, she had been obliged to hear a declaration which was not without significance.

His Excellency the Proveditor-General at once did me the favor of handing me a letter addressed to me, which he had found in the dispatch he had received from Constantinople. I was about to put it in my pocket, but he said that he delighted in anything new and that I might read it. It was from Yusuf, and gave me the unhappy news that Monsieur de Bonneval was dead. When the General heard me name Yusuf, he asked me to tell him the conversation I had had with his wife; whereupon, unable to decline, I told him a story which lasted an hour and which interested the whole company, but which I made up on the spot. By this story out of the blue I avoided injuring either my friend Yusuf or Signora F. or my own character. It did the greatest honor to my feelings; and I felt very happy when, stealing a look at Signora F., I saw that she seemed pleased, though a little surprised.

That same evening, when we had returned to her house, she said to Signor D. R. in my presence that the whole story I had told about my conversation with Yusuf's wife was a fabrication, but that she could not hold it against me because she had found it very pretty, but the fact remained that I had not done her the favor she had asked of me.

"He insists," she went on, "that telling the true story would have made everyone at the reception conclude that he amuses me with indecent tales. I want you to judge. Will you now," she asked me, "be so good as to relate your encounter in the same words that you used in telling it to me? Can you?"

"Yes, Signora, I can and I will."

Stung to the quick by an indiscretion which, my knowledge of women being still imperfect, I supposed to be unparalleled, I gathered myself together and, with perfect confidence in my powers, narrated the adventure in the most graphic detail, not forgetting to describe the feelings which the fire of love had roused in my soul at the sight of the Greek woman's beauties.

"And you think," Signor D. R. asked Signora F., "that he should have told his story at the reception in these same words?"

"If it would have been wrong for him to tell it at the reception in this manner, was it not wrong for him to tell it to me?"

"It is for you to judge if he did wrong. Did he displease you? I can tell you that he would have displeased me greatly if he had told the story as he has just told it to us."

"Then in future," she said to me, "I ask you never to tell me anything when we are alone together which you would not tell me in the presence of fifty people."

"I will obey you, Signora."

"But it goes without saying," added Signor D. R., "that the Signora remains free to countermand her order whenever she sees fit."

I concealed my vexation, and a quarter of an hour later we left. I was beginning to know what kind of woman she was; and I foresaw the cruel ordeals through which she would put me; but love promised me victory, bidding me hope. In the meanwhile I discerned that Signor D. R. was not jealous of me, whereas she seemed to be daring him to be so. These were two most important points.

A few days after she had laid this command on me, the conversation turned to the misfortune which had condemned me to enter the lazaretto at Ancona without a soldo.

"Nevertheless," I said, "I fell in love with a Greek slave girl who very nearly made me break the laws of quarantine."

"How was that?"

"Signora, you are alone, and I remember your order."

"Is it so very improper?"

"Not at all, but it is a story I would never tell you in public."

"Well then," she said with a laugh, "I countermand my order, as Signor D. R. said I would. Speak."

I told her the whole adventure in the most truthful detail; and seeing her thoughtful, I exaggerated my misfortune.

"What do you mean by your misfortune? I think the poor Greek girl was more unhappy than you. You did not see her again after that?"

"Excuse me, I dare not tell you."

"Out with it! You are being absurd. Tell me everything. I suppose it will be another of your atrocious performances."

"Far from it. It was pure delight, though incomplete."

"Tell it, but do not call things by their names; that is what matters."

At this new order I told her, though without looking her in the face, all that I had done to the Greek girl in Bellino's presence and, receiving no answer, I turned the conversation to another subject. I felt that I was on an excellent footing but that I must not hurry matters for, young as she was, I was sure that she had never entered into a misalliance, and an alliance with me could not but seem to her a misalliance of the worst sort. But now for the first favor I was granted, and a very strange one it was. She pricked her middle finger badly with a pin and, her maid not being present, asked me to suck it for her to stop the bleeding. If my reader has ever been in love, he can imagine how I carried out her request; for what is a kiss? It is nothing but the tangible effect of one's desire to imbibe from the object of one's love. After thanking me, she told me to spit the blood I had sucked into my handkerchief.

"I swallowed it, Signora, and God knows with what pleasure."

"Swallowed my blood with pleasure? Do you belong to the race of cannibals?"

"I only know that I swallowed it involuntarily, but with pleasure."

At the Proveditor-General's reception everyone was lamenting that there were to be no theatrical performances during the coming Carnival. There was no time to be lost. I offered to go to Otranto and engage a troupe of actors, on condition that all the boxes should be subscribed for in advance and I be granted the monopoly of the faro bank. My offer was eagerly accepted, and His Excellency gave me a felucca. In three days I sold all my boxes and my whole parterre[1] to a Jew, reserving for myself only two days a week.[2] The Carnival that year was a very long one.[3] The profession of a theatrical manager is said to be difficult, but this is not true. I left Corfu at nightfall and reached Otranto at dawn without my rowers having wetted their oars. From Corfu to Otranto is only fourteen short leagues.[4]

Dismissing any idea of landing, because of the quarantine, which is always in force in Italy for all travelers from the Levant, I at once went down to the visiting room, where one speaks from behind a grille to all who take their places behind another grille opposite and four yards[5] away. As soon as I said that I was there to raise a troupe of actors for Corfu, the managers of two which were in Otranto at the time came to talk with me. I began by telling them that I wanted to see all the actors at my leisure, one company after the other.

I immediately witnessed a strange and comical quarrel between the two managers. Each wanted to be the last to show me his actors. The port captain said that it was for me to end the dispute and declare which company I wished to see first, the Neapolitan or the Sicilian. As I knew neither, I said the Neapolitan, and Don Fastidio, who was manager of it, was chagrined, while Don Battipaglia[6] was just the opposite, for he felt certain that when the comparison was made I would give the preference to his company. An hour later I saw Don Fastidio arrive with all his henchmen.

My surprise was not small when I saw Petronio with his sister Marina; but it was far greater when I saw Marina cry out and jump over the barrier into my arms. A row at once began between Don Fastidio and the port captain. Since Marina was in Don Fastidio's employ, the port captain had no choice but to make me take her to the lazaretto, where she would have to go through quarantine at his expense. The headstrong girl wept, but there was nothing I could do. I broke off the quarrel by telling Don Fastidio to show me his characters one after the other. Petronio was one, playing the part of lover, and he told me he had a letter to deliver to me from Teresa. I saw a Venetian whom I knew who played Pantalone, three actresses who might well please, a Pulcinella, a Scaramuccia,[7] on the whole a passable company. I told Don Fastidio to tell me in a word how much he asked per day, adding that if Don Battipaglia made me a better bargain I would give him the preference. He said that I should have to provide lodgings for twenty persons in at least six rooms, give him a sitting room not otherwise occupied, ten beds, paid passages, and thirty Neapolitan ducati per day. As he made his proposal he sent me over a little book containing the repertory of all the comedies he could have his company perform, the choice of plays being left to me. Remembering at this point that Marina would have to be quarantined in the lazaretto if I did not take Don Fastidio's company, I told him to go and draw up the contract and that I wished to leave at once; but a comical scene ensued. Don Battipaglia called Marina a little wh..., telling her that she had broken the quarantine by prearrangement with Don Fastidio to force me to take his company. Petronio and Don Fastidio dragged him out, and they fought with their fists. A quarter of an hour later Petronio brought me the letter from Teresa, who was growing rich by ruining the Duke, and, constant as ever, was awaiting me at Naples.

Toward nightfall I left Otranto with twenty actors and six great packing boxes, which contained everything they needed to act their farces. A breeze from the south which was blowing as I set out would have brought me to Corfu in ten hours if after an hour my carabuchiri had not told me that he saw in the moonlight a vessel which, being a corsair, might capture us. Not wishing to take any risk, I ordered the sails lowered and returned to Otranto. At dawn we set out with a west wind which, even so, would have taken us to Corfu; but after two hours at sea the pilot told me he saw a brigantine which could only be a corsair, since it was trying to put us to leeward. I told him to take the tiller and go to starboard to see if she would follow us: he made the maneuver and the brigantine did likewise. Unable to return to Otranto and having no wish to go to Africa, I was obliged to reach land by rowing to the nearest point on the coast of Calabria.[8] The sailors instilled their fear into the actors, who began shouting and weeping and commending themselves to some saint, none of them to God. The grimaces of Scaramuccia and of the serious Don Fastidio would have made me laugh but for the urgent danger. Only Marina, who had no conception of it, laughed and made fun of everyone's fears. Toward evening, a strong south wind having come up, I gave orders to take it astern even if it should become stronger. To escape to safety from the corsair I was prepared to cross the Gulf.[9] After running in this fashion all night, I decided to reach Corfu by rowing; I was eighty miles from it. I was in the middle of the Gulf, and at the end of the day the crew of the felucca were exhausted, but I no longer had any fear. A north wind began to blow, and in less than an hour became so fresh that we were sailing close-hauled in a terrifying fashion. The felucca seemed to be capsizing at every moment. I myself held the tiller. Everyone kept still, for I had ordered silence on pain of death; even so, Scaramuccia's sobs could not but cause laughter. The wind being steady and my pilot at the helm, I had nothing to fear. At dawn we saw Corfu, and we landed at the mandracchio[10] at nine o'clock. Everyone was surprised to see us arrive from that direction.

As soon as my troupe was lodged all the young officers came to visit the actresses, whom they found ugly, except for Marina, who uncomplainingly received the news that I could not be her lover. I was certain that she would not be long without one. The actresses who looked ugly to all the young bloods were proclaimed pretty as soon as they were seen on the stage. The actress who had a great success was the wife of Pantalone. Signor Duodo, commander of a warship, having paid her a visit and found her husband unaccommodating, gave him a caning. Don Fastidio came the following morning to tell me that Pantalone refused to act again, as did his wife. I retrieved the situation by giving them a performance. Pantalone's wife was much applauded; but considering herself insulted because the audience applauded her by shouting "Bravo, Duodo," she came complaining to the General's box, where I was usually to be found. To console her the General promised her that I would give her another performance at the end of the Carnival; and I was obliged to consent; but to appease the other actors I had to share out all my seventeen performances among them. The one I gave to Marina, who danced with her brother, was because of Signora F.'s patronage. She had openly taken her under her wing as soon as she learned that Signor D. R. had breakfasted with her in a small house outside the city which belonged to Signor Cazzaetti.

This generosity cost me at least four hundred zecchini; but the faro bank brought me in more than a thousand. I never dealt, not having the time. What surprised me was that I did not want to have the slightest intrigue with any of the actresses. Signora F. told me she had not thought I was so well behaved, but throughout the Carnival I was too busy with the theater to think of love.

It was at the beginning of Lent, after the actors had left, that I began pursuing it in good earnest.

At eleven o'clock in the morning I wait on her, asking why she had sent for me.

"To return the two hundred zecchini which you so generously lent me. Here they are. Now please return my note."

"Your note, Signora, is no longer at my disposition. It is deposited in a sealed envelope with the notary XX... who, in accordance with this receipt, can deliver the envelope to no one but you."

She reads the receipt and asks me why I had not kept the note myself.

"I feared, Signora, that it would be stolen from me. I feared I might lose it; I feared that it would be found if I should die or meet with some other accident."

"Your disposition of it bespeaks your delicacy; but I think you should have retained the right to take it back from the notary yourself."

"I could not imagine that the circumstance would arise in which I should need to take it back."

"Yet the circumstance could easily have arisen. Then I may send and tell the notary to bring me the envelope himself?"

"Yes, Signora."

She sends her adjutant; the notary arrives, bringing the envelope; he departs; she unseals it, and finds a paper on which she saw nothing but her name; all the rest had been blotted out with very black ink so that it was impossible to make out what had been written on it before the deletion.

"This," she said, "bears witness to a behavior on your part which is as noble as it is delicate; but admit that I cannot be sure that this is my note, even though I see my name on it."

"That is true, Signora, and if you are not sure, I have done something inexcusable."

"I am sure, because I must be; but admit that I could not swear it is my note."

"I admit it, Signora."

During the next few days she seized every occasion to find fault with me. She no longer received me in dishabille, so I was left to cool my heels in the anteroom. When I said something amusing she pretended not to understand what the joke was, and often when I was speaking she did not look at me, which made me talk badly. Quite often when Signor D. R. laughed at something I had said she asked what it was, so I had to repeat it to her, whereupon she found it insipid. If one of her bracelets came unfastened, it would have been my part to fasten it again; but she would have none of it, she said I did not know how the spring worked and summoned her maid. Her behavior vexed me visibly, and she pretended not to notice it. Signor D. R. would urge me to say something amusing, I would not know what to say, and she would laugh and say I had emptied my bag. I admitted as much. I was drying up, in short I did not know to what to attribute a change of humor for which I had given no cause. To avenge myself I thought every day that I would begin to show her clear tokens of my dislike; but when the time came I could never bring myself to do it; when I was alone, I very often wept. One evening Signor D. R. asked me if I had often been deeply in love.

"Three times, Monsignore."

"Always happily, no doubt?"

"Always unhappily. The first time, perhaps, because, being then an abate, I did not dare speak out. The second, because an unlucky event forced me to leave the object of my love just as I had reached the moment when I should have succeeded. The third time, because the pity I aroused in the person I loved, instead of inducing her to make me happy, gave her the notion of curing me."

"And what medicine did she use to cure you?"

"She ceased to be kind."

"I understand: she treated you badly. And you attribute that to pity? You are mistaken."

"Absolutely mistaken," Signora F. added. "One pities the person one loves; and one does not wish to cure him by making him unhappy. The woman never loved you."

"I cannot believe that, Signora."

"But are you cured?"

"Completely. For when I remember her I feel indifferent; but my convalescence took a long time."

"It lasted, I imagine, until you fell in love with another woman."

"Another? Did you not hear me say, Signora, that my third love was my last?"

Three or four days later, as we left the table, Signor D. R. said that the Signora was unwell and alone and that he could not go to keep her company; he told me to go, adding that he was sure she would be glad of my visit. I go, and repeat the compliment to her in the same words. She was lying on a chaise longue. She answered, not looking at me, that she thought she had a fever and that she would not ask me to stay because she was sure I would be bored.

"I cannot go, Signora, except by your express command, and in that case I shall spend the next four hours in your anteroom, for Signor D. R. told me to wait for him."

"In that case, you may sit down if you wish."

The harshness of this address roused my indignation; but I loved her, and I had never seen her so beautiful. I did not think her indisposition feigned; she was flushed. I had been there for a quarter of an hour, worse than mute. After drinking half a glass of lemonade she rang for her maid, asking me to leave for a moment. When she sent for me again she asked me where on earth my gaiety had gone to.

"If my gaiety, Signora, has gone somewhere, I believe it has gone only at your command: call it back, and you will find it always happy in your presence."

"What must I do to call it back?"

"Be the same as you were when I returned from Casopo. You have been displeased with me for these four months, and as I do not know why, I am in despair."

"I am the same. In what do you find me changed?"

"God in Heaven! In everything, except in your person. But I have decided on my course."

"What course?"

"To suffer in silence, never permitting the respect you have inspired in me to diminish, insatiably determined to convince you of my complete submission, always ready to seize any occasion to give you fresh proofs of my devotion."

"I thank you; but I do not know what you can be suffering in silence on my account. I am interested in you, I always enjoy listening to your adventures; if I did not I should not now be as curious as I am to hear about the three loves you mentioned to us."

In proof of my readiness to oblige, I invented three little romances in which I made a great display of fine feelings and perfect love, never mentioning fruition, though I saw that she expected it. Delicacy, respect, duty always stood in the way of that; but a true lover, I said, has no need of being thus convinced in order to call himself happy. I saw that she surmised how matters must really have stood; but I also noticed that my reserve and discretion pleased her. Knowing her well, I could not see a surer way of bringing her to the point. On the subject of the last lady I had loved, and who because of the pity she felt for me undertook to cure me, she made a reflection which went to my soul; but I pretended not to understand it at all.

"If it is true," she said, "that she loved you, it may be that she was not thinking of curing you but of curing herself."

The next day after this sort of reconciliation, Signor F. asked Signor D. R. to permit me to go to Butrinto[11] in place of his adjutant, who was seriously ill. I should be back in three days.

Butrinto lies opposite to Corfu, about seven miles away. It is the nearest point on the mainland to the island. It is not a fort, but a village in Epirus, or Albania as it is now called, belonging to the Venctians. The political maxim that "Neglected right is lost right" makes the Venetians send four galleys there every year; the galley slaves go ashore and cut wood, which they load on barks for transport to Corfu. A detachment of regular troops forms the garrison of the four galleys and at the same time escorts the galley slaves who, if they were not guarded, could easily escape and turn Turk. As one of the four galleys was the one commanded by Signor F., he needed an adjutant, and he thought of me. I reached there in two hours in Signor F.'s felucca. The cutting had already been done. During the following days the wood was loaded; and on the fourth day I was back in Corfu, where, after making my bow to Signor F., I returned to Signor D. R.'s whom I found alone on the terrace. It was Good Friday. His Excellency, whom I found more pensive than usual, addressed me in the following words, which are not easy to forget.

"Signor F., whose adjutant died yesterday evening, needs one until he can find another; he thought of you and this morning approached me on the subject of my transferring you to him. I answered that I do not consider that I have the right to dispose of you, and that such being the case, he should apply to you directly. I assured him that if you asked my permission, I would make no difficulty over granting it to you, despite the fact that I need two adjutants. Did he say anything to you this morning?"

"Not a word. He thanked me for going to Butrinto on his galley, and that is all."

"Then he will speak to you today. What will your answer be?"

"That I will never leave Your Excellency's service except by your order, of course."

"I will never give you such an order, so you will not go to him."

Just then the sentinel raps twice, and in come Signor F. and his lady. I leave them with Signor D. R., and a quarter of an hour later I am summoned. Signor F. addresses me in a confident tone:

"Is it not true, Casanova, that you would be glad to come and live in my house as my adjutant?"

"Do I take it that His Excellency is dismissing me from his service?"

"Not at all," says Signor D. R., "I simply leave the decision to you."

"In that case, I cannot do what would prove me ungrateful."

I remained standing where I was, visibly out of countenance, and unable to conceal a mortification which could only be due to my situation. Keeping my eyes fixed on the ground, I would have torn them out before I would have raised them to look at Signora F., who must be seeing into my soul. A moment later her husband coldly remarked that, true enough, as I should be alone in his house I should have much more to do than I had at Signor D. R.'s and that in any case there was more honor in serving the governor of the galleys than a mere sopracomito.

The conversation turned to other things, and I retired to the anteroom and threw myself into an easy chair, determined to get to the bottom of the matter and see it for what it was.

I concluded that Signor F. could not have asked Signor D. R. for me without having first obtained his lady's consent, and that it was even possible that he had only asked for me at her prompting, which would be supremely flattering to my passion. But my honor did not permit me to accept his proposal unless I was sure that by doing so I should please Signor D. R. How, then, could I accept it? "I will accept it when Signor D. R. tells me in so many words that my going to live with Signor F. will please him. It lies with Signor F."

At the great evening procession, in which the whole nobility goes on foot in honor of Jesus Christ dead on the cross, it fell to me to give my arm to Signora F., who never said a word to me. My despairing love kept me sleepless in my bed the whole night through. I feared that she had taken my refusal as a proof of disesteem, and the thought of it pierced my soul. The next day I could not eat and that night at the reception I did not speak. I went to bed with chills, fever followed and kept me in bed the whole of Easter day. On Monday I was so weak that I would not have left my room if a valet of Signora F.'s had not come with a message that she wished to speak with me. I ordered him to say nothing about having found me in bed and to assure her that I would wait on her in an hour.

I entered her boudoir looking like a corpse. She was searching for something with her maid. She sees that I look ill, and does not ask me how I am. Her servant leaves the room, then she looks at me and thinks for a moment, trying to remember why she had sent for me.

"Ah yes. You know that, our adjutant having died, we need to find another. My husband, who likes you and has made sure that Signor D. R. leaves you free to decide, has taken it into his head that you would come if I asked you the favor myself. Is he wrong? If you will come, you shall have that room there."

She pointed from her window to those of a room next to the one in which she slept, which was beside it around a corner; so that to see the whole inside of hers I should not even need to go to my window. Seeing that I was hesitating to answer, she said that Signor D. R. would like me none the less and that as he would see me at her house every day, he would not forget my interests.

"So tell me: Will you come or not?"

"Signora, I cannot."

"You cannot. That is very strange. Sit down. How is it that you cannot when, by coming to us, you are certain to please Signor D. R. as well?"

"If I were sure of that, I would not hesitate for an instant. All that I have heard him say himself is that he leaves me free to decide."

"Then you are afraid you will displease him if you come to us?"

"It is possible."

"I am sure that you will not."

"Have the goodness to make him tell me so."

"And then you will come?"

"Oh, my God!"

As my exclamation perhaps expressed too much, I quickly looked away for fear of seeing her blush. She asked for her cloak to go to mass, and as we went down the stairs she for the first time rested her bare hand on mine. Putting on her gloves, she asked me if I had a fever, for my hand was burning.

Coming out of the church, I helped her into Signor D. R.'s carriage, which we happened upon; then I hurried to my room to draw breath and surrender to all the joy of my soul, for Signora F.'s intervention at last showed me clearly that I was loved. I felt certain that I should go to live in her house at the command of Signor D. R. himself.

What is love? For all that I have read every word that certain self-styled sages have written concerning its nature, for all that I have philosophized on it myself as I have grown older, I will never admit that it is either a trifle or a vanity of vanities. It is a kind of madness over which philosophy has no power; a sickness to which man is prone at every time of life and which is incurable if it strikes in old age. Inexpressible love! God of nature! Bitterness than which nothing is sweeter, sweetness than which nothing is more bitter! Divine monster which can only be defined by paradoxes!

The next day but one after my brief conversation with Signora F., Signor D. R. told me to go and put myself under Signor F.'s orders on board his galley, which was to sail for Govino[12] where he was to stay for five or six days. I pack in haste and fly to present myself to Signor F., adding that I am delighted to be in his service. He says that he is very well pleased to have it so, and we leave without seeing Signora F., who was still asleep.

Five days later we return to Corfu, and I accompany him to his room, expecting to return to Signor D. R.'s after asking him if he had any further orders for me. But at the same moment in comes Signor D. R., booted, and after greeting him with benvenuto,[13] asks him if he has been content with me. He then puts the same question to me and, finding that we are both content, tells me that I can be certain I will be gratifying him by remaining with Signor F. I consent, in a manner which mingles obedience with satisfaction, and Signor F. at once has me shown to my room, which was the same one Signora F. had pointed out to me. In less than an hour I have my few possessions brought to it, and toward evening I went to the reception. As she saw me come in, Signora F. said to me, with no attempt to lower her voice, that she had just learned that I was now one of her household and was very well pleased. I made her a deep bow.

So now, like the salamander, I am in the fire in which I longed to be. No sooner up than in dutiful attendance in Signor F.'s anteroom, often at the Signora's orders, attentive and obedient, making no show of any claim and seeming to ask nothing more, often dining alone with her, accompanying her everywhere when Signor D. R. could not be present, lodged next door to her, and within her sight when I was writing and at all times, as she was within mine.

Three weeks passed during which my new position brought my passion no relief. To keep my hope from failing, I only told myself that her love had not yet grown strong enough to master her pride. I hoped everything from a favorable moment, I waited for it, I counted on it, firmly resolved that I would not do the object of my love the injury of letting it slip. The lover who is not ready to take Fortune by the forelock is lost.

What distressed me was the marks of consideration she showed me in public, while in private she was chary of them: I wanted the opposite. Everyone believed that I had been granted her favors. But since my love was pure, vanity played no part in it.

"You have enemies," she said to me one day; "but last evening I took your side and silenced them."

"They are my enemies because they envy me, Signora; if they knew the truth they would pity me, and you, if you would, could deliver me from them."

"Why would they pity you, and how can I deliver you from them?"

"They would pity me because I am perishing, and you would deliver me from them by showing me dislike. No one would hate me then."

"So you would suffer less from my dislike than from the hatred of the malicious?"

"Yes, Signora, provided that the dislike you showed for me in public were compensated by your kindness in private; for in my happiness at being yours I find no trace of any feeling of vanity. Let them pity me; I am content provided that they are wrong."

"That is a part I can never play."

I often stood behind the curtains of the window farthest from those of her bedroom so that I might see her when she believed that she was seen by no one. I could have seen her getting out of bed and have possessed her in my amorous imaginings; and she could have granted my passion that relief without compromising herself in any way, for there was no need for her to guess that I was keeping watch. Yet this was just what she did not do. It seemed to me that she had her windows opened only to torture me. I saw her in her bed. Her maid came to dress her, and stood in front of her in such a way that I could no longer see her. If after getting out of bed she came to the window to see what sort of day it was, she never looked at my windows. I was certain that she knew I saw her; but she would not give me the slight pleasure of making a gesture which could have led me to suppose she was thinking of me.

One day when her maid was cutting off the split ends of her long hair, I picked up and put on her toilet table all of them which had fallen on the floor, except a little bunch which I put in my pocket, convinced that she had not noticed. As soon as her maid left, she ordered me, gently but a trifle too gravely, to produce the hairs I had picked up and pocketed. I thought this too much; I felt that such sternness was unjust, cruel, and out of place. Trembling with resentment even more than with anger, I obeyed, but throwing the hairs on her toilet table with the utmost scorn.

"Signore, you forget yourself."

"This time, Signora, you could have pretended not to see my theft."

"It is tiresome to pretend."

"What black design could you suspect my soul to harbor on the evidence of this childish theft?"

"No black design, but feelings for me which you are forbidden to entertain."

"They can be forbidden me only by hatred or by pride. If you had a heart you would be the victim of neither; but you have only a mind, and it must be a malicious one for it delights in humiliating. You have surprised my secret, but in return I have learned to know you. My discovery will be more useful to me than yours. I will perhaps become wiser."

After this outburst I left the room and, not hearing myself called back, went to mine where, hoping that sleep might calm me, I undressed and went to bed. In such moments a man in love finds the object of his love unworthy, hateful, and detestable. When I was called to supper I said that I was ill; I could not sleep and, curious to see what would happen to me, I did not get up, and continued to say that I was ill when I was called to dinner. By nightfall I was delighted to find myself extremely weak. When Signor F. came to see me, I got rid of him by saying that it was a very bad headache, to which I was subject and of which fasting alone would cure me.

About eleven o'clock in come the Signora and Signor D. R.

"What is the matter with you," she said, "my poor Casanova?"

"A bad headache, Signora, which will be cured tomorrow."

"Why wait till tomorrow? It should be treated now. I have ordered a broth for you and two fresh eggs."

"It is no use, Signora. Only fasting can cure me."

"He is right," said Signor D. R., "I know this complaint."

She seized the moment when Signor D. R. was looking at a drawing which happened to be on my table to tell me that she would be glad to see me take some broth, for I must be exhausted. I answered that those who forgot themselves in her presence should be left to die. She answered only by putting a small packet into my hand; then she went to look at the drawing.

I open the packet, and I feel hairs. I quickly put it under my coverlet; but the blood rushes to my head so fast that it terrifies me. I ask for cold water. The Signora comes with Signor D. R. and they are surprised to see me flushed when only a moment earlier I looked like a corpse. She puts a little eau des Carmes[14] into the water I was to drink, I drink it, and instantly vomit it up, mixed with some bile. I feel better at once, and ask for something to eat. She laughs; her maid comes in with a dish of soup and two eggs, which I eat ravenously, then I laugh with them and, the occasion reminding me of it, I tell them the story of Pandolfin.[15] Signor D. R. thought that he was witnessing a miracle, and in Signora F.'s face I saw love, pity, and repentance. But for Signor

D. R.'s presence this would have been the moment of my good fortune; but I felt certain that it was only deferred. After I had kept them amused for half an hour with choice stories, Signor D. R. remarked to the Signora that if he had not seen me vomit he would have thought my sickness feigned, for it was impossible, he insisted, to change so quickly from melancholy to gaiety.

"It is the effect of my eau des Carmes," said Signora F., looking at me, "and I will leave you my bottle."

"Take it away, Signora, for without your presence the potion has no virtue."

"I think so too," says Signor D. R. "So I shall leave you here with the patient."

"No, no. He must be allowed to sleep."

I slept deeply; but it was with her, in one continuous dream, so intense that the reality itself could not have been more delicious. I felt that I had progressed very far. Thirty-four hours of fasting had won me the right to speak of love to her openly. The gift of her hair could not mean anything but that she was willing I should continue to love her.

In the morning, after having made my bow to Signor F., I went and sat beside the maid, for the Signora was still asleep. I had the pleasure of hearing her laugh when she was informed that I was there. She sent for me to tell me, without giving me time to pay her the slightest compliment, that she was delighted to see me in good health and that I should go and wish Signor D. R. good morning on her behalf.

It is not only in a lover's eyes that a beautiful woman is a thousand times more attractive when she is waking from sleep than after she has made her toilet, but in those of anyone who can see her at such a moment. As Signora F. told me to go, she flooded my soul with the rays which issued from her divine face with the same speed as those of the sun shedding his light through the universe. For all that, the more beautiful a woman is, the more devoted she is to making her toilet. One always wants more than one has. In her order to leave her, I read the assurance of my imminent good fortune. "She sent me away," I reflected, "because she foresaw that if I was left alone with her I would have asked for a recompense, or at least for some payments on account, which she could not have refused me."

Rich in the possession of her hair, I consulted the spirit of my love to decide what to do with it. To make up for the fault she had committed by depriving me of the snippets I had picked up, she had given me hair enough to make a braid. It was an ell and a half long. After conceiving my plan, I went to the shop of a Jewish confectioner whose daughter did embroidery. I instructed her to embroider the four initial letters of our names in hair on a green satin armband, and I used all the rest to make a long braid in the form of a very thin cord. At one end there was a black ribbon and as the ribbon at the other end was sewn on doubled upon itself, it made a loop which was a real running noose, admirably suited to strangle me if love reduced me to despair. I put this cord on my neck next to the skin, winding it four times around. From a small quantity of the same hair I made a sort of powder by cutting it into very small bits with fine scissors. I had the Jew make a paste of it in my presence with sugar combined with essences of ambergris,[16] angelica, vanilla, alkermes,[17] and styrax.[18] I did not leave until he had my sweetmeats, composed of these ingredients, ready to deliver to me. I had others made of the same shape and materials except that they contained no hair. I put the ones with hair in a beautiful rock crystal box and the others in a box of light tortoise shell.

After the gift of her hair, I spent no more of my time with her telling her stories; I talked to her only of my passion and my desires. I put it to her that she should either banish me from her presence or make me happy; but she did not agree. She said that we could make ourselves happy only by refraining from disregarding our duty. When I threw myself at her feet to obtain a full pardon beforehand for the violence I was about to do her, she restrained me by using a force superior to that which the most muscular of women could have summoned to repel the attacks of the most enterprising lover. She showed no anger and used no tone of command, she scarcely even defended herself but said with divine sweetness and eyes full of love:

"No, my dear friend, restrain yourself, do not abuse my fondness for you; I do not ask you to respect me but to spare me, for I love you."

"You love me, and you will never bring yourself to make us happy? That is neither credible nor natural. You force me to think that you do not love me. Let me press my lips to yours for but a moment, and I promise you I will demand nothing more."

"No, for our desires would become greater, and we would be left all the more unhappy."

So she drove me to despair, and afterwards she complained that in company everyone said I had lost both the wit and the gaiety with which I had so delighted her on my return from Constantinople. Signor D. R., who often made good-natured fun of me, told me that I was growing visibly thinner.

She told me one day that she did not like it, because malicious people, observing the fact, might conclude that she was treating me badly.

A strange thought, which seems unnatural, yet which was the thought of a woman in love. I composed an idyl on it in the form of an eclogue, which still makes me weep today every time I read it.

"What!" I said. "Then you see the injustice of your behavior, it seems, since you fear that the world will divine it? Strange fear of a heavenly mind which cannot reconcile itself to its own heart being in love! By the same token, you would be delighted to see me fat and blooming, even if everyone supposed it resulted from the divine food with which you were nourishing my love!''

''Let them suppose so, as long as it is not the truth.''

''What a contradiction! Could I possibly not love you, when I find you so transcendently inconsistent? But you are growing thin too, and I must tell you what will follow from your sophisms. We will both die soon, you of a consumption, I of inanition, for I am reduced to enjoying your phantom day and night, always, everywhere, except in your presence.''

Seeing her astounded and softened by this declaration, I thought that the moment of happiness had come; and I was already tightening my right arm around her waist and my left was about to lay hold . . . when the sentinel rapped twice. I readjust my clothing. I rise, I stand before her, Signor D. R. enters. This time he found me in such good spirits that he stayed with us until an hour after midnight.

My confections were beginning to be talked of. The Signora, Signor D. R., and I were the only people whose comfit boxes were filled with them; I was sparing of them, and no one dared ask me for one, for I had said that they were expensive and that there was not a chemist in Corfu who could determine their composition. But those in my crystal box I gave to no one, and Signora F. had noticed the fact. I certainly did not believe them to be a love philter, any more than I believed that the hair in them could make them more exquisite, but love made them dear to me. I enjoyed thinking that I was eating something that was herself. Signora F. was mad about them. She said they were a universal remedy, and knowing that she could command their inventor, she had no need to know what they were made of; but having noticed on several occasions that I only offered other people the ones in the tortoise-shell box, and myself only ate those in the crystal box, she asked me why. I answered, without thinking, that the ones I ate contained something which compelled love of her.

"I don't believe a word of it; but are they different from the ones I eat myself?"

"They are exactly the same, except that the ingredient which compels one to love you is only in mine."

"Be so good as to tell me what the ingredient is."

"That is a secret which I cannot reveal to you."

"Then I will eat no more of your comfits."

So saying, she rises, empties her comfit box and fills it with nonpareils,[19] then sulks; and she does the same on the following days, allowing me not one opportunity to be alone with her. This grieves me; I become melancholy; but I cannot bring myself to tell her that I enjoy eating her hair.

Four or five days later she asks me why I am sad.

"Because you no longer eat my comfits."

"You are free to keep your secret, and I to eat what I please."

"So this is my reward for confiding something to you."

So saying, I open my crystal box, empty its entire contents into my mouth, then say:

"Twice more, and I shall die mad with love for you. So you will be avenged for my silence. Farewell, Signora."

She calls me back, tells me to sit down, and says that I must not commit some mad act which would grieve her, for I knew that she loved me and she was sure it was not perforce of these drugs.

"And to convince you," she says, "that you do not need them to make me love you, here is a pledge of my affection."

After these words she offers me her mouth and abandons it to mine until I had to draw away in order to breathe. Recovering from my ecstasy, I throw myself at her feet and, my cheeks wet with tears of gratitude, I tell her that if she will promise to forgive me, I will confess my crime.

"Crime? You frighten me. I forgive you. Now confess everything."

"Everything. My comfits are made with your hair reduced to powder. Look! this armband I wear has our names written in your hair, with this cord around my neck I will strangle myself when you no longer love me. These are all my crimes. I would not have committed one of them if I did not adore you."

She laughs, makes me rise, she tells me that I am indeed the greatest of criminals, she dries my tears and assures me that I will never strangle myself.

After this conversation, in which Love first brought me to taste the nectar of a kiss from my goddess, I had the firmness to behave entirely differently toward her. She saw that I was ardent; and, perhaps on fire herself, she admired the firmness I showed in refraining from making an attack.

"What is it," she asked me one day, "that has made it possible for you to control yourself?"

"After the sweetness of the kiss which you granted me of your own accord, I saw that I must aspire to nothing but what it may be your pleasure to give freely. You cannot imagine the sweetness of that kiss."

"How can I help knowing its sweetness? Ungrateful man! Was it you or I who gave it?"

"You are right, my angel, neither of us; it was love."

Without further words, we kissed each other a thousand times, she holding me so tightly to her breast that I could not use my arms, let alone my hands. Despite this duress, I felt happy. At the end of our delightful struggle, I asked her if she believed we would always leave it at that.

"Always, my dear one, never any further. Love is a child to be pacified with trifles, a full diet can only kill it."

"I know love better than you do. It wants solid food, and if that is stubbornly withheld, it withers away. Allow me to hope."

"Hope, if hope helps you."

"What should I do without it? I would not hope, if I did not know that you have a heart."

"Speaking of that, do you remember the day when you were angry and told me I only had a mind, thinking that you were insulting me? Oh, how I laughed when I thought of it afterward! Yes, my dear one, I have a heart, and without that heart I should not now be happy. Let us remain in the state of happiness we now enjoy, and be content with it, asking no more."

Ready to accept what she was pleased to decree, and loving her more every day, I put my trust in nature, which in the end is always stronger than prejudice. But, besides nature, luck also helped me on. I owed my success to an accident. Here is the story.

Signora F., walking in the garden on Signor D. R.'s arm, struck her foot against the stem of a rose tree with such force as to scrape two inches of skin from her ankle. Signor D. R. at once bandaged the wound, which was bleeding, with a handkerchief, and from my window I saw her carried into the house by two servants in a sort of palanquin.

Leg wounds are extremely dangerous in Corfu; if they are not given the most careful attention, they do not close. People often have to go elsewhere to get them to heal over.

The surgeon at once decreed that she must stay in bed, and my fortunate position decreed that I should always be at her orders. I saw her constantly; but the frequent visits paid her during the first three days never left me alone with her. In the evening, after everyone had left, we supped, her husband retired, Signor D. R. did so an hour later, and decency demanded that I retire too. I was better off before she was wounded: I told her so, half jokingly; but the next day she contrived a pleasure for me.

An old surgeon came every day at five in the morning to dress her wound, only her maid being present. When the surgeon came, I at once went to the maid's room in my nightcap, so that I should be the first to learn how my goddess was.

The day after my brief remonstrance, the maid came and told me to come in while the surgeon was bandaging her.

"Please look and tell me if my leg really is less red."

"To know that, Signora, I should have had to see it yesterday."

"You are right. I feel pain, and I am afraid of erysipelas."

"You have nothing to fear, Signora," said the old Machaon.[20] "Stay in bed, and I am sure I shall cure you."

He having gone to the table by the window to prepare a cataplasm, and the maid having gone to fetch some linen, I asked her if there were any hard lumps in the calf of her leg and if the redness went up in streaks as far as her thigh; as I asked these questions it was natural that I should accompany them with my hands and my eyes; I neither felt lumps nor saw redness; but the sensitive patient laughingly dropped the curtain at once, yet not without letting me reap from her lips a kiss of whose sweetness, after four days of abstinence, I sorely needed to refresh my memory. After the kiss, I licked her wound, firmly believing that my tongue would be balm for it; but the maid's return forced me to give over this sweet remedy, which my love as doctor made me believe infallible at the moment.

Left alone with her and burning with desires, I implored her at least to make my eyes happy.

"I cannot hide from you the pleasure my soul felt at the sight of your beautiful leg and a third of your thigh; but, my angel, I feel humiliated when I think that my pleasure was due to a theft."

"You may be wrong."

The next morning, after the surgeon had gone, she asked me to arrange her bolster and pillows and, making an effort herself to spare mine, she took hold of her coverlet and raised it. As my head was then bent down behind hers, I saw two ivory columns, forming the sides of a pyramid, between which I should have been happy to draw my last breath at that moment. A jealous fabric concealed the apex of the pyramid from my eyes; it was upon that happy angle that all my desires were concentrated. What gratified me in my momentary joy was that my idol did not complain that I was taking too long over arranging her pillows.

When I had finished I dropped into a chair absorbed in thought. I contemplated the divinity who, in all innocence, never offered me a pleasure which did not at the same time promise me a greater.

"What are you thinking of?" she asked.

"Of the great happiness I have enjoyed."

"You are a cruel man."

"No, I am not cruel; for loving me as you do, you should not blush to be indulgent to me. Consider, too, that, to love you completely, I must believe that it was not by chance that I saw ravishing beauties, for if I believed that it was, I should have to think that chance might have granted a dastard, a coward, a blackguard the same happiness which I have enjoyed. Let me be grateful to you for having taught me this morning how happy a single one of my senses can make me. Can you be angry with my eyes?"

"Yes."

"Tear them out."

The next day, after the surgeon had gone, she sent her maid out to make some purchases.

"Oh!" she said, "she forgot to change my chemise."

"Too bad! Let me take her place."

"Gladly, but remember that only your eyes are permitted to take part."

"I agree."

At that, she unlaces her corset, removes it, then takes off her chemise and tells me to hand her the clean one. I was as if in ecstasy, admiring this beautiful third of her body.

"Hand it to me, will you? It is on the small table."

"Where?"

"There, at the foot of the bed. I'll get it myself."

She bends forward and, reaching toward the small table, lets me see the greater part of all that I longed to possess; and she does not hurry. I was at death's door. I take the chemise from her hands, and she sees my hands shaking exactly like those of a paralytic. I move her to pity, but only for my eyes: she abandons all her charms to them, and she intoxicates me by a new marvel. I see her staring at herself, lost in herself, and in a way which convinced me that she was delighting in her own beauty. At last she bends forward, and I slip on her chemise; but, throwing myself on her, I clasp her in my arms and she restores me to life, letting me devour her with kisses and not preventing my hands from touching all that of which my eyes had seen only the surface. Our mouths cling together and so we remain, motionless and not breathing, until a few moments after our amorous swoon, inadequate to our desires but sweet enough to give them an outlet. She kept herself in a position which made it impossible for me to enter the sanctuary, and she was always alert to stop my hands from making any movement which would have put before her eyes what would have made her defenseless.

CHAPTER VI

Appalling misfortune, which crushes me. Cooling of love. My departure from Corfu and my return to Venice. I abandon the military profession and become a fiddler.

HER wound was healing over, and the time was drawing near when, leaving her bed, she would return to her former course of life.

Signor Renier, Commandant-General of the galleys, had ordered a review at Govino. Signor F. had gone there the previous day and had ordered me to leave in the morning in the felucca. Supping alone with the Signora, I bewailed the fact that I should not see her the next day.

"Let us make up for it," she said, "and spend the night talking. Go to your room and come back here through my husband's, here are the keys to it. Come as soon as you see from your windows that my maid has left me."

I carried out her orders to the letter; and there we were, face to face, with five hours before us. It was June and very hot; she was in bed; I go and clasp her in my arms, she clasps me in hers; but exercising the most cruel of tyrannies over herself, she considers that I have nothing to complain of if I am in the same condition as she is. My remonstrances, my pleadings, all my words are of no avail; love has to suffer us to bridle it and then to laugh when, despite the harsh law we imposed upon it, we nevertheless reached the sweet crisis which calms it.

After the ecstasy our eyes, our mouths open together, and our heads draw apart to enjoy the satisfaction that could not but shine from our faces. Our desires were about to revive, and we were preparing to fulfill them, when I see her glance at my state of innocence, which was entirely exposed to her view; she seems to become angry, and after throwing off all that could only make the heat more oppressive and diminish my pleasure, she flings herself on me. I seemed to see something more than ardor, I saw a furious desire. I think the moment has come, I share her ardor, it is impossible for human strength to embrace her more closely; but at the decisive instant she struggles, she escapes me and, smiling sweetly, comes to the rescue with a hand which I think of ice, to quench my fire which, checked in the moment of explosion, was threatening dire havoc.

"My dear," say I, "you are all wet."

"Wipe me off."

"God, what charms! The supreme pleasure brought me a sudden death whose delights you did not share. Permit me, O highest object of my adoration, to make you entirely happy. Love keeps me alive only to enable me to die again; but nowhere save in that paradise which you always forbid me to enter."

"Oh, my dear! There is a furnace there. How can you keep your finger there without its being burned by the fire which devours me? Ah, my dear! Stop! Embrace me with all your strength. Come close to the vault; but take care that you do not bury yourself in it. In its stead you are free to take all that I have—my heart, my soul. Ye gods! My soul is leaving me! Catch it in your lips, and give me yours."

The period of silence was a little longer; but this imperfect enjoyment distressed me.

"How can you complain of it," she said, "when our abstinence makes our love immortal? I loved you a quarter of an hour ago, and now I love you even more; I should love you less if you had exhausted my joy by crowning all my desires."

"You are wrong, my dear; desires are truly torments, torments which would kill us if hope did not lessen their murderous power. The torments of Hell, believe me, can be only vain desires."

"But desires are always accompanied by hope."

"No, in Hell there is no hope."

"Then there are no desires, for no one but a madman can desire without hoping."

"Answer me, will you? If you desire to be wholly mine, and if you hope to be, how can you raise an obstacle to your own hope? My dear, you must stop blinding yourself with sophisms. Let us give each other complete happiness, and let us be sure that as many times as we satisfy our desires, they will each time be born anew."

"What I see convinces me of the contrary. I see you alive. If you had buried yourself in the fatal vault, I know from experience that you would not be showing a sign of life, or only at long intervals."

"Oh, my dear! Enough! I beg you! Stop believing in your experience. You have never known love. This which you call your vault is its house of delights; the only abode which can make it immortal. In short, this is its true paradise. Let me enter there, my angel, and I promise you I will die there; but then you will learn that there is a great difference between the death of Love and the death of Hymen. Hymen dies to relieve himself of life, while Love is pleased to perish only to enjoy life. Mistake no longer, my charmer, and be certain that when once we have enjoyed each other perfectly we shall but love each other the more.''

''Very well. I am willing to believe you; but let us wait. Meanwhile, let us indulge in all the games which can delight our senses; let us give the rein to all our faculties. Devour me; but in exchange, let me do just as I will with you; and if we find tonight too short we will bear it uncomplainingly tomorrow, certain that our love will find a way to give us another.''

''And if our mutual affection is discovered?''

''Do we hide it? Everyone sees that we love each other; and those who believe that we do not make each other happy are precisely those whom we should need to fear if they thought the opposite. Let us try only to prevent their ever catching us in the criminal moment; but Heaven and Nature are bound to protect us, those who love as we love are not guilty. Ever since I have been conscious of my existence I have always been carried away by amorous feelings. When I saw a man, I was delighted to see the being who was the half of my species which was born for me, as I was made for him and could not wait to be joined to him by the bond of marriage. I believed that what was called love came after the union; and I was surprised when my husband, making me a woman, made me know it only by a pain uncompensated by any pleasure. I saw that my imaginings in the convent had stood me in better stead. And so we became only good friends, seldom sleeping together and arousing no curiosity in each other; yet on good terms, for whenever he wants me, I am at his service; but since the dole is not seasoned with love, he finds it tasteless; and so he never demands it except when he thinks he needs it. As soon as I saw that you loved me, I was pleased, and I gave you every opportunity to fall more in love with me, being certain that, for my part, I would never love you; but when I found that I was wrong, and that I was falling in love too, I began treating you badly, as if to punish you for having awakened my heart. Your patience and persistence astonished me at the same time that they showed me I was wrong, and after our first kiss I found that I had no more power over myself. I did not know that one kiss could matter so much. I was certain that I could only become happy myself by making you happy. That both flattered me and pleased me, and tonight especially I have realized that I am happy only to the degree to which I see you happy."

"That, my dear, is the most refined of all the feelings which spring from love; but you will never make me completely happy until you bring yourself to house me here."

"No, not here; but you are free of all the walks and summerhouses. Would that I had a hundred!"

We spent the rest of the night indulging in all the transports to which our exasperated desires stimulated us and, on my part, acquiescing to all those to which she herself urged me in the ever fruitless hope that they would make up to her for her abstinence.

At daybreak I had to leave her to go to Govino; and she wept for joy when she saw that I left her as a conqueror. She had thought it beyond the power of nature.

After that night so rich in delights, ten or twelve days had passed during which we could not find an opportunity to quench the least spark of the fire with which we were burning, when the fatal event occurred which caused my downfall.

After supper, and after Signor D. R.'s departure, Signor F. told his wife in my presence that he would write two short letters and then come to bed with her. He is no sooner gone than she sits down on the foot of the bed; she looks at me, I fall into her arms, on fire with love; she surrenders herself, she lets me enter the sanctuary, and my soul is at last weltering in happiness; but she keeps me only for an instant. She allows me no time to enjoy the inexpressible pleasure of knowing that I am in possession of the treasure; she suddenly pulls away and pushes me from her, she rises and sinks into a chair, completely distraught. Motionless and astounded, I look at her, shaking, trying to understand what could have precipitated her unnatural action; and I hear her say, as she looks at me with her eyes alight with love:

"My dear, we were on the verge of our ruin."

"Ruin? You have killed me. Alas! I feel that I am at death's door. You may never see me again."

After these words, I leave the room, then the house, and make my way to the esplanade in search of fresh air, feeling that I was literally dying. He who has not himself experienced the anguish of such a moment cannot imagine it; and I am powerless to describe it. In my torment, I hear myself called from a window, I answer, I approach, and in the bright moonlight I see Melulla on her balcony.

"What are you doing there," I ask her, "at this hour?"

"I am alone, and I don't feel like going to bed. Come up for a minute."

This Melulla was a courtesan from Zante, whose extraordinary beauty had enchanted all Corfu for the past four months. Everyone who had seen her praised her charms, she was the talk of the city. I had seen her several times and, though she was beautiful, I should have thought her less so than Signora F. even if I had not been in love with her. In the year 1790, in Dresden, I saw a woman who looked the very image of Melulla. Her name was Magnus. She died two or three years later.

She shows me into a voluptuous boudoir where, after reproaching me for being the only man who had never come to see her, the only man who had scorned her, and the only man she wanted for a lover, she says that she has me now, that I shall not escape her, and that she will have her revenge. My coldness does not abash her. Skilled in her profession, she displays her charms to me, she lays hands on me, and I ignobly let myself be dragged to my ruin. Her beauties were a hundred times beneath those of the divine woman whom I was desecrating; but the infamous creature whom Hell had set there to fulfill my dark destiny attacked me at a moment when what had just happened to me left me without power over myself.

It was neither love, nor imagination, nor any merit in the woman before me, who was certainly unworthy to possess me, which led me to break my faith, but indolence, weakness, and compliance at a moment when my angel had offended me by a capricious act which, if I had not been a scoundrel unworthy of her, ought to have made me twice as much in love with her. Melulla, certain that she had pleased me, let me go two hours later, absolutely refusing to take the gold coins I tried to give her.

I went home to bed, loathing her and hating myself. After four hours of broken sleep I dress and go to wait on Signor F., who had sent for me. I do his errand, I return to the house, I enter the Signora's room, I see her at her toilet table, and I bid her good morning in the mirror. I see gaiety in her face and the peace of candor and innocence. Her lovely eyes meet mine, and I suddenly see her celestial countenance darkened by a cloud of sadness. She lowers her lids; she says nothing; a moment later she raises them and gazes at me as if trying to make me out and to read in my very soul. After that she falls into a silence which she does not break until she is left alone with me.

"There can be no dissimulating between us, my dear, either on my part or on yours. I felt very unhappy last night when you left; for I realized that what I had done could produce a dangerous shock to a man's constitution. So I resolved that in the future I will do as I should. I supposed that you had gone out to take the air, and I did not hold it against you. To make certain, I went to the window, and stayed there for a whole hour without ever seeing a light in your room. The Signore coming in, I had to go to bed with the grief of knowing that you were not in your room. Regretting what I had done and still filled with love, I slept little and badly. This morning the Signore ordered a subaltern to tell you he wanted to speak with you, and I heard the man answer that you were still sleeping because you had come home late. I am not jealous, for I know that you could not love any woman but myself.

"This morning when, thinking of you, I was preparing to let you know how much I repented of what I had done, I hear you come into my room, I look at you, and, in all truth, I think I am seeing a different man. I study you further, and despite myself my soul reads in your face that you are guilty of having offended me, deceived me, though I know not how. Now tell me, my dear, if I read rightly; in Love's name, tell me the truth; and if you have betrayed me, tell me so without prevaricating. In my determination to admit that I am the cause of it all, it is myself whom I will not forgive; but for your part, you are sure of forgiveness."

In the course of my life I have more than once found myself under the bitter necessity of telling a lie to the woman whom I loved; but after such a speech, could I preserve my self-respect and lie to this angel? I was so little able to lie to her that, overcome with feeling, I could not answer her until after I had dried my tears.

"My dear," she says, "you are weeping. Tell me quickly if you have made me unhappy. What black revenge can you have taken on me, who am utterly incapable of doing anything to offend you? I can have hurt you only in the innocence of my loving heart."

"I have had no thought of revenge, for my heart has never ceased to adore you. It is against myself that my weakness has led me to commit a crime which makes me unworthy of your favors for all the rest of my life."

"You have given yourself to some strumpet."

"I spent two hours in an orgy at which my soul was present only as the witness to my grief, my remorse, and my wrongdoing."

"In grief and overwhelmed by remorse! I believe it. It is my own fault, my dear, it is I who must ask you to forgive me."

Seeing her tears, I could no longer restrain mine from flowing unimpeded. Noble soul! Divine soul, under whose influence the worst of men could not but become good! Courageously taking all the guilt upon herself, she impelled me to use every resource of my mind to persuade her that the thing would never have happened if I had been a man really worthy of her love. And it was true.

We spent the day quietly, giving no outlet to the sorrow in our hearts. She insisted on knowing all the details of the wretched story, and she assured me that we must both consider what had happened as inevitable, for, she said, the same thing would have befallen the most circumspect of men. As she thought I was only to be pitied, she found it no reason to love me less. We were certain that we would seize the first opportunity to give each other fresh proofs of our unaltered affection. But Heaven, which is often just, did not permit it. It had found me guilty, and I had to undergo the punishment it decreed.

On getting out of bed on the third morning, I have a disagreeable sensation: an intense smarting. I tremble, imagining what it may be. I want to know the truth, and I am stupefied to see that I have been infected with Melulla's poison. I am aghast. I go back to bed and surrender to the most distressing reflections. But what was not my horror when I thought of the disaster which could have befallen me the previous evening! What would have been my state if Signora F., to convince me of her unchanged love, had granted me her favors completely? What should I have done after I had made her wretched for the rest of her life? Could anyone who should know my story condemn me if I had freed myself from my remorse by a voluntary death? No, for a philosopher would not have seen me as a wretch who kills himself in despair, but as justly inflicting the punishment my crime would have deserved. I should certainly have killed myself.

Sunk in depression, for the fourth time a victim of this pestilential scourge, I prepared to give myself a course of treatment which would have restored me to health in six weeks without anyone being the wiser; but I was wrong again. Melulla had infected me with all the disasters of her hell, and within a week I saw all their miserable symptoms. So I had to put myself in the hands of an old doctor, who, from his long experience, assured me that he would cure me in two months, and he kept his word. I was in excellent health at the beginning of September, the time when I returned to Venice.

My first resolve was to inform Signora F. of my misfortune. I must not wait for the moment when my confession would have accused her of imprudence and weakness. I must not give her occasion to reflect that the passion she had conceived for me exposed her to such terrible dangers, or to what fate it could have doomed her. Her affection was too dear to my heart for me to run the risk of losing her through failing to have confidence in her. Knowing her intelligence, the candor of her soul, and the generosity with which she had thought me only to be pitied, I must at least show her, by my sincerity, that I deserved her esteem.

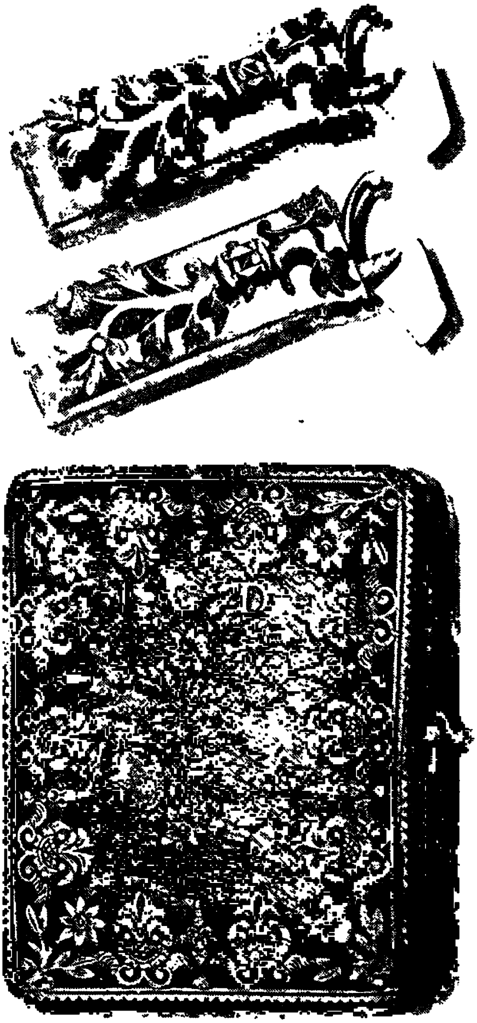
I therefore gave her an exact account of my condition, and feelingly described the state of my soul when I thought of the fearful consequences which our love would have had if we had surrendered ourselves to amorous transports after I had confessed my crime to her. I saw her shudder at the thought, I saw her turn pale and tremble later when I said I would have avenged her by killing myself. During my narrative she kept exclaiming that Melulla was an infamous hussy. Everyone in Corfu knew that I had paid her a visit, and everyone was surprised that I seemed to be in good health, for the number of young men whom she had treated as she had treated me was not small.

But in addition to my illness, I had several other troubles. It was decided that I should return to Venice, and with the same rank of ensign with which I had left it. The Proveditor-General had failed to keep his promise to me because in Venice the bastard son of a patrician had been given the preference over me. I thereupon resolved to leave the service. A still greater vexation was that my luck forsook me completely. To lighten my sorrows I had gone back to play, and I lost every day. From the moment when I had been ignoble enough to surrender to Melulla every curse had descended on me. The last misfortune, though I accepted it as a mercy, was that a week or ten days before the departure of the entire army Signor D. R. took me back into his service. Signor F. had had to find a new adjutant. Signora F. told me sadly that at Venice we could not see each other, for a number of reasons. I asked her not to explain them to me, being certain that I should only find them mortifying. I saw into her soul one day when she told me that she pitied me. She could not have that feeling toward me unless she no longer loved me; besides, scorn infallibly follows close upon the dreary sentiment of pity. From that moment on, I never found myself alone with her. Still loving her, I could easily have made her blush by reproaching her with the undue ease with which she had recovered from her passion. She had scarcely returned to Venice before she fell in love with Signor F. R.,[1] and she loved him faithfully until he died of a consumption. She went blind twenty years later and I think she is still living.

During the last two months I spent in Corfu I saw something worthy to be placed before the inmost eyes of my dear readers. I learned what it meant for a man to be out of luck.

Before I knew Melulla, my health was good, I was rich, lucky at cards, generally liked, and adored by the prettiest woman in the city. When I spoke, everyone took my side. After becoming acquainted with that ill-omened creature, I quickly lost health, money, credit, good humor, consideration, wit, the ability to express myself, and, with it, my power of persuasion; besides all this, I lost my influence over Signora F., who almost insensibly became the most indifferent of women to all my concerns. I left without money and after having sold or pawned everything I possessed. In addition, I contracted debts which I never thought of paying, not from malice prepense but from sheer carelessness. What I thought strange was that, once I had grown thin and was obviously without money, no one showed me the least consideration. No one listened when I talked, or, if anyone did, it was only to find me dull instead of the wit he would have proclaimed me if I had still been rich. Nam bene nummatum decorat Suadela Venusque ("For Persuasion and Venus adorn the man of money").[2] People shunned me as if my bad luck were infectious; and perhaps they were right.

We left at the end of September, with five galleys, two galleasses, and several small vessels under the command of Signor Renier, sailing along the coast of the Adriatic in the northern part of the Gulf,[3] which is as rich in ports on that side as it is poor on the other. We made port every evening, so that I saw Signora F. every day when she came to sup with her husband on board the galleass. We made a prosperous voyage. We dropped anchor in the port of Venice on October 14th, 1745, and after undergoing quarantine on the galleass, we left it on November 25th, and two months later galleasses were abolished.[4] They were a very old type of vessel,



Spring-lancets for Bloodletting and Case expensive to maintain, and of no apparent use. The galleass had the hull of a frigate and benches as in a galley, on which five hundred galley slaves rowed when there was no wind.

Before they were wisely abolished, there were great debates in the Senate. Those who were opposed advanced several arguments, the strongest of which was that everything old should be respected and preserved. This argument, which seems absurd, is nevertheless the most powerful argument in all republics. There is not a single republic which does not tremble at the mere mention of novelty, not only in what is important but in the lightest matters as well. Miranturque nihil nisi quod Libitina sacravit ("They admire nothing but what Libitina [the goddess of funerals] has hallowed").[5] Superstition always plays a part.

What the Republic of Venice will never change is the galleys, not only because they are of great use in a narrow sea which must be navigated even when there is no wind, but because it would not know where to put, or what to do with, the criminals it sentences to the oar.

A strange thing which I observed at Corfu, where there are often three thousand galley slaves, is that those who are such in consequence of some crime which has earned them the punishment are held in contempt, while the buonavoglia[6] are in a certain measure respected. I thought it should have been exactly the opposite. In that country, moreover, the galley slaves are in every way better off than the soldiers, and enjoy several privileges; whence it follows that a great many soldiers desert and sell themselves to a sopracomito. The captain of the company from which the soldier has deserted can only submit, for any attempt on his part to reclaim the man would be vain. The Venetian Republic at that time considered itself more in need of galley slaves than of soldiers. At present it must think otherwise. (I write this in the year 1797.)

Among other privileges a galley slave has that of stealing without being punished. It is generally considered the least of the crimes for which he should be forgiven. ‘‘Be on your guard,’’ says the galley slave’s master, ‘‘and if you catch him beat him; but do not cripple him or you will have to pay me the hundred ducati he costs me.’’

Even a court of justice cannot send a criminal galley slave to the gallows without paying his master what he is out of pocket for him.

Scarcely was I in Venice, after finishing my quarantine, before I went to call on Signora Orio; but I found the house empty. A neighbor told me that the advocate Rosa had married her and that she had gone to live in his house. I went there at once, and was very well received. She told me that Nanetta had become the Countess R. and had gone to Guastalla with her husband. Twenty-four years later I saw her son a distinguished officer in the service of the Infante the Duke of Parma.[7] As for Marta, she had become a nun in Murano. Two years later she wrote me a letter in which she adjured me in the name of Jesus Christ and the Holy Virgin not to think of entering her presence. She said that she was bound to forgive me for the crime I had committed by seducing her, because in consequence of that very crime she was certain to save her soul by spending her whole life in repentance for it. She ended her letter by assuring me that she would never cease to pray to God for my conversion. I never saw her again, but she saw me in 1754. My reader shall hear the rest when we have reached that point.

I found Signora Manzoni the same as ever. She had predicted to me, before I left for the Levant, that I would not remain in the military profession either, and she laughed when I told her I had already decided to give it up, since I could not stomach the unjust manner in which another had been preferred over me despite the promise I had been given. She asked me what profession I would take up after renouncing the trade of war, and I answered that I would practice as an advocate. She burst out laughing, and said it was too late.[8] I was only twenty years old.

When I waited on Signor Grimani, I was very well received; but great was my surprise when, on my asking him where my brother Francesco was living, he told me that he was keeping him in the fortress of Sant'Andrea, the very place in which he had had me confined before the arrival of the Bishop of Martorano.

"In the fortress," he said, "he works for the Major. He is copying battle paintings by Simonini,[9] for which the Major pays him; in this way he earns his living and is becoming a good painter."

"But he is not under arrest?"

"It amounts to that, for he is not free to leave the fortress. The Major, whose name is Spiridion, is on good terms with Razzetta, who found it easy to give him the pleasure of looking after your brother."

Horrified that the bloodthirsty Razzetta[10] should be the doom of my entire family, I ask him if my sister[11] was still in his house, and he says that she had gone to Dresden to live with her mother. Leaving Signor Grimani's, I go to the fortress of Sant'Andrea, where I find my brother brush in hand, in good health and neither content nor discontent with his situation.

"What crime did you commit," I asked him, "to be sentenced to live here?"

"Ask the Major—here he comes."

The Major enters, my brother tells him who I am, I bow to him and ask him by what authority he was keeping my brother under arrest. He answers that he is not accountable to me. I tell my brother to take his hat and cloak and come to dinner with me, and the Major bursts out laughing, saying that if the sentry let him pass he could go with me. I keep my own counsel and leave by myself, resolved to go and speak with the Savio alla Scrittura.

It was on the following morning that I presented myself at his office, where I found my dear Major Pelodoro, who had been transferred to the fortress of Chioggia. I informed him of the complaint which I wished to lay before the Savio in regard to my brother, and at the same time of my resolve to resign from the service. He answered that as soon as I had obtained the Savio's consent, he would arrange to have my commission sold for me at the price I had paid for it. The Savio arrived, and in half an hour everything was settled. He promised to approve my resignation as soon as he had assured himself that my replacement was a capable man; and, Major Spiridion happening to appear just then, the Savio ordered him to set my brother at liberty, after reprimanding him severely in my presence. I went to get him out after dinner and brought him to stay with me in San Luca in a furnished room in the Calle del Carbon.

A few days later I received my discharge and a hundred zecchini, and had to doff my uniform.

Obliged to think of doing something to earn my living, I thought of becoming a professional gambler; but Fortune did not favor my plan. In less than a week I found myself penniless; and thereupon I decided to become a fiddler. Doctor Gozzi had taught me enough so that I could scrape away in a theater orchestra. I applied to Signor Grimani for such a post, and he at once put me in the orchestra of his Teatro San Samuele, where, earning a scudo a day, I was able to maintain myself. Seeing myself for what I was, I deliberately stayed away from all fashionable gatherings and from the houses which I frequented before I took up this sorry profession. I knew that everyone must be calling me a bad lot, and I did not care. People were bound to despise me; but I consoled myself with the knowledge that I was not despicable. Seeing myself reduced to this condition after having enjoyed such splendid opportunities, I felt ashamed, but I kept it to myself. I felt humiliated, but not degraded. Not having abjured the goddess Fortune, I thought that I could still count on her. I knew that she exercises her sway over all mortals without consulting them, provided that they are young; and I was young.

CHAPTER VII

I go completely to the dogs. A piece of extraordinary good luck raises me from my low estate and I become a rich nobleman.

AFTER an education calculated to lead me into an honorable profession suitable for a young man who, in addition to a good grounding in letters, was endowed with promising qualities of mind and with those accidental personal advantages which always and everywhere produce an impression, here I am, at the age of twenty, become a menial journeyman of a sublime art in which, if he who excels is admired, the mediocrity is rightly despised. I became a member of a theater orchestra, in which position I could demand neither esteem nor consideration and must even expect the scorn of those who had known me as a doctor, then as an ecclesiastic, then as a soldier, and had seen me received and made much of in polished and noble circles.

All this I knew; but contempt, to which I could not have remained indifferent, was not shown me. I defied it, for I knew that it was deserved only by baseness, and with that in any form I could not reproach myself. As for esteem, I let my ambition sleep. Satisfied with being at no one's beck and call, I proceeded on my way without worrying about the future. Forced to become an ecclesiastic, and unable to succeed by any other course than that of hypocrisy, I should have been disgusted with myself; and to continue in the military profession, I should have had to practice a patience of which I had no reason to believe myself capable. I considered that the profession one adopts should produce an income sufficient to meet the necessities of life, and that the salary I should have received in return for serving in the troops of the Republic would not have sufficed me; for because of my upbringing, my needs were greater than others'. Playing the violin, I earned enough to keep myself without turning to anyone. Happy are they who can boast that they are self-sufficient. My profession was not a noble one, but I did not care. Calling everything prejudice, I soon acquired all the habits of my degraded fellow musicians. After the performance I went with them to a tavern, which we left only in a state of intoxication to spend the night in some house of ill fame. When we found it full, we forced the occupants to take to their heels, and we decamped without paying the unhappy women who had submitted to our brutality even the miserable recompense which the law accords them. These highhanded proceedings often exposed us to the most obvious dangers.

We often spent our nights roaming through different quarters of the city, thinking up the most scandalous practical jokes and putting them into execution. We amused ourselves by untying the gondolas moored before private houses, which then drifted with the current to one side of the Grand Canal or the other, and making merry over the curses the gondoliers would call down on us the next morning when they did not find their gondolas where they had moored them.

We often woke midwives and made them dress and go to deliver women who, when they arrived, called them fools. We did the same to the most celebrated physicians, whose slumbers we interrupted to send them to noblemen who, we told them, had suffered an apoplexy, and we routed priests from their beds and packed them off to pray for the souls of people in perfect health who, we said, were at death's door.

In every street through which we passed we relentlessly cut the bell cord hanging at every door; and when we happened to find a door open because someone had forgotten to shut it, we groped our way up the stairs and terrified all the sleeping inmates by shouting at their bedroom doors that the street door of the house was open. And then we decamped, leaving the house door as open as we had found it.

One very dark night we decided to overturn a big marble table which was a sort of monument. The table stood almost in the middle of the Campo Sant'Angelo.[1] In the days of the war which the Republic had fought against the League of Cambrai,[2] so the story ran, it was on this big table that the commissaries had counted out their pay to the recruits who enrolled in the service of St. Mark.

When we could get into bell towers, we thought it great sport to alarm the whole neighborhood by ringing the tocsin which announces a fire, or to cut all the bell ropes. When we crossed the canal, instead of all going together in a gondola, each of us took one, and when we got out on the other side we all ran away, to make the gondoliers, whom we had not paid, run after us.

The whole city was complaining of our nocturnal malefactions, and we laughed at the investigations which were made to discover the disturbers of the public peace. We had to keep our secret most carefully, for if we had been discovered the authorities might well have given themselves the pleasure of sentencing all of us to spend some time on board the galley of the Council of Ten, which is moored opposite the two tall columns in the Piazzetta San Marco.

We were seven, and sometimes eight, for as I was very fond of my brother Francesco I often took him along with us. But fear finally tempered, and even ended, our excesses. Here is the story.

In each of the seventy-two parishes of the city of Venice, there is a big tavern called a magazzeno,[3] where wine is sold at retail, which stays open all night, and where one can drink more cheaply than at the other taverns in the city, where food is also provided. One can also eat at the magazzeno by sending out for what one wants to the pork butcher's shop, which is also regularly to be found in each parish and which is open all night. The pork butcher also keeps a cook-shop, where he prepares execrable food; but since he sells everything cheaply his establishment is of great use to the poor. In the magazzeno itself one never sees either members of the nobility or citizens in good circumstances, for cleanliness is not to be found there. These places are frequented only by the common people. They have small rooms containing only a table surrounded by benches instead of chairs.

It was during one Carnival, midnight had struck, we were eight, all masked, roving through the city, each of us trying to gain distinction in our comrades' eyes by thinking up some new kind of practical joke. Passing the magazzeno of the parish named Santa Croce,[4] we are tempted to go in for a drink. We enter, we walk about, and we find no one except three men peaceably drinking with a rather pretty woman. Our leader, who was a Venetian nobleman belonging to one of the Balbi families, said it would be a fine trick, and a new one, to carry off the poor topers in one direction and the woman in another, so that we could use her afterward at our good pleasure. He tells us his plan in detail, we approve it, he gives us our roles, and, well concealed by our masks, he leads us into the room, where, taking off his mask, certain that even so he will not be recognized, he addresses the startled men in the following words:

"On pain of death, and by order of the heads of the Council of Ten,[5] come with us at once, not making the slightest sound; as for you, my good woman, you have nothing to fear. You will be taken home."

He had scarcely finished his speech before two of our band took the woman and immediately conducted her to the place where our leader had told them to go and wait for us, and we seize the three trembling men, whose last thought is to resist us. The waiter comes running up to be paid, and our leader pays him, ordering him to say nothing, still on pain of death. We take the three men on board a large boat; our leader gets up on the poop, ordering the boatman to row at the bow. The boatman is forced to obey, not knowing where he may go, for the course depends on the man on the poop. None of us knew where our leader was going to take the three poor devils.

He takes a course to leave the canal, leaves it, and in a quarter of an hour arrives at San Giorgio,[6] where he disembarks the three prisoners, who are glad to be left there, for they must have been fearing they would be murdered. Then our leader, feeling tired, has the boatman go up on the poop and orders him to take us to San Geremia,[7] where after paying him liberally, he leaves him in his boat.

From San Geremia we go to the Campiello del Remer, in San Marcuola,[8] where my brother and another of our band were waiting for us in a corner, sitting on the ground with the woman, who was crying.

"Don't cry, my beauty," said our leader, "no harm will come to you. We will go and drink a glass in Rialto and then we will take you home."

"Where is my husband?"

"You will see him back at home tomorrow morning."

Relieved by his answer, and docile as a sheep, she came with us to the inn of the "Two Swords,"[9] where we made a good fire in an upstairs room and where, after having food and drink brought, we sent the waiter away. We then removed our masks, and we saw the woman we had carried off become all amiability at the sight of our faces and the way in which we behaved. After we had encouraged her with words and glasses of wine there befell her what she could not but be expecting. Our leader, as was only right, was the first to pay her his amorous duty, after most politely overcoming her reluctance to yield to him in the presence of us all. She chose the sensible course of laughing and letting him do as he pleased.

But I saw that she was surprised when I came forward to be the second; she thought herself obligated to show her gratitude; and when, after my turn, she saw the third, she no longer doubted of her happy fate, which promised her all the members of the band. She was not mistaken. My brother was the only one who pretended to be ill. He had no other choice, for the law among us irrevocably demanded that each of us do what another did.

After this fine exploit, we resumed our masks, paid the innkeeper, and took the happy woman to San Giobbe,[10] where she lived, leaving her only when we saw her opening her door. None of us could keep from laughing when she thanked us most sincerely and in the most perfect good faith. After that we separated and all went home.

It was not until two days later that our escapade began to be talked of. The young woman's husband was a weaver, as were his two friends. He joined with them in approaching the heads of the Council of Ten with a complaint in which he presented a completely truthful account of our action, the atrocity of which was, however, diminished by a circumstance which must have set the three judges laughing, as it did the whole city. The document said that the eight maskers had subjected the woman to no ill treatment. The two maskers who had carried her off had taken her to such-and-such a place where, the six others having arrived an hour later, they all went to the "Swords," where they spent an hour drinking. They had then taken her home, begging her to excuse them for having played a trick on her husband. The three weavers had not been able to leave the island of San Giorgio until daybreak, and when the husband reached home he found his wife in bed fast asleep; upon waking she had told him the whole story. She complained only of the great fear she had felt, and she demanded justice and exemplary punishment for it. Everything about the complaint was comical, for the husband said that the eight maskers would not have found them so easy if their leader had not used the respected name of the Council.

The complaint had three results. The first was to set the whole city laughing. The second was to send every idler to San Giobbe to hear the heroine herself tell the story. The third was to make the tribunal issue a decree promising five hundred ducati to anyone who should reveal the guilty parties, even if it were one of themselves, except only their leader. The reward would have made us tremble, if our leader, the only one among us whose character would have let him turn informer, had not been a Venetian nobleman. This rank of our leader's made me certain that, even had one of us been capable of reporting the facts to gain the five hundred ducati, the tribunal would have done nothing, since it would have had to punish a patrician. No such traitor was found among us, though we were all poor. But we were so frightened that we all mended our ways and our nocturnal expeditions came to an end.

Three or four months later the Cavaliere Nicolò Tron, who was then a State Inquisitor, astonished me by telling me the whole story of the escapade, and naming all my companions in it, one after the other.

In the middle of the spring of the following year, 1746, Signor Girolamo Cornaro, the eldest son of the house of Cornaro della Regina,[11] married a daughter of the Soranzo di San Polo family, and I was one of the fiddlers making up one of the several orchestras for the balls which were given for three days in the Palazzo Soranzo[12] on the occasion of the marriage.

On the third day, when the festivities were nearly over, I leave the orchestra an hour before dawn to go home, and as I go down the stairs I notice a senator in his red robe[13] about to get into his gondola. I see a letter drop to the ground beside him as he is drawing his handkerchief from his pocket. I advance and pick up the letter and, catching up with the imposing Signore just as he is going down the steps, I hand it to him. He thanks me, he asks me where I live, I tell him, he insists upon taking me home, I accept the courtesy he was kind enough to offer me, and take a place on the bench beside him. Three minutes later he asks me to shake his left arm: "I feel," he said, "such a numbness that I seem not to have this arm at all." I shake it with all my might, and I hear him tell me, in ill-articulated words, that he felt as if he were losing his whole leg too and that he thought he was dying.

Greatly alarmed, I open the curtain, take the lantern, look at his face, and am terrified to see that his mouth was drawn up toward his left ear and his eyes were losing their luster.

I call to the gondoliers to stop and let me get out to find a surgeon who will come at once and bleed His Excellency, who had certainly been struck by apoplexy.

I disembark. It was at the bridge by the Calle Bernardo, where three years earlier I had given Razzetta a cudgeling. I run to the coffeehouse, someone shows me where a surgeon lives. I knock loudly, I shout, the door opens, the man is wakened, I urge him to hurry, I will not let him dress, he takes his case and comes with me to the gondola, where he bleeds the dying man, and I tear up my shirt to make him a bandage.

We quickly reach his palace in Santa Marina;[14] the servants are awakened, he is removed from his gondola, carried to his apartment on the second floor, undressed, and put to bed almost dead. I tell a servant to run for a physician, he goes, the physician arrives and bleeds him again. I station myself beside his bed, considering it my duty not to leave.

An hour later a patrician who is a friend of his arrives, then I see another, they are in despair, they question the gondoliers, who tell them that I am better able to answer them than they are. They question me, I tell them all that I knew; they do not know who I am, they do not dare to ask me, and I tell them nothing. The patient lay motionless, with no sign of life but his breathing. Fomentations were applied, and the priest who had been fetched expected him to die. No visitors were admitted, the two patricians and I were the only persons who remained with him. I join them at noon in a light dinner without leaving the room. Toward evening the elder of the two patricians tells me that I may leave if I have business to attend to, since they intended to stay with the sick man all night, lying down on mattresses which they would order brought. I answer that I will sleep in the chair in which I was, since I felt certain that if I left, the patient would die, just as I felt certain that he could not die so long as I remained there. I see them exchange looks, astonished at my answer.

I learn from them as we are eating supper together that the dying nobleman was Signor Bragadin, only brother of the Procuratore of the same name.[15] This Signor Bragadin was celebrated in Venice not only because of his eloquence and his talents as a statesman but also because of the love affairs which had signalized his stormy youth. He had committed extravagances for women who had likewise committed them for his sake; he had gambled a great deal and lost a great deal, and his brother the Procuratore was his bitterest enemy because he had taken it into his head that he had tried to poison him. He had accused him of the crime before the Council of Ten, which, eight months later, had unanimously declared him innocent; but the Procuratore had not changed his opinion. This innocent man, oppressed by his unjust brother, who despoiled him of half his income, nevertheless lived the life of an amiable philosopher in the bosom of friendship. He had two friends, the men whom I saw with him: one was of the Dandolo and the other of the Barbaro family, both of them as upright and amiable as himself. He was handsome, learned, fond of a joke, and meek in disposition. His age at the time was fifty.

The physician who had undertaken to cure him, whose name was Ferro, was persuaded for reasons all his own that he could restore him to health by applying an ointment of mercury to his chest; and he was given his way. The rapid effect of this remedy, which was well received by his two friends, alarmed me greatly. Its rapidity appeared in the fact that in less than twenty-four hours the patient was troubled by a violent brain fever. The physician said that he knew the ointment would produce this effect, but that the next day its action on the brain would diminish and proceed to the other parts of the body, which needed to be stimulated both artificially and by an equilibrium in the circulation of the fluids.

At midnight Signor Bragadin was on fire and in a dangerous state of agitation; I get up, and I see him with lusterless eyes and scarcely able to breathe. I rouse the two friends from their mattresses, saying that the patient must be relieved of what would kill him. Not waiting for them to answer, I uncover his chest, I remove the plaster, then wash him with warm water, and within three or four minutes he has recovered from his agitation and is resting easy in the gentlest of sleep. We go back to bed.

The physician arrives very early in the morning and is delighted to find his patient in good condition. Signor Dandolo tells him what had been done, as the result of which he found his patient improved. The physician complains of such a liberty having been taken and asks who has played havoc with his treatment. Signor Bragadin tells him that the person who had delivered him from the mercury which was about to kill him was a physician who knew more than he did; and so saying points to me.

I do not know which of us was the more surprised, whether the physician at seeing a young man he had never seen before declared more learned than himself, or I, who did not know that I was so. I maintained a modest silence, though finding it difficult to stifle my laughter, while the physician looked at me and rightly concluded that I was a brazen charlatan who had dared to supplant him. He coldly informed the sick man that he surrendered his place to me, and he was taken at his word. He leaves, and leaves me promoted physician to one of the most illustrious members of the Venetian Senate. All in all, I was delighted. I then told my patient that all he needed was to diet and that nature would do the rest in the mild weather which would soon be upon us.

Thus dismissed, Doctor Ferro told the story all over the city; and since the patient felt better every day, one of his relatives who came to visit him said that everyone was amazed that he had been pleased to make a fiddler from a theater orchestra his physician. Signor Bragadin laughed and replied that a fiddler might well know more than all the physicians in Venice.

His Excellency listened to me as if I were an oracle. His two surprised friends accorded me the same attention. Encouraged by this obsequiousness, I spoke as a physician, I dogmatized, and I cited authors whom I had never read.

Signor Bragadin, who had the weakness to dabble in the abstruse sciences, told me one day that he thought me too wise for a young man, and hence I must have some supernatural gift. He asked me to tell him the truth. It was then that, in order not to offend his vanity by telling him he was wrong, I hit upon the strange expedient of making him, in the presence of his two friends, a confidence as false as it was extravagant, namely, that I was in possession of a numerical calculus which, when I put it a written question which I reduced to numerals, returned me an answer, likewise in numerals, which gave me the information I wanted and which no one on earth could have imparted to me. Signor Bragadin said that it was the Key of Solomon,[16] known to the uninitiated as the cabala. He asked me from whom I had learned the science, and when I answered that the person who had taught it to me was a hermit who was living on Monte Carpegna[17] when I was under arrest in the Spanish army, he said that the hermit must have bound an invisible spirit to the calculus without my knowledge, for mere numbers could not have the power to reason.

"You are in possession," he said, "of a treasure, and it rests with you to derive the greatest advantage from it."

I answered that I did not know how I could derive any great advantage from it, and the more so since the answers my calculus gave me were so obscure that I had become disgusted with it of late and almost never put any questions to it.

"Yet it is true," I added, "that if I had not constructed my pyramid [18] three weeks ago, I should not have had the happiness of knowing Your Excellency."

"How is that?"

"Having asked my oracle, on the second day of the festivities in the Palazzo Soranzo, if I should meet anyone at the ball there whom I did not wish to meet, it answered that I must leave the festival at exactly ten o'clock.''[19]

Signor Bragadin and his two friends were as if turned to stone. Signor Dandolo then asked me to answer a question which he would ask me himself, and which he alone was able to interpret, since he alone knew the facts. He writes the question, he hands it to me, I read it, I understand neither the question nor the subject to which it refers, but it does not matter, I have to give an answer. If the question is so obscure to me that I cannot understand the first thing about it, I ought not to understand the first thing about the answer either. So I answer in four verses in ordinary figures, which he alone could interpret, displaying complete indifference as to the interpretation. Signor Dandolo reads them, reads them over again, shows surprise, he understands it perfectly, it is divine, it is unique, it is a heavenly treasure. The numbers are merely the vehicle, but the answer can only have come from an immortal intelligence. After Signor Dandolo, Signor Barbaro and Signor Bragadin ask questions on all sorts of subjects, they find all my answers divine, I congratulate them, and say that I am happy to be in possession of something which I had scarcely valued until then but which I would now value highly, since I saw that it put me in a position to be useful to Their Excellencies.

They then all three asked me together how long it would take me to teach them the rules of the calculus. I answered that it was a matter of very little time, and that I would do it even though the hermit had told me that if I taught it to anyone before I had reached the age of fifty I would drop dead three days afterward. ''I do not,'' I said, ''believe in his threat.'' Signor Bragadin then told me in the most serious tone that I ought to believe in it, and from then on none of the three again asked me to teach him the art of the cabala. They considered that if they could attach me to them, it would be the same as being in possession of the cabala themselves. Thus I became the hierophant [20] of these three men who, with all their worth and their amiability, were lacking in wisdom, since they dabbled in what are known as the chimeras of knowledge: they believed in the possibility of what was morally impossible. With me at their orders, they saw themselves in possession of the philosophers' stone, the universal medicine,[21] communication with the elemental spirits[22] and all the celestial intelligences, and of the secrets of all the governments of Europe. They also believed in magic,[23] to which they gave the specious name of occult physics.

After convincing themselves of the divinity of my cabala by questions concerning things which had happened in the past, they proceeded to make it of use to them by always consulting it concerning the present and the future, and I did not find it hard to practice divination, since I never gave an answer which did not have two meanings, one of which, however, known only to me, was not revealed until after the event. My cabala was never wrong. I now understood how easy it had been for the ancient priests of paganism to impose on the ignorant and credulous universe. But what has always amazed me is that the Holy Fathers of the Christian Church, who were not simple, ignorant men like our Evangelists, thinking that they could not deny the divinity of oracles, attributed them to the devil. They would not have thought in this fashion if they had known the art of the cabala. My three friends were like the Holy Fathers: seeing the divinity of my answers, and not being ill-natured enough to think me a devil, they believed that my oracle was animated by an angel.

These three noblemen were not only Christians perfectly loyal to their religion, they were pious and scrupulous: all three of them were unmarried, and all three had become irreconcilable enemies of women, after renouncing them. They held that such a renunciation was the chief condition which the elemental spirits enforced upon those who wished to have commerce with them. The one excluded the other.

What struck me as extremely strange when I first began to know these three patricians was that they were all highly endowed with what is known as intelligence. But a prejudiced intelligence reasons badly, and what is essential is to reason well. I often laughed to myself when I heard them talk of the mysteries of our religion and deride people whose intellectual faculties were so limited that those mysteries were incomprehensible to them. The incarnation of the Word was mere play to God, and the Resurrection was so trifling a matter that they could not think it a miracle, for the flesh being accessory, and it being impossible that God should be dead, Jesus Christ naturally had to return to life. As for the Eucharist, the real presence and transubstantiation were for them (praemissis concessis [''the premises being granted'']) the most obvious things possible. They went to confession every week, without feeling the least diffidence in the presence of their confessors, whose ignorance they lamented. They thought it their duty to confess only what they believed to be a sin, and on this point their reasoning was perfectly correct.

With these three noblemen who, eccentric as they were, deserved and enjoyed respect for their probity, their birth, their prestige, and their age, I thoroughly enjoyed myself, despite the fact that in their avidity for knowledge they often kept me busy for eight or ten hours a day, with the four of us shut up together and no visitors admitted. I made them my intimate friends by telling them the whole story of my life until then, which I did quite frankly, though not in every detail as I have just set it down, in order not to lead them into any mortal sins.

I know that I deceived them, and that hence I did not act toward them as a man of honor in all the rigor of the term; but if my reader is a man of the world, I ask him to think a little before considering me unworthy of his indulgence.

If I wanted my morality to be perfectly pure, I should —I am told—either not have become intimate with them or have disabused them. Disabused them? No—I answer —for I did not think myself capable of it. I should only have made them laugh; they would have called me an ignoramus and sent me packing. They would not have paid me for it, and I felt no vocation to set myself up as an apostle. As for my making a heroic resolve to leave them, as I might have done, as soon as I learned that they were visionaries, I will answer that to make it I should have had to have the morality of a misanthrope, an enemy of mankind, of nature, of good manners, and of himself. As a young man who needed to live well and to enjoy the pleasures which my constitution demanded at that age, should I have run the risk of leaving Signor Bragadin to die, should I have had the barbarity to leave these three worthy men open to the deceits of some dishonest scoundrel who might have contrived to make their acquaintance and ruined them by inducing them to undertake the chimerical operation of the Great Work?[24] In addition, an invincible self-esteem prevented me from showing myself unworthy of their friendship by my ignorance, or my pride, or my bad manners, of which I should have given them unmistakable proof if I had rejected their acquaintance.

I took the most creditable, the noblest, and the only natural course. I decided to put myself in a position where I need no longer go without the necessities of life; and what those necessities were for me no one could judge better than I. With the friendship of these three eminent persons, I became a man who would enjoy consideration and prestige in his own country. In addition, I should have the very flattering pleasure of becoming the subject of conversation and of the speculations of those who in their idleness insist on divining the causes of all the moral phenomena which they observe. No one in Venice could understand how an intimacy could exist between myself and three men of their character, they all heaven and I all earth; they most severe in their morals, and I addicted to every kind of dissolute living.

At the beginning of the summer Signor Bragadin was well enough to return to the Senate. The following is the discourse he addressed to me on the eve of the day on which he went out for the first time.

"Whoever you are, I owe you my life. Your patrons who wanted to make you a priest, a scholar, an advocate, a soldier, and then a violinist were fools who did not know you. God commanded your angel to bring you to me. I have come to know you; if you wish to be my son, you have only to recognize me as your father and from thenceforth I will treat you as such in my house until I die. Your apartment is ready, have your things brought to it, you will have a servant, and a gondola at my expense, you will eat at our table, and have ten zecchini a month. At your age my father did not give me a larger allowance. You need not think of the future; think of amusing yourself, and take me as your counselor in whatever befalls you and whatever you wish to undertake, and you will always find me your good friend."

I instantly threw myself at his feet to assure him of my gratitude, and addressed him by the sweet name of father. I swore to obey him as his son. The two other friends, who were staying in the palace, embraced me, and we swore eternal brotherhood.

That, my dear reader, is the whole story of my metamorphosis, and of the happy period which raised me at one bound from the base role of a fiddler to that of a nobleman.

CHAPTER VIII

I lead a dissolute life. Zawoiski. Rinaldi. L'Abadie. The young Countess. The Capuchin Don Steffani. Ancilla. La Ramon. I take a gondola at San Giobbe to go to Mestre.

FORTUNE, she who had been pleased to give me a taste of her despotism in leading me to happiness by a road unknown to wisdom, had not the power to make me adopt such a system of conduct as would put me in a position to be dependent on no one in my life to come. I began to behave in complete disregard of anything which could set bounds to my inclinations. Once I obeyed the laws, I thought I could scoff at prejudices. I believed I could live in perfect freedom in a country which was under an aristocratic government. I should have been wrong even if Fortune had made me a member of the government. The Republic of Venice, knowing that its first duty is self-preservation, is itself the slave of the all-overriding interest of the state. The occasion arising, it is bound to sacrifice everything to this duty, in the face of which the laws themselves cease to be inviolable. But enough of this now all too familiar subject. The whole of mankind knows that true freedom exists, and can exist, nowhere. I have touched on the subject only to give my reader some idea of my conduct in my native country, where in this year I entered on a path which was to end in a state prison as inscrutable as it was impenetrable, and both precisely because it was unconstitutional. At no loss for money, endowed by nature with a striking exterior, a resolute gambler, a spendthrift, a great talker with a sharp tongue, completely without modesty, fearless, running after pretty women, supplanting rivals, and thinking no company good except such as amused me, I could not but be hated. As I was always ready to risk my own skin, I felt that I was entitled to do whatever I pleased, for anything that stood in my way I considered an evil to be challenged.

This behavior on my part could not but be displeasing to the three sages whose oracle I had become; but they dared not say a word to me. Signor Bragadin laughingly told me I was showing him the wild life he had led when he was my age, but that I must be prepared to pay the price for it, and to find myself punished as he had been when I should have reached his. Without failing in the respect I owed him, I made a joke of his dire prophecies and went my way. But here is the first sample of his character which he gave me, in the third or fourth week of our acquaintance.

At the casino[1] of Signora Avogadro,[2] a woman whose wit and charm belied her sixty years, I met a young Polish gentleman named Gaetan Zawoiski.[3] He was waiting for money from his country and, while he waited, the women of Venice, enchanted by his handsome face and Polish manners, kept him well supplied. We became good friends; I opened my purse to him; and he opened his to me even more generously twenty years later in Munich. He was a man of honor, with only a modicum of intellect but enough to keep him happy. He died five or six years ago in Dresden, having become minister to the Elector of Trier.[4] I will speak of him in his proper place.

This charming young man, whom everyone liked and who was believed to be a freethinker because he was seen with Signor Angelo Querini[5] and Signor Lunardo Venier,[6] one day when we were in a garden on La Giudecca[7] introduced me to a beautiful foreign countess, who attracted me. We went to call on her the same evening at the Locanda del Castelletto[8] where, after introducing me to her husband, Count Rinaldi, she asked us to stay for supper. The husband made a faro bank, at which, punting with the Countess as partner, I won some fifty zecchini. Delighted to have made this brilliant acquaintance, I went to call on her by myself the next morning; her husband, after asking me to excuse her for still being in bed, had me shown in. In the conversation between us she had the art to leave me hoping for everything while granting me nothing, and when she saw me about to leave she invited me to supper. I went, I won as on the previous evening, still in partnership with her, and I returned home in love. I believed she would be kind to me the next morning; but when I went I was told she had gone out. I went again in the evening, and after she had offered me her excuses, we played, and I lost all the money I had, still in partnership with her.

After supper the outsiders left, and I remained there alone with Zawoiski, since Count Rinaldi had offered to give me my revenge. I played on my word, and he put down the cards when he found that, according to the tally, I owed him five hundred zecchini. I went home in a profound melancholy. Honor demanded that I pay my debt the next day, and I had not a soldo. Love increased my despair; I saw myself on the verge of being exposed as a pauper. My state of mind, which was visibly imprinted on my face, did not escape Signor Bragadin the next morning. He sounded me out and was so encouraging that I told him the whole story; I ended it by saying that I saw myself on the verge of dishonor and that it would kill me. He relieved me by saying that he would pay my debt that very day, if I would promise him never again to play on my word. I swore that I would not; I kissed his hand, and went out for a walk feeling very happy. I was sure that this heaven-born man would give me five hundred zecchini that afternoon, and I was delighting in the thought of the credit my promptness would bring me in the eyes of the lady, who would no longer put off granting me her favors. This was the only reason which kept me from regretting the amount; but greatly affected by my dear master's generosity, I was completely resolved not to play on my word again.

I dine very cheerfully with him and my two other friends, never mentioning the matter. A moment after we got up from the table, a man came bringing a letter and a package for Signor Bragadin. He read the letter: "Well and good!" The man left; and he told me to come to his room with him.

"Here," he said, "is a package which belongs to you."

I open it, and I find thirty or forty zecchini. Seeing my surprise, he laughs and hands me the letter to read.

"I assure Signor di Casanova that our playing last night on his word was only for fun: he owes me nothing. My wife sends him half of the gold which he lost in cash. —Count Rinaldi."

I look at Signor Bragadin, who was dying with laughter at my amazement. I understand the whole thing. I thank him. I embrace him; and I promise to be wiser in the future. My soul sees the light; I am cured of my love, and I feel ashamed at having been duped by both the husband and the wife.

"Tonight," said my wise physician, "you will sup very cheerfully with the charming Countess."

"Tonight I will sup with you. You have given me a lesson such as only a master teacher can give."

"The first time you lose on your word, your best course will be not to pay."

"That would dishonor me."

"Never mind. The sooner you dishonor yourself, the more you will save, for you will have to dishonor yourself when you find that you absolutely cannot pay. So it is better not to wait for that inevitable moment."

"But it will be still better to avoid it by henceforth playing only for cash."

"Certainly, for you will save both your honor and your money; but since you are fond of gambling, I advise you never to punt. Deal. You will have the advantage."

"A small one."

"As small as you like, but you will have it. The punter is a fool. The banker reasons. 'I wager,' he says, 'that you will not guess.' The punter answers, 'I wager that I shall guess.' Which one is the fool?"

"The punter."

"Then in Heaven's name be sensible. And if you find yourself punting, and beginning to win, know that you are still only a fool if you end by losing."

"A fool? Luck changes."

"Stop as soon as you see it change, even if you have only won a soldo. You will still have won."

I had read Plato, and I was amazed to find a man who reasoned like Socrates.

The next day Zawoiski called on me very early to tell me I had been expected at supper, and that I had been praised for the promptness with which I had paid the amount I had lost. I let him believe it; and I did not see the Count and Countess again until sixteen years later in Milan. Zawoiski did not learn the whole story from my own lips until forty years later at Carlsbad. He had become deaf.

Two or three weeks after this specimen, Signor Bragadin gave me an even more telling example of his character. Zawoiski had introduced me to a Frenchman named L'Abadie, who was applying to the government for the post of inspector of all the land forces of the Republic. His appointment depended on the Senate. I presented him to my master, who promised to vote for him; but here is what happened to prevent him from keeping his word.

Needing a hundred zecchini to pay some debts, I asked him to give them to me. He asked me why I did not ask Monsieur de l'Abadie to do me the favor.

"I should not dare."

"Do not be so timid; I am sure he will lend them to you."

"I very much doubt it; but I will try."

I go to see him the next day and, after some polite opening remarks, I put the request to him; and, with no less politeness, he begs to be excused, saying all the things one says when one either will not or cannot do favors of the sort. Zawoiski arrives, I leave them, and go and tell my kind patron that my attempt had availed me nothing. He smiled and said that the Frenchman was lacking in intelligence.

It was on that particular day that the decree making him inspector of the Venetian armies was to be brought before the Senate. I pursue my usual occupations, I come home at midnight and, learning that Signor Bragadin has not yet come in, I go to bed. In the morning I go to wish him good morning, and I tell him I am on my way to congratulate the new inspector. He answers that I can spare myself the trouble, since the Senate had rejected the proposal.

"How can that be? Three days ago he was certain of the contrary."

"He was not wrong, for the decree would have been approved if I had not decided to speak against it. I demonstrated to the Senate that a sound policy would not allow us to give the post to a foreigner."

"I am surprised to hear it, for Your Excellency did not think so day before yesterday."

"I did not know him well. I discovered yesterday that the man did not have brains enough for the post he was soliciting. Can he be a man of good judgment and refuse you a hundred zecchini? His refusal loses him an income of three thousand scudi which he would be enjoying at this moment."

I go out, and come upon Zawoiski with L'Abadie, who was furious.

"If you had warned me," he said, "that the hundred zecchini would have kept Signor Bragadin quiet, I would have found a way to let you have them."

"If you had the brains of an inspector, you would have guessed it."

The man proved useful to me by telling everyone the story. Those who later needed the Senator's voice learned the means of obtaining it. I paid all my debts.

About this time my brother Giovanni came to Venice with the ex-Jew Guarienti,[9] a great connoisseur of pictures who was traveling at the expense of the King of Poland, Elector of Saxony. It was he who had arranged the acquisition of the Duke of Modena's collection for one hundred thousand zecchini. They went to Rome together, where my brother remained to study under the celebrated Mengs.[10] I will speak of him fourteen years hence. Now, as a faithful historian, I must relate an event upon which depended the happiness of one of the most charming women in Italy, who would have been plunged into misery if I had been cautious.

At the beginning of October, the theaters being open, I came out of the posthouse for Rome masked and was proceeding on my way when I saw the figure of a girl, with her head wrapped in the hood of her cloak, getting out of the Ferrara packet boat, or corriere,[11] which had just arrived. Seeing that she was alone, and noticing her uncertainty, I feel impelled by an occult force to approach her and offer her my services if she needed them. She answers in a timid voice that she only needed a direction. I say that the quay where we are is not a suitable place to stand about. I invite her to a malvasia[12] where she could talk to me freely. She hesitates, I insist, and she gives in. The shop was twenty paces away; we enter, and in a moment are sitting alone together, face to face. I unmask, and politeness obliges her to open her hood. A full coif which envelops her entire head allows me to see only her eyes, her nose, her mouth, and her chin; but I need no more to discern with the utmost clarity youth, beauty, sadness, nobility, and candor. This strong letter of recommendation interests me in the highest degree. After wiping away a few tears, she tells me that she is of noble birth and had fled from her father's house alone to find a Venetian who had destroyed her happiness by seducing and abandoning her.

"You must hope that you can recall him to his duty. I suppose he promised to marry you."

"He gave me his promise in writing. The favor I ask of you is to take me to his house, to leave me there, and to be discreet."

"You may count, Signora, on the sentiments of a man of honor. I am such, and I already take a deep interest in all that concerns you. Who is this man?"

"Alas! I yield to my fate."

So saying, she draws a paper from her bosom and gives it to me to read. I see that it was written by Zanetto Steffani,[13] whose hand I knew, and only a short time before. He promised the Contessina A. S. to marry her in Venice within the week. I hand it back to her, I tell her that I know him very well, that he had a post in the Chancellery,[14] was a great libertine, and would be rich when his mother died but at the moment was much in discredit and burdened with debts.

"Take me to his house."

"I will do whatever you tell me to; but listen to me and have complete confidence in me. I advise you not to go to his house. If he has already failed you, you cannot expect to be graciously received if you find him there; and if he is not at home, you can only expect to be badly treated by his mother if you let it be known who you are. Trust me, and believe that it was God who sent me to help you. I promise you that no later than tomorrow you shall know if Steffani is in Venice, what he means to do about you, and what he can be made to do. Before that is accomplished, you should not let him know that you are in Venice nor where you are staying."

"Where shall I go tonight?"

"To a place above suspicion."

"To your house, if you are married."

"I am a bachelor."

I decide to take her to the house of a widow whom I knew to be respectable, who had two furnished rooms, and who lived in a street which was a cul-de-sac. She yields to persuasion and takes a gondola with me. I order the gondolier to take me where I wished to go. On the way she tells me that a month since, Steffani had stopped in her native city to have repairs made to his carriage, which had broken down, and that he had made her acquaintance the same day in a house to which she had gone with her mother to congratulate a new bride.

"It was on that day," she said, "that I had the misfortune to inspire him with love. He gave up all thought of continuing his journey. He remained in C. for four weeks, never leaving his inn by day and spending all his nights in the street under my window, from which I talked to him. As he always said that he loved me and that his intentions were honorable, I told him to make himself known to my parents and ask my hand in marriage; but he plied me with good or bad arguments, all of them intended to prove that I could not make him happy unless I had unlimited confidence in him. I must make up my mind to go with him, unknown to everyone: my honor, he said, would not suffer for, three days after my flight, the whole city should know that I was his wife, and he promised to bring me back there publicly. Alas! Love blinded me; I believed him, I consented. He gave me the document you have seen, and the next night I let him enter my room by the window at which I talked to him. I consented to a crime which was to be blotted out three days later. He left, assuring me that the next night he would come to the same window to receive me in his arms. Is it likely that I should doubt it after the great error I had committed? I packed my things and waited for him; but in vain. The next morning I learned that the monster had set off in his carriage with his servant one hour after he had assured me again, as he left by my window, that he would come to take me away at midnight. Imagine my despair! I took the step to which it prompted me. It could not but be bad. An hour before midnight I left my house alone, thus completing my dishonor, but resolved to die if the cruel ravisher of my dearest possession, whom I felt sure I should find here, did not keep his word to me. I walked all night and most of the following day, without taking the least nourishment until a quarter of an hour before I boarded the packet which brought me here in twenty-four hours. Five men and two women who were on board neither saw my face nor heard the sound of my voice. I remained seated, dozing, holding this prayer book always in my hands. I was let alone. No one spoke to me, and I thanked God for it. I had no sooner disembarked on the quay than you left me no time to consider how I should set about finding my way to Steffani's house in the Via Garzoni in San Samuele. Imagine the effect upon me of the presence of a masked man who, as if he had been waiting for me there and knew my wretched condition, told me to command him if there was anything I needed. Not only did I feel no aversion to answering you, I thought it my duty to show myself worthy of your readiness by entrusting myself to you, despite the counsel of prudence which should make me deaf to your eloquence and to your invitation to accompany you to the place where you have brought me. I have told you all. I beg you not to let my pliancy incline you to think ill of my intelligence. I ceased to be rational only a month ago, and education and reading have given me a knowledge of the world. Love made me succumb, together with lack of experience. I am in your hands, and I do not repent of having entrusted myself to them.''

This speech was what was needed to reinforce the interest she had inspired in me. I brutally told her that Steffani had seduced and deceived her deliberately and that she must think of him no more except to avenge herself. She shuddered and sank her head in her hands. We reached the widow's house. I arranged that she should have a good room, I ordered a small supper for her, and instructed the good landlady to show her every attention and to let her want for nothing. I left, assuring her that she would see me the following morning.

The first step I took after leaving her was to go to Steffani's house. I learned from one of his mother's gondoliers that he had come home three days before and had set off alone twenty-four hours later, and that no one knew where he was, not even his mother. That same night at the theater I obtained information about her family from a Bolognese abate who happened to know them intimately. She had a brother who was serving in the papal army.

Early the next morning I went to see her. She was still asleep. The widow told me that she had eaten a fair supper, without addressing a single word to her, and afterwards had shut herself in her room. As soon as I could hear that she was up, I went into her room and, cutting short all the apologies she insisted on making me, I told her everything I had learned. I found her looking well, sad, but less uneasy. I admired her judgment when she said it was not likely that Steffani had left again to go back to C. I offered to go there and do all that was necessary to return her to her home at once; and I saw that she was delighted when I told her all that I had learned about her respectable family. She said nothing against my proposal to go to C. immediately, but she asked me to wait. She believed that Steffani would soon return and that she was cool-headed enough to reach a sound decision. I supported her in this idea. I requested her to let me breakfast with her, and when I asked her how she amused herself when she was at home, she said that she read and that, since she loved music, her harpsichord was her delight. I came back toward nightfall with a small basket of books, a harpsichord, and several new airs. I saw that she was surprised; but she was far more so when I took from my pocket three pairs of slippers of different sizes. She thanked me, blushing furiously. Her long walk must have made holes in her shoes; so she let me put them on the chest of drawers, without trying them on to find out which pair would fit her. Seeing her filled with gratitude, and having no design on her which could alarm her virtue, I found my satisfaction in the favorable feelings toward me which my behavior could not but inspire in her. I had no other purpose than to reassure her heart and to obliterate the opinion which Steffani's base procedure might have implanted in her concerning men. I had not the least idea of inspiring love in her, and I was very far from thinking that, on my side, I could fall in love with her. I flattered myself that she would never be of concern to me except as an unfortunate girl who deserved all the friendship of a man who, though unknown to her, was honored with all her trust. Besides, I could not believe that she was open to a new love in her terrible situation, and the idea of reducing her to the point of surrender by my attentions would have horrified me if it had entered my mind.

I stayed with her only a quarter of an hour. I left her to relieve her from the state of embarrassment in which I saw her to be: she was completely at a loss to find words in which to express her gratitude to me.

I had, so I realized, assumed a delicate obligation, the outcome of which I could not foresee; but I did not care. Being at no loss to play my part in it, I had no wish to see it end. This heroic intrigue, with which Fortune was honoring me for the first time, was flattering to me in the highest degree. I was performing an experiment on myself, in the conviction that I did not know myself well enough. I was curious to learn more. It was on the third day that, after repeated expressions of gratitude, she said that she did not understand how I could have so good an opinion of her when I had found her so ready to enter a malvasia with me. I saw her smile when I answered that, for my part, I did not understand how, masked as I was, she could have taken me for a man who cherished a virtue of which appearances would have suggested that I was the enemy.

"But in you, Signora," I went on, "and especially in your beautiful face, I saw nobility, sensibility, and virtue in distress. The divine imprint of truth in your very first words showed me that what had seduced you is love, and that it was honor which made you leave your family and your country. Your error arose from a heart seduced, over which your reason had lost all power, and your flight was the act of a great soul which, clamoring for vengeance, justifies you completely. Steffani must expiate his crime with his life, not by marrying you. He is not worthy to obtain possession of you after what he has done, and by forcing him into it instead of punishing him for his crime, you would be granting him a recompense.''

''All that you say is true: I hate the monster; and I have a brother who will kill him in a duel.''

''You are mistaken. He is a coward who will never make himself worthy of an honorable death.''

At this she put her hand in her pocket and, after thinking for a moment, drew out a ten-inch stiletto and put it on the table.

''What is that?''

''It is a weapon which, until this moment, I counted on using against myself. You have opened my eyes. Be so good as to take it away; and I rely on your friendship. I feel certain that I shall owe you my honor and my life.''

It was at this moment that she conquered me. I took the stiletto, and I left in a state of perturbation which showed me the weakness of a heroism which I was very near to pronouncing ridiculous. Yet I managed to maintain it until the seventh day.

Here is an incident which, as it gave me occasion to entertain a suspicion injurious to the lady, troubled me; for, had my suspicion proved justified, it would have obliged me to admit that I had allowed myself to be duped. That would have been humiliating. When she had told me that she was a musician, I had the same day given her a harpsichord, and now three days had passed without her even opening it. The old woman assured me of the fact. I thought she owed me the present of a sample of her musicianship. Could she have lied to me? It would be her ruin. Deciding not to pass judgment at once, I nevertheless resolved to settle my doubts.

It was on the next day that, contrary to my usual custom, I went to see her after dinner, resolved to ask her to give me a sample of her skill. I caught her unawares in her room, sitting in front of a mirror with the old hostess behind her combing out a head of very long pale blond hair of a fineness which words are powerless to describe. She excused herself, saying that she was not expecting me, and continued the operation. "I was," she said, "in absolute need of it." For the first time I see the whole of her face, her neck, and half of her arms; I am lost in admiration and say nothing. I praise the perfume of her pomatum, and the old woman says that, what with the pomatum and powder and combs, she had spent all of the three lire the Signora had given her. I am overwhelmed with confusion. She had already told me that she had left C. with only ten paoli; I should have thought of that; but I take refuge in silence.

After combing out her hair, the widow goes to make coffee for us. I take up a portrait set in a ring which was still on her toilet table, I look at it, and I laugh at the fancy which had taken her to have herself painted as a man with black hair. She tells me that it is a portrait of her brother, who looked that much like her. He was two years her senior, and was a military officer in the service of the Most Holy Father, as I had been told.

I indicate that I wish to put her ring on her finger; she holds it out and after slipping the ring on it, I yield to the gallantry which had become part of my nature and make to kiss her hand; but she quickly withdraws it, blushing. I then most sincerely ask her to forgive me if I have given her any reason to believe that I could fail to treat her with respect. She answers that in her situation she must rather think of defending herself from herself than from me. I found the compliment so subtle and so much to my advantage that I thought best to let it pass unacknowledged. She could not but read in my eyes that no circumstance would ever arise under which she would either entertain desires to which I would be unresponsive or find me ungrateful. But at that moment my love grew out of childhood, and I could no longer conceal it from myself.

Thanking me for the books which, divining her taste, I had brought her, for she did not care for novels, she asked me to excuse her if, knowing that I was fond of music, she had never offered to sing me an air, as she was able to do. I breathed again. So saying, she sat down at the harpsichord and played several pieces by heart in the most accomplished manner; then, after refusing several times, she accompanied herself in an air, which she read at sight, in such a fashion that Love instantly bore me up to his heaven. Then, looking at her with languishing eyes, I asked her to give me her hand to kiss, and she did not give it to me; but she let me take it. Nevertheless I managed to keep from devouring it. When I left her I was in love and almost resolved to declare myself. Restraint becomes stupidity when a man reaches the point of knowing that the object of his love shares his feeling. But I needed to be convinced of it.

All of Steffani's acquaintances were discussing his flight all over the city. I heard it all, and I said nothing. It was generally agreed that his mother's refusing to pay his debts was the reason for it. This was very probable. But whether he came back or not, I could not resign my soul to losing the treasure which I held in my hands. Yet not knowing under what colors or in what manner I could best arrive at the enjoyment of it, I found myself trapped in a maze. When the idea of consulting Signor Bragadin in the matter occurred to me, I rejected it with horror. I had found him too much the empiric in the case of Rinaldi, and even more so in that of L'Abadie. I was so afraid of his remedies that I preferred being ill to being cured by using them.

I was stupid enough to ask the widow one morning if the Signora had asked her who I was. I was aware of my mistake as soon as, instead of answering, she asked me:

"Does she not know who you are?"

"Answer me, do not question me."

But she was right. Now nothing could stop her from prying into the affair; now nothing could halt the gossip which would inevitably start, and by my own fault. It is never so necessary to be on one's guard as when one puts questions to the half ignorant. During all the twelve days she[15] had been in my custody, she had never shown any curiosity to know who I was; but was that any reason for me to believe she had none? It was no reason at all. What I should have done was to tell her who I was the very first day. I told her about myself that evening, and better than anyone else could have done it, and begged her to forgive me for not having fulfilled the duty sooner. She thanked me, confessing that she had at times been very curious to know my circumstances; but she assured me she would never have been so stupid as to ask the hostess for information about me.

Our conversation turning to the incomprehensibility of Steffani's long absence, she said that her father must certainly suppose that he had gone into hiding somewhere with her.

"He must have known," she said, "that I talked to him through the window every night; and he could easily have found out that I took passage in the corriere from Ferrara. I believe he is in Venice, and I am sure he is making every effort to find me, though secretly. He usually puts up at Boncousin's.[16] Try to find out if he is there."

She no longer spoke of Steffani except with hatred, and her only idea was to shut herself up in some convent far from her native country, where no one would know her shameful story.

I did not need to make inquiries. At supper that day Signor Barbaro spoke as follows:

"A gentleman, a subject of the Pope, has been recommended to me with the request that I use my influence to help him in a difficult and delicate matter. One of our citizens has abducted his daughter, and must have been with her somewhere for the last two weeks; no one knows where. The matter ought to be brought before the Council of Ten. The mother of the abductor claims to be related to me: I do not intend to take any steps in it."

I pretended to be completely uninterested in the matter. Very early the following morning I called on the young Countess to tell her this interesting news. She was still asleep but, as I was pressed for time, I sent the widow to tell her that I needed only two minutes to inform her of something important. She received me still in bed, with the covers drawn up to her chin.

As soon as she heard all that I had to tell her, she begs me to persuade Signor Barbaro to act as mediator between her father and herself, for she would choose death rather than become the wife of the monster. However, she thinks it best to give me the promise of marriage which he had employed to seduce her, so that I could show her father the depth of the scoundrel's perfidy. To take it from her pocket, she had to expose her whole bare arm to my sight. What made her blush could only have been the shame she felt at showing me that she did not have on a chemise. I promised to see her again toward evening.

To persuade Signor Barbaro to accede to her wish, I should have had to tell him that she was in my custody, and I felt that to confide the fact to him would be injurious to her. I could make up my mind to nothing. I saw myself on the verge of losing her, and I did not want to hasten the moment.

After dinner Count A. S. was announced to Signor Barbaro. I saw him with his son in uniform, the living portrait of his sister. They went into his private room with him to discuss the affair, and an hour later they left. When they had gone he asked me, as I expected he would, to question my angel[17] to learn if it were proper for him to intervene in Count A. S.'s favor. He wrote out the question himself. With the greatest indifference I answered him in figures that he should intervene in the matter only to persuade the Count to forgive his daughter, abandoning any idea of marrying her to the scoundrel, for God had sentenced him to death.

This answer was received with amazement, while I was no less amazed at having dared to give it. I had a feeling that Steffani was destined to die at someone's hands. It was love which made me think so. Signor Bragadin, who believed my oracle to be infallible, said that it had never spoken so clearly, and that Steffani had certainly died at the moment the oracle had prophesied it to us. He told Signor Barbaro that he ought to invite the father and son to dinner the next day. It was necessary to go slowly, for before persuading them to forgive the young lady, her whereabouts must be discovered. Signor Barbaro almost set me laughing when he told me that, if I wished to, I could reveal her hiding place on the spot. I promised to ask his question on the following day. I thus gained time to find out beforehand what was in the minds of the father and son. I laughed to myself when I saw that I would have to get Steffani assassinated in order not to throw doubt on my oracle.

I spent the whole evening visiting the young Countess, who no longer had any doubt of her father's indulgence or of the complete confidence which she should have in me.

How glad she was to learn that I was to dine the following day with her father and brother, and that I would come the same evening to repeat to her all that they said about her! But how glad I was, too, to find her persuaded that she should love me dearly and that, without me, she would infallibly have been ruined in a city where the policy of the government is only too willing to let libertinism serve as a simulacrum of the liberty which ought to reign there! We agreed that the coincidence of our meeting each other on the quay of the Roman post was the most fortunate of coincidences, and the accord between us little short of a miracle. We observed with delight that mere physiognomical attraction had played no part either in her willingness to accept my invitation or in the urgency with which I had pressed her to follow me and entrust herself to my advice. I was masked, and her hood performed the same function. Finding that it was all miraculous, we imagined, though without admitting it to each other, that it was all a direct intervention of eternal Providence, of the divine power of our guardian angels; and so we fell in love with each other. I should like to know if in the whole world there is one reader audacious enough to maintain that our reasoning smacked of superstition. It was based upon the most profound philosophy, despite the fact that it was plausible only in respect to ourselves.

"Confess," I said in a moment of enthusiasm, drawing my lips over her beautiful hands, "that if you found I was in love with you, you would fear me."

"Alas! The only thing I fear is that I shall lose you."

This answer, which was accompanied by a look which vouched for its truth, made me open my arms to clasp to my breast the fair object who had given it to me, and to kiss the mouth which had uttered it. Seeing in her eyes neither proud indignation nor a cold compliance arising from a base fear of losing me, I abandoned myself to my feelings. I saw only love and, with it, a gratitude which, far from diminishing its purity, made its triumph all the greater.

But scarcely have I let her go before she lowers her eyes and I hear a deep sigh. I suspect what I fear, and, throwing myself on my knees, I implore her to forgive me.

"For what offense," she replies, "am I to forgive you? You have misinterpreted my thought. Seeing you in love, I was reflecting on my happiness, and a cruel memory interposed and drew that sigh from me. Rise."

Midnight had struck. I say that her honor commands me to leave. I resume my mask and go. I was so overcome by the fear of losing what I thought I had not yet really deserved that my departure must have seemed abrupt to her. I did not sleep well. I spent one of those nights which a young man in love can contrive to make happy only by forcing his imagination to play the role of reality. It is a hard task; but love demands its performance and takes pleasure in it. Certain as I was that my happiness was imminent, hope played only the part of a supernumerary in my delightful drama. Hope, so much praised, is but a flatterer which reason holds dear only because it needs palliatives. Happy they who, to enjoy life, have no need either to hope or to foresee!

When I woke what struck me as something of a difficulty was the death sentence I had pronounced on Steffani. I should have been very glad to find a way of revoking it, both for the honor of my oracle, which I thought was imperiled, and even for Steffani, whom I could not thoroughly hate when I considered that he was as it were the ''efficient cause'' of the happiness which my soul was then enjoying.

The Count and his son came to dinner. The Count was a man of perfect simplicity, completely without affectation. He was visibly distressed by the affair and at a loss how to settle it. The son, who rivaled the God of Love in looks, was witty and had manners of the utmost refinement. His free bearing pleased me. In the hope of gaining his friendship I devoted all my attention to him.

At dessert, Signor Barbaro effectively persuaded the elder Count that we were four persons with a single soul, so that he spoke with complete freedom. After praising his daughter to us in every respect, he assured us that Steffani had never set foot in his house and that it was impossible to imagine by what witchcraft, since he could only talk to her at night from the street through a window, he had seduced her to the point of making her set off by herself on foot two days after he had set off in his carriage.

"Then it is impossible to state," Signor Barbaro objected, "that she was abducted, or to prove that she was seduced by Steffani."

"Though it cannot be proved, it is true nevertheless. It is so true that at the present moment no one knows where he is, he can only be with her. All that I demand is that he marry her."

"I think it would be better not to petition for a forced marriage which would make her unhappy, for Steffani is in every respect one of the worst scoundrels in our corps of secretaries."

"If I were in your place," said Signor Bragadin, "I would let myself be softened by the girl's repentance and I would forgive her."

"Where is she? I am ready to take her in my arms, but I cannot suppose that she is repentant since, I repeat, she must be with him."

"Is it certain that when she left C., she came here?"

"I know it from the captain of the corriere, from which she disembarked at the usual landing place twenty paces from the Rome post. A masked man who was waiting for her immediately joined her, and no one knows where they went."

"It may have been Steffani."

"No, for he is short; and the masker was tall. In addition, I have learned that Steffani had left two days before my daughter arrived here. The masker with whom she went off must be a friend of Steffani's and have taken her to him."

"All this is mere conjecture."

"Four persons who saw the masker all claim to know who he is; but they give different names. Here is the list. However, I shall bring an accusation against all four before the heads of the Council of Ten, if Steffani denies having my daughter in his possession."

He then took from his portfolio a paper containing not only the various names which had been given for the masker but also those of the persons who had given them. Signor Barbaro reads it aloud, and the last name he reads is mine. When I heard my name I gave a start which set my three friends laughing hilariously. Signor Bragadin, who saw that the Count was surprised by their outburst, thought it necessary to explain it to him in the following terms:

"Casanova here is my son and I give you my word that if the Contessina your daughter is in his custody she is in a safe place, even though he does not have the look of a man to whom one would entrust girls."

The astonishment, the surprise, and the embarrassment of the father and the son were a picture. The good, tender father asked my pardon with tears in his eyes, begging me to put myself in his place. I calmed him by embracing him several times. The person who had recognized me was a pi[mp] whom I had cudgeled some weeks before for having tricked me into waiting in vain for a dancer he had promised to bring me. If I had delayed an instant before I spoke to the unfortunate Countess, he would have pounced on her himself and taken her to some b[rothel].

The end of it all was that the Count agreed to defer his application to the Council of Ten until Steffani's whereabouts became known.

"It is six months," I told him, "since I have seen him anywhere; but I promise you I will kill him in a duel the moment he appears."

To this the young Count replied, with a coolness which delighted me:

"You shall not kill him until after he has killed me."

But at that Signor Bragadin could not refrain from saying:

"You will neither of you fight with Steffani, for he is dead."

"Dead!" said the Count.

"We must not," said the cautious Barbaro, "take that word in its literal meaning. The wretch is certainly dead to honor."

After this singular scene, from which I saw that the story was almost out, I went to visit the angel whom I had in my charge, changing gondolas three times. In the vast city of Venice this is the best way to foil the efforts of spies who follow a person to learn where he is going.

All that I have just recorded I repeated word for word to the curious Countess, who listened with a palpitating heart. She wept for joy when she learned that her father wished to take her in his arms, and she threw herself on her knees and gave thanks to God when I assured her that no one knew the scoundrel had been in her bedroom. But when I repeated to her the words "You shall not kill him until after he has killed me" which her brother had addressed to me with the greatest self-possession, she could not help embracing me, melting into tears, and calling me her angel, her savior. I promised to bring her dear brother to her on the next day but one at the latest. We ate supper gaily, without mentioning either Steffani or revenge.

After our little supper Love had his will of us. Two hours passed without our being aware of them, for our satisfactions left us no time to beget desires. I left her at midnight, assuring her that she would see me again seven or eight hours later. I did not spend the night there because, whatever the outcome, I wanted the hostess to be able to swear that I had never spent even one there.

But I should have been very sorry if I had done otherwise. I found my three noble friends still up and impatiently awaiting me to give me a surprising piece of news. Signor Bragadin had heard it at the Senate.

"Steffani," he said, "is dead, as our angel Paralis[18] told us in the language of angels. He has died to the world by taking the habit of a Capuchin, and the whole Senate naturally knows the fact. We, however, know that it is a punishment. Let us adore God and his hierarchies, who make us worthy to know what no one knows. We must now complete our work and console this excellent father. We must ask Paralis where the girl is; she certainly cannot be with Steffani, for she has not been doomed to become a Capuchin nun."

"I will not consult my angel," I answered, "for it is at his command that I have been obliged, until this moment, to make a mystery of the young Countess's whereabouts."

After this short introduction, I told them the whole story exactly as it had happened, omitting only what it was not prudent to tell them, for in the minds of these three excellent men, whom women had led into a vast number of follies, crimes of love had become appalling. Signor Dandolo and Signor Barbaro showed great surprise when they learned that the girl had now been in my hands for two weeks, but Signor Bragadin, taking the tone of an initiate, said that it was not surprising, that it was according to cabalism, and that, furthermore, he knew it.

"We must not fail," he added, "to make a mystery of it to the Count until we are sure that he will forgive her and take her back to C., or wherever he sees fit."

"He cannot but forgive her," I retorted, "since the noble girl would never have left C. if her seducer had not left after giving her this promise of marriage which I show you. She went on foot as far as the corriere, she took passage on it, and she disembarked just at the moment when I was coming out of the Rome posthouse. An inspiration commanded me to approach her and tell her to come with me. She obeyed, and I took her to a secret refuge in the house of a God-fearing woman."

My three friends listened to me so attentively that they seemed to be statues. I told them to invite the two Counts to dinner on the next day but one, because I had to have time to consult Paralis de modo tenendi ("on the course to be followed"). I told Signor Barbaro to explain to the Count in what sense he was to understand that Steffani was dead. After sleeping four or five hours I went to the widow's house, instructing her not to bring us coffee until we should call for it, since we should have to be engaged in writing for four or five hours.

I enter, I see her in bed, and I am delighted to observe a smiling cheerfulness in a face in which for ten whole days I had seen nothing but sadness. We began as happy lovers do. Love had so purified her soul that it was no longer darkened by the slightest feeling engendered by prejudice. When the object of his love is new, all its beauties are new to the greed of a lover. But everything could not but appear very new to the Countess, who had only tasted the pleasures of love once, and that inadequately, in darkness, and with a dwarf of a man not likely to inspire love in a woman.

It was only after long encounters that, my mind regaining its tranquillity, I gave her an account of the whole conversation I had held with my three friends before going to bed. Love had so transformed the Countess that the business which had been her first concern was now only secondary.

The news of Steffani, who, instead of killing himself, had become a Capuchin, took her completely aback for a moment. She made some very philosophical reflections on it. She even pitied him. When one pities, one no longer hates; but this happens only to great souls. She was very glad I had told my good friends that she was in my custody, and left it to me to decide how best to present her to her father.

But when we remembered that the time when we must separate was drawing near, our consternation was visible.

The Countess was perfectly certain that if my rank had been equal to hers, she would never leave my custody. She said that it was not her knowing Steffani which had made her unhappy, but her knowing me. After a union which makes two hearts happy, can they be other than unhappy when they are parted?

At table Signor Barbaro told me he had paid a visit to Signora Steffani, who claimed to be related to him, and that she did not seem to regret the step her only son had taken. She had said that his only choice had been between killing himself and becoming a Capuchin, so that his decision had been wise. Her words were those of a good Christian; but if she had not been a miser, he would neither have killed himself nor become a Capuchin. The world is full of such cruel mothers. They think they are righteous only when they are trampling on nature. They are evil women.

However, the ultimate cause of Steffani's desperation (the man is still alive) was known to no one. My memoirs will make it public when it will no longer be of interest to anybody.

This turn of events, which strangely surprised the Count and his son, left them wanting nothing but to recover the young Countess and take her back to C. with them.

To find out where she might be, her father had decided to summon before the heads of the Council of Ten the persons whose names had been given him, except myself. So we were left with no choice but to inform him that she was in my custody, and Signor Bragadin undertook to do it.

It was to be done the following day. The Count had invited us all to supper; but Signor Bragadin had declined. This supper was the reason why I did not go to see the Countess; but I did not fail to do so the following morning at dawn, and since it had been decided that her father should be told on that same day that she was in my custody, we did not part until noon. We had no hope that we could be together again. I promised to come back after dinner, with the Count her brother.

What a surprise for the father and the son when Signor Bragadin, as we rose from table, told them that the young lady had been found! He took from his pocket the written promise of marriage which Steffani had given her, and, laying it before them:

"This," he said, "is what made her lose her head when she learned that he had left C. without her. She left on foot, all by herself, and she had scarcely arrived here before, by the purest chance, she met that tall young man over there, who persuaded her to let him take her to a most respectable house, which she has never left and which she will not leave except to return to your arms as soon as she is certain that you will forgive her for the fault she has committed."

"Let her have no doubt of my forgiveness," the father answered, and, turning to me, begged me not to delay affording him a satisfaction on which the happiness of his life depended. I embraced him and said that he should see her the following day but that I would take his son there at once to prepare her mind for the interview which, dear as the thought of it was to her, she yet feared. Signor Barbaro insisted on joining us and the young Count, delighted with the arrangement, swore eternal friendship with me.

We at once embarked in a gondola, which conveyed us to a traghetto[19] where I took another gondola in which we went to the place where I was keeping my treasure safely guarded. I got out and asked them to wait. When I told the Countess that I had brought her brother and Signor Barbaro and that she would not see her father until the following day:

"Then," she answered, "we can spend a few more hours together. Go quickly and bring them up."

What a scene for the stage! The love of a brother and sister expressed on two angelic faces cast in the same mold. A pure joy shining from the most tender embraces, followed by a speaking silence which ends in a few tears. Forgotten politeness reasserting itself and covering the young lady with confusion for having neglected her duty to a nobleman of commanding presence whom she had never seen. Myself, the chief architect of this noble edifice, left to be a silent spectator, completely forgotten.

At last we sit down, the young lady on a couch between Signor Barbaro and her brother, and I on a stool in front of her.

"To whom," her brother asked her, "do we owe the happiness of having found you?"

"To my angel," she answered, giving me her hand, "to this man, who was waiting for me not knowing that he was waiting for me, who saved me, who guarded me from a hundred shames of which I had no conception, and who, as you see, is now kissing this hand for the first time."

She put her handkerchief to her eyes to check her tears, which were accompanied by ours. Such is true virtue, which is still virtue even in the act of lying! But the young Countess had no notion at the time that she was lying. What spoke was her pure and virtuous soul, and she gave it free rein. Her virtue obliged her to portray it, as if it wished to tell her that despite her follies she had never strayed from virtue. A girl who surrenders to love mingled with feeling cannot have committed a crime, for she cannot feel remorse.

At the conclusion of this affectionate visit, she said that she longed for the moment when she could throw herself at her father's feet, but that she wished it to be deferred until nightfall to avoid setting the neighbors gossiping. So the interview which was to be the last act of the play was arranged for the next day.

We went to supper at the inn with the elder Count, who, acknowledging that he owed his honor to all that I had done for his daughter, looked at me with admiration. However, he rather plumed himself on having found out, before I admitted it, that it was I who had been the first person to speak to her when she left the corriere. Signor Barbaro invited them to dinner again for the following day.

There was some danger in spending the whole morning alone with the angel who was about to leave me; but what would love be if it did not defy dangers? Our certainty that these hours were our last impelled us to try to make them the last of our lives; but happy love has never turned into suicide. She saw my soul sweating blood, and she chose to believe that some part of her soul was mingled with it.

After dressing she put on her shoes, and she kissed her slippers, which she was determined to keep for the rest of her life. I asked her for some of her hair, so that I could have it made into a braid like the one I still kept to remember Signora F. by.

She saw me again at nightfall with her father, her brother, and Signor Dandolo and Signor Barbaro, who wished to be present at this noble interview. When the father appeared, the daughter threw herself on her knees at his feet. He raised her, embraced her, and spoke to her with all the kindness she could have asked. An hour later we all left together and went to Boncousin's inn, where, after wishing the three noble foreigners a happy journey, I returned with my two friends to Signor Bragadin's.

The next morning we saw them arriving at the palace in a six-oared peota. They wanted to offer their final thanks to Signor Barbaro, to me, and to Signor Bragadin, who otherwise would not have seen and admired the amazing resemblance between the charming sister and brother.

After drinking a cup of coffee, they took their leave and we saw them return to their peota, which in twenty-four hours took them to Pontelagoscuro,[20] the point at which the River Po marks the boundary between the Papal State and the Republic of Venice. Only with my eyes could I tell the Countess all that I felt at this cruel parting, and I read all that her soul had to tell me in hers. Never had a letter of recommendation proved more effective than the one the Count had brought to Signor Barbaro. It served to save the honor of his family, and spared me the unpleasant consequences which would have ensued for me should I have been convicted of taking the young lady away with me and hence been obliged to explain what had become of her.

After this we all set out for Padua to remain there until the end of autumn.[21] Doctor Gozzi was no longer there. He had become the parish priest of a village[22] where he lived with his sister Bettina, who had been unable to live with the scoundrel who had only married her to strip her of all that she had brought him as her dowry.

With nothing to do in that great and quiet city, I fell in love with one of the most celebrated of all the Venetian courtesans of the time. Her name was Ancilla, the same Ancilla whom the dancer Campioni married and took with him to London, where she caused the death of a most charming Englishman. Four years hence I shall speak of her at greater length. At present I only owe my reader an account of a little incident which was the reason why my love lasted only three or four weeks.

The person who introduced me to the girl was Count Medini,[23] a young man as harebrained as myself and with the same tastes, but a constant gambler and an inveterate enemy of luck. There was always play at Ancilla's, whose favored lover he was, and he introduced me to her only in order to make me his dupe at cards. Having never noticed anything questionable, I played the role until the fatal moment when, seeing myself being cheated in the most obvious fashion, I told him so, at the same time putting a pistol to his chest. Ancilla fainted; he gave me back my money and challenged me to come out and measure swords with him. I accepted his invitation and followed him, after leaving my pistols on the table. We went to the Prato della Valle,[24] where, in the moonlight, I had the good fortune to wound him in the shoulder. He had to ask me for quarter, as he could no longer raise his arm. I went home to bed; but in the morning I thought I ought to follow Signor Bragadin's advice to leave Padua at once, and go to Venice and wait for him there. This Count Medini was my enemy all the rest of my life, and I shall have occasion to speak of him when my reader finds me back in Naples.

I spent all the remainder of the year at my usual occupations, now satisfied and now dissatisfied with fortune. The Ridotto[25] being open, I spent the greater part of the night there gambling and pursuing love affairs.

About the end of January I received a letter from the young Countess A. S., who no longer bore that name. She wrote to me from one of the finest cities in Italy, where she had become the Marchesa X. She begged me to pretend that I did not know her if chance brought me to the city where she was living happily with a husband who had won her heart after she had granted him her hand.

I had already learned from her brother that she had scarcely reached home before her mother took her to the city from which she had written me to stay with a relative in whose house she had met the man who had made her happy. It was in the course of the following year, 1748, that I saw her. But for the letter in which she had warned me, I would have arranged to be introduced to her husband. The sweetness of peace is preferable to love; but one does not think so when one is in love.

At this same period a very pretty Venetian girl, whom her father Ramon presented to the admiration of the public by making her dance in ballets, bound me in her chains for a fortnight; I should have remained in them longer if marriage had not broken them. Signora Cecilia Valmarana, her patroness, found her a husband as talented as herself in the person of a French dancer named Binet, who thereupon called himself Binetti. His wife was thus dispensed from becoming French instead of Venetian, which enabled her to exert her energies in several adventures which made her famous. She brought about quite a number of mine, which my reader will find related in detail in their proper place. Nature had granted La Binetti the rarest of gifts. Age never appeared in her face with an indiscretion of which women know none more cruel. She always seemed young not only to all her lovers but to those who were most skilled in detecting the ravages of time. Men ask nothing more, and they are right in not wearying themselves making inquiries and calculations which would convict them of being duped by appearances; but women who age visibly are equally right in crying down a woman who does not age. La Binetti always made light of this kind of backbiting, going her way and finding lovers. The last one she killed by the pleasures of love was a Pole named Moscynski, whom his fate brought to Venice eight years ago. La Binetti was then sixty-three.

The life I was leading in Venice would have pleased me well enough if I could have kept from punting at basset. No one was allowed to deal at the Ridotto except noblemen, who must not be masked and must wear the patrician robe and the great wig which became obligatory at the beginning of the present century. I gambled, and it was a great mistake, for I had neither the strength of mind to give up when luck was against me nor to stop throwing good money after bad. What made me gamble was a certain streak of the miser in me; I loved spending lavishly, and I was unhappy when it was not gambling which had supplied me with the necessary money. I felt that money won at gambling had cost me nothing.

At the end of this same month of January, when I found myself in need of two hundred zecchini, Signora Manzoni persuaded another lady to lend me a diamond worth five hundred. I decided to pawn it in Treviso, where the city maintains a pawn office[26] which makes loans on pawned objects at 5 per cent. Treviso is fifteen miles from Venice. This admirable institution is not to be found in Venice, because the Jews are powerful enough to prevent its establishment. So I rise at a fairly early hour and put my bautta[27] in my pocket, since it was forbidden to go masked on that day. It was the eve of the Purification of the Blessed Virgin, otherwise known as Candlemas.

I walk to the end of the Canal Regio,[28] intending to take a gondola to Mestre, where I could take a post carriage which, in a matter of two hours, would bring me to Treviso, from which I should set out the same day, after pawning my diamond, on my return journey to Venice.

Walking along the quay toward San Giobbe, I see a two-oared gondola and in it a girl wearing a country headdress but a very costly one. I am so taken by her face that I stop to look at her more carefully. The gondolier at the bow, seeing that I had stopped, thought I wanted to take the opportunity of going to Mestre cheaply and told the man on the poop to make for the quay. I do not hesitate an instant. I get into the boat and give him three lire in return for his promise that he would take on no more passengers. An old priest, who was sitting in the best seat beside the beauty, starts to give it up to me; but I insist on his staying where he is.

CHAPTER IX

1747.

"THESE gondoliers," the old priest remarked to me, "are in luck. They took us aboard at Rialto for thirty soldi on condition that they might pick up passengers along the way; and here is one already. They will find more."

"When I am in a gondola, Your Reverence, there are no more seats for sale."

So saying I give the gondoliers another forty soldi, which satisfies them. They thank me, addressing me as "Your Excellency." The abate asks me if he had failed to give me my title; I reply that, not being a Venetian gentleman, I have no claim to the title, and the girl said she was very glad of that.

"Why, Signorina?"

"Because when I am in a gentleman's presence—I don't know why, I feel afraid. I suppose you are a Lustrissimo." [1]

"Not even that; I am a law clerk."[2]

"Then I'm all the gladder, for I like to be in company with people who don't think they're above me. My father was a tenant farmer, brother of my uncle here, the parish priest of Pr.[3] where I was born and brought up, without a brother or a sister to my name. I inherit everything, and all my mother's property too, who's always ill and can't live much longer, for which I'm very sorry; but that's what the doctor said. So to come back to what we were talking about, I don't think there's much difference between a law clerk and a rich farmer's daughter. I'm really just talking, for I know very well that when you travel you are with all sorts of people and it doesn't mean anything—isn't that so, dear Uncle?"

"Yes, my dear Cristina. And to prove it, here is this gentleman who came with us not knowing who we are."

"But do you think," I asked the good priest, "that I would have come with you if your niece's beauty had not conquered me?"

At these words the priest and his niece began laughing with all their might, while for my part, as I did not think what I had said was especially funny, I saw that my traveling companions were a bit stupid, which I thought all to the good.

"Why are you laughing so hard, my beautiful young lady? Is it to show me your teeth? I admit I have never seen any teeth so beautiful in Venice."

"I would never do that—though it's true that in Venice everybody paid me the same compliment. I assure you that in Pr. all the girls have teeth as pretty as mine. Isn't that so, Uncle?"

"Yes, niece."

"I was laughing," she went on, "at something I'll never tell you."

"Oh, tell me, I beg you!"

"No, I won't. Never, never!"

"I'll tell you myself," said the priest.

"I won't have it," said his niece, scowling with her dark brows. "If you do, I'll go away."

"I defy you to do that," said her uncle. "Do you know what she said when she saw you on the quay? 'There's a handsome young man there looking at me and he's very sorry he's not with us.' And when she saw you stop our gondola she was very pleased with herself."

Indignant at his giving her away, the niece was hitting him on the shoulder.

"Why," I asked her, "are you put out at my learning that you liked my looks, when I am charmed that you know I found you attractive?"

"Charmed for a moment. Oh, I know Venetian men now. They all told me I charmed them; and none of the ones I could have liked would make me a proposal."

"What kind of proposal did you want?"

"The kind of proposal I'm entitled to, Signore—for a proper marriage in church, and before witnesses. Yet we were in Venice for two weeks. Weren't we, Uncle?"

"This girl here," said the uncle, "whatever she may seem to be, is a good match, for she has three thousand scudi. She does not want to marry in Pr., and she may be right. She has always said that the only husband she wanted was a Venetian, and so I took her to Venice to give her a chance to meet people. A woman with excellent connections put us up for two weeks and took her to several houses where marriageable young men saw her; but the ones she was taken with were not interested in marriage, and she in turn did not like the ones who proposed."

"But do you think," said I, "that a marriage is made like an omelet? Two weeks in Venice is nothing. Six months there is the least time it would take. I myself, for example, think your niece is as pretty as a picture, and I should consider myself fortunate if the woman God intends for me looked like her; but if she were to give me fifty thousand scudi this minute to marry her at once, I would refuse. Before he takes a wife a sensible young man must know her character, for what makes happiness is neither money nor beauty.''

''No, my angel. You make me laugh. It means the qualities of the heart and mind. I have to marry one of these days, and I have been looking for a wife for the last three years, but to no purpose. I have known several girls almost as pretty as you are and all of them with good dowries; but after talking with them for two or three months I saw they were not for me.''

''What was wrong with them?''

''I can tell you, because you do not know them. One, whom I would certainly have married because I was very much in love with her, was intolerably vain. I found that out in less than two months. She would have ruined me in clothes and fashions and luxuries. If you can believe it, she paid her hairdresser a zecchino a month and she spent at least another zecchino on pomatums and perfumes.''

''She was out of her mind. I spend only ten soldi a year on wax, which I mix with goat's grease, and I have a fine pomatum, which I use to keep my forelock in place.''

''Another whom I would have married two years ago had an ailment which would have made me miserable. I learned of it in the fourth month, and I stopped seeing her.''

''What ailment?''

''Her condition was such that I should never have had children; and that is a terrible thing, for I would not marry except to have them.''

''That is as God wills; but for my part I know I'm in good health. Isn't that so, Uncle?''

''Another one was too pious, and I can't put up with that. She was so scrupulous that she went to confession every three or four days. I want my wife to be a good Christian as I am. Her confession took at least an hour."

"She was either a great sinner or a great ninny. I only go," she interrupted me, "once a month, and I tell everything in two minutes. Isn't that so, Uncle? If you didn't ask me questions, I shouldn't know what to say to you."

"Another always thought she knew better than I did, another was gloomy, and the one thing I must have in a woman is cheerfulness."

"Do you hear that, Uncle? You ought to, for you and my mother are always at me for being too cheerful."

"Another, whom I dropped at once, was afraid to be alone with me, and if I kissed her she ran and told her mother."

"She was a simpleton. I haven't listened to a lover yet, because at Pr. there are nothing but unmannerly peasants; but I know very well that there are some things I wouldn't go running to tell my mother."

"Another had a bad breath. And the last of all, whose complexion I thought was perfectly natural, painted. Almost all girls have that nasty fault, and so I fear I shall never marry—for example, I insist that the woman who is to be my wife shall have black eyes, and nowadays almost all girls have learned the secret of dyeing them; but they won't catch me, because I know better."

"Are my eyes black?"

"Ha-ha!"

"You're laughing?"

"I'm laughing because they look black, but they aren't. But for all that, you're a charming girl."

"Now that's funny. You think my eyes are dyed, and you say you know all about it. My eyes, Signore, whether they're pretty or ugly, are the way God gave them to me. Isn't that so, Uncle?"

"At least I've always believed so," the uncle answered.

"And you don't believe it?" she came back at me sharply.

"No, they're too beautiful for me to believe they are natural."

"By God! That's a funny thing to say."

"Excuse me, my fair young lady, I am sincere but I see that I have been too outspoken."

This falling out was followed by a silence. The priest smiled from time to time, but his niece could not get over her vexation. I stole a look at her, I saw that she was on the verge of tears, and it made me sorry, for her face could not have been more captivating. Dressed in country fashion, her hair was done up in plaits held in place by the array of gold pins which is the pride of the rich peasant girl; the ones she was wearing in her ebony-black braids must have been worth at least a hundred zecchini. Her long, solid-gold earrings and a thin gold chain which was wound more than twenty times around a neck as white as Carrara marble reflected a sheen on her rose and lily complexion which arrested me. It was the first time in my life that I had seen a village beauty so arrayed. Six years earlier at Pasiano Lucia had captivated me in an entirely different way. The silent girl beside me must be in despair, for her eyes were precisely her most beautiful feature, and I had been cruel enough to tear them from their sockets. I knew that in her heart she must hate me bitterly, and that she was keeping silent because she must be furious; but I had no intention of setting her right, for it was best not to hurry matters.

Soon after we entered the long Marghera[4] Canal I asked the priest if he had a carriage to take him to Treviso, for he had to pass through there to reach Pr.

"I shall walk, for my parish is a poor one; as for Cristina, I can easily find her a seat in some carriage."

"I should be most happy if you would both come with me in mine, which seats four."

"That would be as welcome as it is unexpected."

"On the contrary," said Cristina. "I do not wish to go with the Signore."

"But why not, my dear niece? I shall be with you."

"Because I don't want to."

"That," I said, not looking at her, "is how sincerity is usually rewarded."

"Sincerity!" she burst out; "I call it arrogance and spite. After this, no eyes in the world will look black to you, but since they're what you like, I'm very glad of it."

"You are wrong, my beautiful Cristina, for I have a way of finding out the truth."

"What way?"

"Washing them with lukewarm rose water is one way; or if the young lady cries all the artificial coloring vanishes at once."

As I said this, I enjoyed a most charming sight. Cristina's face, which had been flaunting anger and scorn, changed to a picture of serenity and satisfaction. She gave a smile which pleased the priest, for he had set his heart on having the use of a carriage without paying for it.

"Just cry, then, my dear niece, and the Signore will do your eyes justice."

And cry she did, but it was from laughing. My soul, which delighted in proofs of this sort, was in a ferment of joy. As we went up the steps at the landing place, I apologized to her, acknowledging that I had been completely wrong, and she accepted my offer of a carriage. I at once ordered a vetturino to harness up while we breakfasted; but the priest told me he must first say mass.

"Go quickly, we will attend, and you shall say it for my intention. Here is my usual offering."

It was a ducato d'argento,[5] which surprised him so much that he tried to kiss my hand. He starts toward the church and I offer my arm to Cristina, who, in doubt whether she should take it or not, asks me if I think she cannot walk by herself.

"Of course I don't, but people would say either that I am impolite or that the difference in rank between us is too great."

"And now that I'm taking it, what will they say?"

"That we may well be in love, and someone is sure to say we look as if we are made for each other."

"What if whoever says that goes and tells your mistress you were seen with a girl on your arm?"

"I have no mistress, and I won't have another, for there isn't a girl with a figure like yours in all Venice."

"I'm sorry for that, for your sake. As for me, I shall certainly not go back to Venice; and even if I did, how could I manage to stay there six months? For you said, didn't you, that it took you six months to know a girl well?"

"I should be glad to pay all the expenses."

"Really? Then tell my uncle and he'll consider it, for I can't go all by myself."

"And in six months," I said, "you would know me too."

"Oh, if you're thinking about me, I know you already."

"Then you would adapt yourself to my character?"

"Why not?"

"You would love me?"

"That too, once you're my husband."

I looked at the girl in amazement. She seemed a princess disguised as a peasant. Her dress of blue gros de Tours[6] laced with gold was of the richest, for it must have cost twice the price of a city dress, and the gold chain bracelets on her wrists, which matched her necklace, made a set of the costliest ornaments. Her figure, which I had not been able to examine in the gondola, was that of a nymph, and since the fashion of cloaks was unknown among peasant women, the line of the front of her dress, which was buttoned up to the chin, showed me the beauty of her bosom. The bottom of her dress, likewise laced with gold and coming down only to her ankles, allowed me to see her small feet and to imagine the slimness of her leg. The artless grace with which she was keeping pace with me was an enchantment in itself. Her face seemed to be sweetly telling me: "I am very glad you think me pretty." I could not imagine how such a girl could have been in Venice for two weeks and not found a man to marry her, or to seduce her. Another charm which intoxicated me was her country dialect and her frankness, which, accustomed as I was to life in the city, I took for stupidity: it was a flaw in the polishing which showed me all the value of the jewel. When in the rawness of her anger she had come out with that "By God!" my reader cannot imagine how much she had delighted me.

Absorbed in these thoughts, and determined that I would summon all my resources to do proper justice to this masterpiece of nature in my particular fashion, I waited impatiently for the mass to be over.

After breakfast I had the greatest difficulty in persuading the priest to precede me into the carriage; but I had no difficulty, once we had reached Treviso, in persuading him to stay for dinner and then to sup with me at an inn which was almost always unfrequented. He consented as soon as I promised him he could set out immediately after supper in a carriage which I would provide for him and which, on that fine moonlight night, would take him to Pr. in less than an hour. What made him in such a hurry was the solemnity of the festival, which obliged him to sing mass in his own church.

So we alight at the inn where, after having a fire lighted and ordering a good dinner, it occurs to me that the priest could go and pawn the diamond for me, which would give me an hour alone with the innocent Cristina. I ask him to do me the favor, explaining that I could not go myself as I did not wish to be recognized, and he is delighted at my giving him an opportunity to do something for me. He leaves, and I am in front of the fire, alone with the charming creature. I spent an hour with her, directing the talk to such subjects as would enable me to revel in her simplicity and inspire her with as strong an inclination for me as that which I felt for her. I had the firmness never to take her dimpled hand, which I was dying to kiss.

The priest came back with the ring, saying that I could not pawn it and be given a receipt for it until the next day but one, on account of the festival of the Virgin. He told me that he had talked with the cashier at the pawn office, who had said that if I wanted to I could obtain twice as much for it as I had asked. To this I replied that he would put me under a great obligation if he would come back from Pr. and do me the favor himself, since suspicion might be aroused if, after he had offered the diamond, it was offered by someone else. I said that I would pay for his carriage, and he promised me he would come back. I hoped to arrange matters so that he would bring his niece with him.

During dinner, finding Cristina increasingly worthy of my attention, and fearing to lose her trust if I precipitated an imperfect enjoyment in the course of a few minutes which I might contrive to spend with her during the day, I decided that my only course was to cajole the priest into bringing her back to Venice to stay for five or six months. It was there that I flattered myself I could bring love to birth and give it the food it required. So I broached the subject to the priest, saying that I would undertake to defray all the expenses and would find a highly respectable family where Cristina's honor would be as safe as if she were in a convent. I could not, I continued, marry her without knowing her, but that would inevitably follow. The priest replied that he would bring her himself as soon as I wrote him that I had found a house in which he could safely leave her. I saw that Cristina was in raptures over the arrangement; and perfectly certain that I would keep my word, I promised her that the matter would be settled in a week at the most. But I was a little surprised when, to my promise that I would write to her, she replied that her uncle would answer for her because she had never wanted to learn, though she could read perfectly well.

"You cannot write? How can you expect to become the wife of a Venetian if you can't write? I would never have believed anything so strange."

"Strange! There's not a girl in our village who can write. Isn't that so, Uncle?"

"It is true," he answered; "but none of them is thinking of marrying in Venice. The Signore is right. You must learn."

"Indeed you must," I said, "and even before you come to Venice, for everyone would laugh at me. You look sad. I am sorry you don't like the idea."

"I don't like it because it's impossible to learn in a week."

"I will undertake," said her uncle, "to teach you in two, if you will study as hard as you can. You will learn enough to be able to go on by yourself."

"It's a lot to do, but never mind—I promise I'll study day and night and I'll start tomorrow."

At dinner, I had told the priest that, instead of leaving after supper, his best course would be to go to bed and not set off with Cristina until an hour before dawn. He did not have to be in Pr. until thirteen o'clock.[7] He agreed when he saw that the idea appealed to his niece, who was feeling sleepy after a good supper. So I immediately gave orders for the carriage, and asked the priest to summon the hostess and arrange for another room for me and for a fire to be lighted in it.

"That is not necessary," said the old and saintly priest, to my great astonishment, "there are two big beds in this room and there is no need to have another one made up, for Cristina sleeps with me. We won't undress; but you are perfectly free to do so since, as you are not leaving with us, you can stay in bed as late as you please."

"Oh," said Cristina, "I shall have to undress, otherwise I can't sleep; but I won't delay you, for it will only take me a quarter of an hour to get ready."

I said nothing, but I could not get over my amazement. So the charming Cristina, who would turn Xenocrates[8] himself from the path of virtue, was in the habit of sleeping undressed with the priest her uncle, an old man, it was true, pious, very far from anything which could make the arrangement improper, and whatever you please; but the priest was a man, and he must once have acted the man and have known that he was exposing himself to danger. My carnal mind found it inconceivable. The thing was perfectly innocent, I had no doubt, and so innocent that they not only made no attempt to hide it but never even supposed that anyone who knew of it would find anything wrong in it. I saw all this, but I still could not get over my amazement. In the course of time I found that it was common practice among the good people of every country in which I traveled; but, I repeat, among good people. I do not count myself such.

Since we had had a fast-day dinner, and none too good a one at that, I went downstairs to see the hostess and tell her I did not care about the expense but I wanted a choice supper, suitable for a fast day of course, but with excellent fish, truffles, oysters, and the best that the market in Treviso could provide but, above all, good wine.

"If you do not care about the expense, leave it to me. You shall have Gatta wine."[9]

"I want supper served at three o'clock."[10]

"That gives me time enough."

I go back upstairs and find Cristina bending over her seventy-five-year-old uncle and stroking his cheeks. He was laughing.

"Do you know what this is all about?" he asked me. "My niece is begging me to leave her here until I come back. She tells me that you spent the hour I left you alone with her this morning as a brother would have spent it with his sister, and I believe her; but it doesn't seem to occur to her that she might be inconveniencing you."

"On the contrary, you may rest assured that it would be a pleasure, for I find her delightful. As for my duty and hers, I believe you can trust us."

"I have no doubt of it. So I will leave her in your care until day after tomorrow. I will be back here at fourteen o'clock[11] to do your errand."

I was so astonished by this arrangement, which was so unexpected and entered into with so little ado, that the blood rushed to my head; my nose bled copiously for a quarter of an hour, at which I felt no concern, for it had happened to me before, but to the great concern of the priest, who feared a hemorrhage. He went off on some business, saying that he would be back at nightfall. As soon as we were alone, I thanked Cristina for the trust she had in me.

"Really," she said, "I can't wait to have you know me well. You will see that I have none of the faults that displeased you in the young ladies you knew in Venice, and I promise I'll learn to write at once."

"You are an adorable girl and a model of sincerity; but I beg you to be discreet in Pr. No one must know that there is an understanding between us. You must do just as your uncle tells you; I will write everything to him."

"You can be sure that my mother herself will know nothing until you say she may."

I spent the whole day with her, doing nothing but what sufficed to make me fall in love with her. I kept her interested with little love stories of which I did not tell her the end. She could not guess it; but she pretended she had, not wanting to show her curiosity for fear of appearing ignorant. I told jokes not too subtle for her to understand, which would have bored a city girl spoiled by too much education but which were bound to please a peasant girl because they did not make her blush. When her uncle arrived, I was already laying plans to marry her and had got as far as deciding that I would put her up in the same house in which I had kept the Countess.

At three o'clock, Italian time, we sat down at table, and our supper was exquisite. Gatta wine does not intoxicate, it enlivens. It is drunk without water and is a wine which keeps scarcely a year. We went to bed an hour before midnight, and I did not wake till broad daylight. The priest had left so quietly that I had not heard him.

I look at the bed, and I see Cristina asleep in it alone. I say good morning, she opens her eyes, remembers where she is, laughs, props herself up on her elbow, looks at me, and says:

"My uncle has left."

I tell her she is as beautiful as an angel, she blushes, and draws the cover a little higher over her bosom.

"I am dying, my dear Cristina, to come and give you a kiss."

"If you are, my dear friend, come and give me one."

I spring out of bed, and modesty demands that I hurry to hers. It was a cold morning. Whether from politeness or from timidity, she moves away; but as she could not move away without making room for me, I feel that I am invited to take it. The cold, nature, and love combine to bring me under the coverlet, and nothing makes me think I should oppose them. So Cristina is in my arms, and I am in hers; in her face I read surprise, innocence, and content; in mine she could see only fond gratitude and the fire of a love rejoicing in a victory which it is gaining without a struggle.

In the bliss of our coming together, which had been brought about by pure chance and in which, since nothing had been premeditated, we could boast of nothing and accuse ourselves of nothing, we spent several minutes unable to speak. The harmony between us was such that our mouths only gave and received kisses. But we still had nothing to say to each other when, after our storm of kisses, we grew serious and remained in a state of inactivity which would have made us doubt we were alive if it had continued. It was only momentary. Nature and love, in perfect harmony, ended the shameful suspense by a single impulse, and we surrendered to each other. An hour later we seemed calmed, and we look at each other. Cristina is the first to break the silence, by saying, with the most perfect tranquillity and sweetness:

"What have we done?"

"We have married each other."

"What will my uncle say tomorrow?"

"He will not know it until he has himself given us the nuptial benediction in his parish church."

"When?"

"When we have completed all the preparations necessary for a public marriage."

"How long will that take?"

"About a month."

"It is forbidden to marry in Lent."

"I will get permission."

"You won't deceive me?"

"No, because I adore you."

"You don't need to know me any better?"

"No, because I know you completely and I am sure that you will make me happy."

"As you will make me. Let's get up and go to mass.

Who would have thought that, to find a husband, I didn't need to go to Venice, but to leave there for home!"

We got up, had breakfast, and went to mass. Then we ate a light dinner. Looking at Cristina attentively and seeing that her face wore a different expression from the one I had seen on it the day before, I asked her why; she answered that it must be the same reason that made me look thoughtful.

"My thoughtful look, my dear Cristina, is the look of Love conferring with Honor. The situation has become very serious, and Love, to his astonishment, finds that he must think. The problem is that we want to be married by the Church, and we cannot do that before Lent because the time before the Carnival ends is too short, and we cannot put it off until after Easter, for that would make the time too long. We need a legal dispensation to celebrate our marriage in Lent. Am I not right to think about it?"

To rise and cross the room and kiss me, tenderly and gratefully, was her answer. What I had answered her was perfectly true, but I could not tell her everything which had made me thoughtful. I found myself under an obligation which was not disagreeable to me, but which I wished had not been quite so pressing. I could not hide it from myself that a beginning of repentance was creeping serpentlike into my loving and honest soul, and it made me sad. Yet I was certain of one thing: this faultless creature should never become unhappy on my account.

She had told me that she had never seen a play or a theater, and I immediately resolved to afford her the pleasure. The host sent me a Jew who provided me with everything necessary to disguise her, and we went. A lover can have no greater pleasure than that which comes from doing something to please the object of his love. After the play I took her to the casino, where her first sight of a faro bank astonished her. I did not have money enough to play myself, but enough for her to amuse herself by staking a little. I gave her ten zecchini and told her what to do, though she did not know one card from another. She was given a seat, and in less than an hour was the proud possessor of nearly a hundred zecchini. I told her to stop, and we went back to the inn. When she counted all the money she had won and I told her that it belonged to her, she thought it was all a dream. "What will my uncle say?" After a light repast, we retired to spend the night in the arms of Love. We parted at dawn so that we should not be surprised by the priest, who was due to arrive.

He found us asleep in our respective beds. Cristina did not wake. I gave him the ring, and two hours later he brought me two hundred zecchini and the receipt. He found us dressed and sitting by the fire.

How surprised the good man was when Cristina spread out all her gold coins before him! He thanked God. He thought it all a miracle and concluded that we were born to make each other happy.

When he set off with his niece, I promised to visit him at the beginning of Lent, but on condition that when I arrived I should find no one knowing my name or anything about our affairs. He gave me his niece's birth certificate and an accounting of her dowry. After seeing them off I returned to Venice in love and firmly determined not to break my word to the girl. All I had to do was to produce oracles enough to convince my three friends that my marriage was written in the great book of destiny.

Unaccustomed as they were to going three days without seeing me, my appearance delighted them. They feared that some misfortune had overtaken me, except for Signor Bragadin, who said that with Paralis to guard me, no evil could befall me.

No later than the next day I decided to make Cristina happy without marrying her. I had had the idea when I still loved her more than myself. After I enjoyed her, the scales had swung to my side so far that my self-love proved to outweigh the love her charms had inspired in me. I could not bring myself, by marrying, to give up all the hopes which depended on my remaining in my state of freedom. Nevertheless, I found I was invincibly enslaved to sentiment. To abandon this innocent girl was an act whose turpitude put it beyond my power; the mere thought turned me cold. She might be pregnant; and I shuddered to imagine her become the shame of her village, loathing me, hating herself, and with no hope of finding a husband worthy of her since she had become unworthy of finding one to marry her. I set about the task of getting a husband who would be better for her in every way than myself. A husband such that she would not only forgive me the wrong I had done her, but be glad of my perfidy and love me the more for it. The business of finding him could not be difficult, for aside from the fact that Cristina was perfectly beautiful and enjoyed a spotless reputation, her dowry amounted to four thousand Venetian ducati correnti.[12] So I set to work at once.

Shut up with the three worshipers of my oracle, I took pen in hand and asked it a question on the matter near to my heart. It answered that I should entrust it to Serenus. This was Signor Bragadin's cabalistic name. He declared himself ready to do whatever Paralis ordered him to do. I had only to tell him what it was.

I explained that it was a matter of immediately obtaining from Rome a dispensation from His Holiness the Pope in favor of a most worthy girl, which would permit her to be married publicly in her parish church during the coming Lent. She was a peasant. I gave him her baptismal certificate and told him that it was not yet known who the husband would be, but that the omission could cause no difficulty. He answered that he would himself write to the Ambassador that day, and arrange for the Savio for the week[13] to send the letter on for him by express messenger.

"Leave it to me," he said, "to make this business look like an affair of state. Paralis shall be obeyed. I think I foresee that the husband will be one of us four, and we must be ready to render him obedience."

It took me no little effort to keep from bursting out laughing. I saw that it was in my power to make Cristina a Venetian noblewoman; but I did not really consider it. I asked Paralis who the girl's husband was to be, and he answered that Signor Dandolo should undertake to find the man, who must be young, handsome, of good morals, and a citizen[14] able to serve the Republic in the ministry of either domestic or foreign affairs; however, he was to conclude no arrangement until after he had consulted me. He took heart when I told him that the girl would bring her husband a dowry of four thousand ducati correnti, and that he had two weeks in which to make his choice. Signor Bragadin, who was delighted that he had escaped the task, was dying with laughter.

Taking these two steps set my heart at rest. I was morally certain that the kind of husband I wanted would be found. I thought of nothing but getting through the Carnival in proper style and at the same time so ordering my life as not to be caught with my purse empty when I should be particularly in need of money.

A benignant Fortune brought me to the beginning of the Carnival with nearly a thousand zecchini in my purse after paying all my debts, and the dispensation from Rome arrived ten days after Signor Bragadin had asked the Ambassador for it. I gave him the hundred Roman scudi which had been paid to the Roman Dataria.[15] The dispensation permitted Cristina to marry in any church she chose; but it had to receive the seal of the diocesan episcopal chancellery, which would also suspend the requirement to publish the banns. All that

I needed to be completely happy was the husband. Signor Dandolo had already proposed three or four, whom I had rejected for sufficient reasons; but at last he found the right man.

As I had to retrieve the ring from the pawn office and did not wish to appear there myself, I wrote to the priest to be at Treviso at an hour which I specified. I was not surprised to see him arrive with Cristina. As she felt sure that I had come to Treviso only to arrange everything for our marriage, she did not stand on ceremony but embraced me most affectionately and I did the same. Farewell to my heroism! If her uncle had not been there, I would have given her new reasons to believe that I and none other would be her husband. I saw her radiant with joy when I gave the priest the dispensation which allowed her to marry anyone she wished to during Lent. She could not imagine that I could have been forwarding another's cause, and as I was still not sure of anything I did not think it necessary to disabuse her just then. I promised her I would come to Pr. in a week or ten days, and there we would settle everything. After a supper at which we were all in good spirits, I gave the priest the receipt and the money to retrieve the ring, and we went off to bed; fortunately, the room in which we were had only one bed. I had to go and sleep in another.

The next morning I entered Cristina's room while she was still in bed. Her uncle had gone to say his mass and to retrieve my diamond from the pawn office. It was on this occasion that I made a discovery about myself. Cristina was charming and I loved her; but regarding her as one who could no longer belong to me and whom I must persuade to give her heart to another, I thought I ought to begin by abstaining from giving her the proofs of affection which she had a right to expect. I spent an hour with her, holding her in my arms and letting my eyes and lips devour all her beauties, but never quenching the fire which they kindled in my soul. I saw that she was in love with me and surprised, and I admired her virtue in the feeling which forbade her to make advances to me. Yet she got dressed without showing any sign of being either angry or mortified. She would have been both if she could have attributed my restraint to disregard.

Her uncle came back, gave me the diamond, and we dined. After dinner he showed me a little miracle. Cristina had learned to write, and to prove it she wrote from my dictation in my presence.

I left before they did, repeating my previous promise to see them again within a few days.

It was on the second Sunday in Lent that Signor Dandolo, just back from church, triumphantly told me that the happy husband had been found and that he was sure I would approve of him. He went on to name Carlo XX,[16] whom I knew by sight. He was a very handsome young man whose morals were good and who rejoiced in the auspicious age of twenty-one. He was a clerk di ragionato[17] to Saverio Costantini[18] and he was a godson of Count Algarotti, one of whose sisters[19] was the wife of Signor Dandolo's elder brother.

"The young man," he went on, "is an orphan, and I am certain that his godfather will stand surety for the dowry which a wife will bring him. I sounded him out, and he told me he would be glad to marry a respectable girl with a dowry large enough to enable him to buy a post which he already holds, but only as an employee."[20]

"An excellent prospect, but I cannot say anything yet. I must hear what he has to say first."

"He is coming to dine with us tomorrow."

The following day I found the young man well worthy of the praise Signor Dandolo had bestowed on him. We became friends. He was fond of poetry; I showed him some of mine. I called on him the next day and he showed me some of his. He introduced me to his aunt, in whose house he and his sister lived, and I was enchanted with the two ladies' characters and with the welcome they gave me. When I was alone with him in his room I asked him how he felt about love, and after answering that he had no interest in it he said he wanted to marry and repeated all that Signor Dandolo had told me about him. That same day I told Signor Dandolo that he could negotiate, and he began by putting the matter to Count Algarotti, who immediately discussed it with Carlo. His answer had been that he would not say yes or no until after he had seen the proposed bride and talked with her and had found out all about her. Signor Algarotti answered for his godson and was ready to guarantee the bride four thousand scudi if her dowry was worth that amount. After these preliminaries it was my turn.

Carlo came to my room with Signor Dandolo, who had already told him that, so far as the bride was concerned, the whole matter was in my hands. He asked me when I could do him the favor of introducing him to her, and I named a day, warning him that he would have to give me the whole of it since she lived twenty-two miles from Venice. I told him that we would dine with her and be back in Venice the same day. He promised to be at my disposition at dawn. I at once sent an express to the priest to inform him of the time when I would arrive at his house with a friend to dine with him, adding that Cristina was to make the fourth.

On my way to Pr. with Carlo I told him only that I had met her by chance when I was traveling to Mestre scarcely a month before, and that I would have offered to become her husband myself if I had been in a position to guarantee her four thousand ducati.

We reached the priest's house in Pr. two hours before noon, and a quarter of an hour later Cristina came in, looking completely self-possessed as she wished her uncle good morning and frankly told me that she was very glad to see me again. She only bowed slightly to Carlo and asked me if he was a law clerk as I was. He answered for himself that he was a clerk di ragionato. She pretended to know what that was.

"I want," she said, "to show you the writing I've done, and after that we will go to see my mother, if you please. Dinner won't be till nineteen o'clock;[21] isn't that so, dear Uncle?"

"Yes, Niece."

Delighted by Carlo's praise of her handwriting when he was told that she had only been practicing for a month, she told us to follow her. On the way Carlo asked her why she had waited till she was nineteen before learning to write.

"What is that to you? But you're wrong—I'm only seventeen."

Carlo begged her pardon, though he smiled at her bluntness. She was dressed in the costume of her village, but very neatly, with her gold chains around her neck and her wrists.

I told her to take our arms, and she did so after giving me a look which showed her willingness to obey me. We found her mother confined to bed by an attack of sciatica. A respectable-looking man who was sitting beside the patient rises and embraces Carlo. I am at once told that he is a physician, and I am glad to hear it.

After the appropriate compliments to the good woman, all of them on the subject of the merits of her daughter, who was sitting on her mother's bed, the physician asked Carlo for news of his sister's and his aunt's health. Speaking of his sister, who was suffering from a mysterious disease, Carlo asked him to tell him something privately. They went out; and I am left alone with the mother and daughter. I begin by praising the young man; I speak of his good conduct, his position, and the happiness which will fall to her whom God has destined to be his wife. They vie in confirming my praises, saying that his countenance declared all the qualities which I attributed to him. Having no time to lose, I tell Cristina to be on her good behavior at dinner, for my young friend might be the man whom God had destined for her.

"For me?"

"For you. He is one in a thousand. You would be happier with him than with me, and since the physician knows him, you can learn from him all that I have not time to tell you now."

My reader can imagine how painful I found it to make this explanation ex abrupto, and how surprised I was to see Cristina calm and not in the least disconcerted. This phenomenon checks the emotion which was about to make me shed tears. After a moment of silence, she asks me if I am certain that the handsome young man would want her. The question, which at once shows me the state of her heart, both reassures and consoles me. I did not really know Cristina. I answer that, being what she was, she could not but be attractive to any man, and that I will talk to her at greater length upon my next visit to Pr.

"It will be at dinner, my dear Cristina, that my friend will observe you, and it rests with you to display all the adorable qualities which God has granted you. See to it that he never guesses how intimate our friendship has been."

"This is all very strange. Does my uncle know about the change?"

"No."

"And if he likes me, when will he marry me?"

"In a week or ten days. I will attend to everything. You will see me here again before the week is out."

Carlo came back with the physician, and Cristina got up from her mother's bed and sat down facing us.

She was at no loss to answer all of Carlo's remarks with the greatest good sense, often arousing laughter by her ingenuousness, but never by stupidity. Charming ingenuousness, child of intelligence and ignorance! Its graces are enchanting. It alone has the privilege of saying anything at all without offending. But how ugly it is when it is not natural! By the same token, it is the highest accomplishment to feign it and make it appear genuine.

At dinner I said nothing, and to prevent Cristina from looking at me I never gave her a glance. Carlo occupied all her attention, and she never left him unanswered. The last thing she said to him, when we were leaving, went to my soul. He having told her that she was fit to make the happiness of a prince, she answered that she would be satisfied if he found her fit to make his. At these words he blushed to the roots of his hair, he embraced me, and we left. Cristina was simple, but her simplicity was not simplicity of mind, which I maintain is stupidity; her simplicity was in her heart, where it is a virtue despite the fact that it is only a matter of temperament; she was simple in manner, too, hence sincere, completely without self-consciousness, incapable of false modesty, and without even a trace of what is called affectation.

We returned to Venice, and through the whole journey Carlo talked of nothing but the happiness of possessing such a girl. He said he would go to see Count Algarotti the next day, and that I might write to the priest and tell him to come to Venice with all the documents necessary for a marriage contract, which he was eager to sign. He laughed when I told him that I had made Cristina the gift of a dispensation from Rome to marry during Lent; he said that in that case there was no time to be lost. The upshot of the conference on the following day between Signor Algarotti, Signor Dandolo, and Carlo was that the priest should be brought to Venice with his niece. I undertook to see to it, and went back to Pr., leaving Venice two hours before dawn. I told him that we must go to Venice at once with his niece to hasten the final preparations for her marriage to Signor Carlo, and he asked only for time enough to say his mass. In the meanwhile, I went to see Cristina and told her everything, preaching her a fond and fatherly sermon, the advice in which was directed to making her happy all the rest of her life with a husband who would daily prove himself more worthy of her regard and love. I laid down a course of conduct toward Carlo's aunt and sister by which she could not fail to gain their undivided affection. The conclusion of my discourse was moving, and at the same time mortifying to myself, for when I came to inculcating the duty of fidelity I had to ask her to forgive me for having seduced and deceived her. Here she interrupted me to ask if when I promised to marry her the first time, after we had been weak enough to surrender to love, I had intended to break my word, and, hearing me reply that I had not, she said that in that case I had not deceived her but that, on the contrary, she could only be grateful to me because, having looked at my situation coolly and seen that our marriage could make us unhappy, I had thought of finding her a more reliable husband and had succeeded so well in doing so.

She calmly asked me what she could answer him if on the first night he asked her the name of the lover who had made her other than a virgin. I answered that it was most unlikely that Carlo, with his good manners and discretion, would ask her such a cruel question; but that if he did ask she must answer that she had never had a lover and that she did not know that she was different from any other girl.

"Will he believe me?"

"Yes, I am sure he will, for I would believe it too."

"And if he doesn't believe me?"

"He would deserve your contempt; and his punishment would be that he had earned it. A man of intelligence and education, my dear Cristina, never risks asking such a question, for he is certain not only to displease but also not to be told the truth, for if the truth is prejudicial to the good opinion every woman wishes her husband to have of her, only a woman who was a fool could bring herself to tell it to him.''

''I understand it all. So let us embrace for the last time.''

''No, for we are alone, and my virtue is weak. Alas! I still love you.''

''Don't cry, my dear friend, for I really don't care one way or the other.''

It was this declaration which, by setting me laughing, made me stop crying. She attired herself like the village princess she was and, after a good breakfast, we set out. Four hours later we reached Venice; I put them up at a good inn, and went to Signor Bragadin's, where I told Signor Dandolo that the priest and his niece were at such-and-such an inn, and that he should arrange to meet Signor Carlo the next morning so that I could present them at the hour he would appoint, whereupon I would turn the whole matter over to him, for the honor of the couple, of their relatives and friends, and my own, did not permit me to take any further part in it.

He understood how right I was and acted accordingly. He fetched my dear Carlo, I presented them both to Cristina and the priest, then I bade them a sort of farewell. I learned later that they all called together on Signor Algarotti, then on Carlo's aunt, then went to the notary's to draw up the contract for the marriage and the dowry; and that finally the priest and his niece left for Pr., accompanied by Carlo, who set a day on which he would return there to marry her in the parish church.

On returning from Pr., Carlo paid me a most courteous visit. He told me that the beauty and the character of his intended had charmed his aunt and his sister and his godfather Algarotti, who had undertaken to defray all the expenses of the wedding, which was to take place at Pr. on a day which he named. He invited me to attend, and remonstrated to such good effect when he saw me preparing to decline that I could not but give in. What pleased me greatly was his description of the effect produced on his aunt by Cristina's village finery, her dialect, and her ingenuousness. He did not deny that he was completely in love with her and proud of the compliments which were paid her. As for the peasant dialect which Cristina spoke, he was sure that she would get rid of it, for in Venice envy and malice would damn her for it. As all this was my doing, I felt sincerely pleased; but I was secretly jealous of his good fortune. I praised him highly for having chosen Signor Algarotti as his sponsor.

Carlo invited Signor Dandolo and Signor Barbaro, and it was with them that I went to Pr. on the appointed day. At the priest's house I found a table set for twelve by the Count's house servants, for he had sent his cook and everything necessary for the repast. When I saw Cristina I went into another room so that no one should see my tears. She was as beautiful as a star in her peasant dress. Her husband, and even the Count, could not persuade her to go to church dressed in the Venetian fashion and with her black hair powdered. She told Carlo she would put on Venetian dress as soon as she was with him in Venice; but that she would never show herself in Pr. except dressed as she had always been, otherwise all the girls with whom she had been brought up would laugh at her.

To Carlo, Cristina seemed something supernatural. He told me he had asked the woman in whose house she had stayed during her two weeks in Venice who were the two men she had refused and that he had been surprised, for they possessed every quality to make them acceptable. "This girl," he said, "is a boon which Heaven destined for my happiness, and it is to you that I owe its precious possession.'' His gratitude pleased me, and I certainly did not think of turning it to account. I rejoiced in seeing that I had succeeded in making people happy.

Entering the church an hour before noon, we were surprised to find it so full that we could not find room to sit down. Many of the nobility of Treviso had come to see if it was really true that the marriage of a peasant girl was being solemnly celebrated during a time when ecclesiastical discipline forbade it. Everyone marveled, for a month's wait would have made a dispensation unnecessary. There must be some secret reason for it, and people were put out at not being able to penetrate it. But when Cristina and Carlo made their appearance everyone agreed that the charming couple deserved a special distinction and an exception to all rules.

A Countess Tos.,[22] of Treviso, Cristina's godmother, came up to her after the mass, as she was leaving the church. She embraced her like an affectionate friend, and modestly reproached her with not having informed her of the happy event, since she had passed through Treviso. With all her native ingenuousness, Cristina answered modestly and sweetly that she must lay the omission to a haste which, as she saw, was approved by the head of the Christian Church himself. After making this sensible answer, she at once presented her husband to her and begged the Count her godfather to persuade the Countess her godmother to honor the wedding repast. The invitation was instantly extended. This mannerly behavior, which should have been the fruit of a refined upbringing and a considerable experience of society, was in Cristina purely the result of a natural sense of propriety and the frankness of a mind which would have shone all the less if art had been employed to polish it.

The new bride had scarcely entered the room before she fell to her knees before her mother, who, weeping with joy, blessed her and her husband. The good mother received the compliments of the company seated in an armchair from which her illness prevented her from stirring.

We sat down at table, at which etiquette demanded that Cristina and her husband should take the highest places. I sat in the lowest, with the greatest pleasure. Though all the dishes were exquisite, I ate very little and spoke not at all. Cristina's only concern was to give each member of the company his due attention, either by way of answer or address, stealing a look at her dear husband whenever she spoke to see if he approved of what she was saying. Two or three times she said such charming things to his aunt and his sister that they could not help rising and kissing first her and then her husband, whom they called the happiest of men. My soul rejoiced when I heard Signor Algarotti tell Signora Tos. that he had never had a greater pleasure in all his life.

At twenty-two o'clock[23] Carlo whispered something to her, in response to which she bowed to Signora Tos., who rose. After the customary compliments, the new bride went into the next room, where the girls of the village were gathered, and distributed a big basketful of cornucopias filled with sweetmeats among them. She took leave of them, kissing them all without the slightest trace of pride. After coffee Count Algarotti invited the entire company to spend the night at a house of his in Treviso and for dinner on the day after the wedding. The priest excused himself, and it was, of course, out of the question for the mother, who, her condition growing steadily worse after the happy day, died two or three months later.

So it was that Cristina left her home and her village, to find herself with a husband whom she made happy. Signor Algarotti set off with the Countess Tos. and my two noble friends; Carlo and his wife traveled alone; and his aunt and his sister came with me in my carriage.

The sister was a widow aged twenty-five and not unattractive; but I preferred the aunt. She said that her new niece was a veritable jewel, with all the qualities necessary to make everyone adore her; but that she would not let her be seen until she had learned to speak Venetian.

"All her gaiety and ingenuousness," she added, "are simply intelligence; like her person, it must be dressed in the fashion of our country. We are most satisfied with my nephew's choice; and he has incurred an eternal obligation to you, with which no one should find fault. I hope that in future you will make one of our circle."

I did exactly the opposite; and it was duly appreciated. Everything was happy in this charming marriage. Cristina did not give her husband a son until a year had passed.

At Treviso we were very well lodged, and after drinking a few flagons of lemonade we all went to bed.

The next morning I was in the drawing room with Signor Algarotti and my friends when the bridegroom entered, handsome as an angel and looking fresh. After wittily replying to all the usual compliments, he asked his aunt and his sister to go and wish his wife good morning. They disappeared at once. I was looking at him closely, and not without anxiety, when he embraced me cordially.

People think it surprising that there are pious scoundrels who commend themselves to their saints and who thank them after some successful piece of knavery. They are mistaken; it is a state of mind which cannot but be good, for it combats atheism.

An hour later the bride appeared, beautiful and radiant, between her new aunt and her sister-in-law. Signor Algarotti went to meet her and asked if she had had a good night, and her only answer was to go and kiss her husband. Then, turning her beautiful eyes toward me, she said that she was happy and that it was to me that she owed it.

After dinner we went to Mestre and from there to Venice in a large peota, from which we disembarked the couple at their house, then went to amuse Signor Bragadin with a full account of our happy expedition. That strangely learned man made a quantity of profound and absurd reflections on the marriage. They all struck me as comic, for, being based on imperfect knowledge, they became a fantastic mixture of worldly policy and false metaphysics.

CHAPTER X

Trifling misadventures which force me to leave Venice. What befalls me in Milan and in Mantua.

ON THE first Sunday after Easter Carlo paid us a visit with his wife, who seemed to me a completely different person. It was the effect of her clothes and her coiffure. I thought they both looked completely happy. Yielding to Carlo's friendly reproach that I had never come to see him, I went there on St. Mark's Day[1] with Signor Dandolo; but in the meanwhile I derived the greatest satisfaction from learning from his own lips that Cristina was the idol of his aunt and the intimate friend of his sister, who both found her always accommodating, accepting whatever suggestions they made, and gentle as a lamb. She was already beginning to get rid of her dialect.

On St. Mark's Day we found her in her aunt's room; her husband was not at home. One thing leading to another, the aunt praised her for the progress she was making in writing and at the same time asked her to show me her book. She rose, and I followed her. She said she was happy, and that she saw more clearly every day that her husband had an angelic nature. He had told her, without a trace of suspicion or displeasure, that he knew she had spent two days alone with me, and that he had laughed in the face of the ill-disposed person who could have given him the information only to trouble him.

Carlo had all the virtues, and twenty-six years after his marriage he gave me generous proof of his friendship by opening his purse to me. I never frequented his house, and he was grateful to me for it. He died a few months before my last departure from Venice,[2] and left his wife in very easy circumstances, and three sons, all in good positions, with whom she is perhaps still living.

In June at the Fair of St. Anthony at Padua I made friends with a youth of my own age who was studying mathematics under Professor Succi. His family name was Tognolo,[3] though about this time he changed it to Fabris. He is the Count Fabris who died eight years ago in Transylvania, where he was in command as lieutenant-general in the service of the Emperor Joseph II. This man, who owed his success to his qualities, would perhaps have died in obscurity if he had kept his old name of Tognolo, which is unmistakably a peasant name. He was from Oderzo, a large town in Venetian Friuli. His brother the Abate,[4] a wit and a great gambler, having changed his name to Fabris, made his younger brother change his too, to bear him out. He saw that he had done well when, under his new name of Fabris, he was decorated with the title of Count in consequence of a fief which he purchased from the Venetian Senate. Become a Count and a citizen, he was no longer a peasant; become Fabris, he was no longer Tognolo. The name would have injured him, for he could never have uttered it without reminding his hearers of his low birth, and the proverb which says that a peasant is always a peasant is but too well based on experience. A peasant, in the general opinion, is incapable of sound reasoning, of pure feeling, of gentility, and of any heroic virtue. That the new Count made others forget what he was, is not, by the way, to say that he should either have forgotten it himself or denied it. On the contrary, he should always have remembered it, so that he would never be in his actions what he was before his transformation. And in fact in all his public contracts he never abandoned his former name.

His brother the Abate offered him two noble professions and told him to choose. The thousand zecchini which it would cost to obtain him a place in one or the other were ready. It was a matter of choosing between Mars and Minerva. He could either buy him a company in the troops of H.I.R.M.A.[5] outright or, by influence, procure him a chair at the University of Padua. In the meanwhile he was studying mathematics, for he had to have a thorough education no matter which profession he adopted. He chose the army, imitating Achilles, who preferred fame to long life. And indeed he lost his life. To be sure, he was no longer young and he did not die in battle, on the field of honor as it is called; yet but for the pestilential fever which he caught in the death-ridden country to which his august master sent him, he might well still be alive, for he was no older than I.

The air of distinction, the sentiments, the varied knowledge, and the high qualities of Fabris would have roused laughter if he had continued to call himself Tognolo.[6] Such is the power of an appellation in the stupidest of all possible worlds.[7] Those who bear an ill-sounding name, or one which suggests an absurd idea, should abandon it and take another if they aspire to the honors and wealth which the sciences and the arts bestow. Nobody can deny them this right, so long as the name they take is not someone else's. I believe they should make it up. The alphabet is public, and everyone is at liberty to use it to create a word and make it his own name;[8] Voltaire would not have attained immortality with the name of Arouet.[9] To deny him entrance to the temple, the door would have been slammed shut in his face. He would have lost all self-respect if he had constantly heard himself called à rouer ("whipping boy"). D'Alembert would not have become illustrious and famous under the name of Lerond[10] ("fatty"); and Metastasio would not have cut a figure under the name of Trapasso[11] ("death"). Melanchthon[12] under the name of "Red Earth" would not have dared to discuss the Eucharist, and Monsieur de Beauharnais[13] would have been laughed at if he had kept the name of Beauvit ("fine cock"), even if the founder of his ancient family had owed his fortune to it. The Bourbeux ("muddies") chose to be called Bourbon,[14] and the Caraglios ("testicles") would certainly take a different name if they went to settle in Portugal. I feel sorry for King Poniatowski, who—so I have heard—when he renounced his crown and the title of King also renounced the name of Augustus which he took when he ascended the throne.[15] Only the Colleoni ("testicles") of Bergamo would find it hard to change their name, for since the glands necessary to their propagation appear on their shield, they would at the same time have to renounce their coat of arms, thus detracting from the glory of the heroic Bartolomeo.[16]

Toward the end of the autumn my friend Fabris introduced me to a family than which none could better enrich the heart and the mind. It was in the country, in the direction of Zero.[17] There was gaming, lovemaking, and much amusing practical joking. Some of the jokes were atrocious, but it was a point of pride to stand them and laugh. Taking offense at anything was not allowed. One had to see the joke or be written off as a fool. Beds were made to fall. Ghosts struck terror; one young lady was given diuretic pills, and another comfits which produced uncontrollable farts. There was nothing for it but to laugh. I was no less daring than anyone else, both actively and passively; but here is a trick which was played on me and which cried for revenge.

We usually took a walk to a farm which was half an hour away; it could be reached in a quarter of an hour by crossing a ditch on a narrow plank which bridged it. I always chose to take this shorter way, in spite of the ladies, who were afraid to cross the narrow plank even though I went over first to encourage them. One fine day I was going first, and when I was halfway across, the piece of plank on which I had set my foot suddenly gives and drops with me into the ditch, which was full not of water but of dirty, liquid, stinking mud. I was buried in filth up to the neck and obliged to join in the general laughter, which, however, lasted only a minute, for the joke was foul and the whole company thought it so. Peasants were called and dragged me out in a pitiable state. My new fall suit embroidered with spangles was ruined, as well as my stockings and shoes; but what of it? I laughed, though I was determined to take a cruel revenge, for the joke was cruel. To find out who had perpetrated it, I had only to keep my head. The broken piece had clearly been sawn. I was taken back to the house and lent a suit and a shirt, for as I had only meant to spend twenty-four hours there, I had nothing with me.

I leave the next morning as I had planned, and that evening am back among the charming company. Fabris, who felt the thing as keenly as I did, told me that the originator of the joke remained impenetrably unknown. The promise of a zecchino to a peasant woman if she could tell me who had sawn the plank did everything. It was a young man, whose lips I was sure I could open at the cost of another zecchino. My threats, rather than my zecchino, made him confess to me that he had sawn the plank at the instigation of Signor Demetrio. He was a Greek spice merchant between forty and fifty years of age, an excellent and kindly man on whom the only joke I had played was to appropriate Signora Lin's chambermaid, with whom he was in love.

I never racked my brain so hard as on this occasion when I was trying to think up a joke to play on the malicious Greek. I had to find one which, if not worse, would at least be equal to the one he had played on me both in inventiveness and in the pain it would cause him. The more I thought the less I found, and I was in despair, when I saw a dead man being buried. As I looked at the corpse I laid a plan, and this is how I carried it out:

After midnight I went to the graveyard alone with my hunting knife, I uncovered the dead man, I cut off his arm at the shoulder, not without great difficulty, and after covering the corpse with earth again, I returned to my room carrying the dead man's arm. The next day when I leave the table after supping with all the others I go and get my arm, then ensconce myself under the bed in the Greek's room. A quarter of an hour later he comes in, undresses, puts out the light, gets into bed, and when I think he is asleep I pull down the covers at the foot until he is bare to the hips. I hear him laugh and say: "Whoever you are, go away and let me sleep, I don't believe in ghosts." So saying, he pulls the covers back over him and tries to go to sleep.

Five or six minutes later I do the same thing, he repeats the same words; but when he goes to pull back the covers I make him feel some resistance. The Greek then reaches out to catch the hands of the man or woman who was holding his covers; but instead of letting him find my hand I make him find the dead man's, whose arm I was holding firmly. The Greek pulls as firmly at the hand he is holding, thinking that he would pull the person too; but suddenly I let go of the arm, and I hear not another word from my man's lips.

My play being over, I go to my room, sure that I had given him a great fright but had done him no other harm.

The next morning I am waked by sounds of coming and going the reason for which I do not understand; I get up to see what it is, and the mistress of the house herself tells me that what I had done was too much.

"What did I do?"

"Signor Demetrio is dying."

"Did I kill him?"

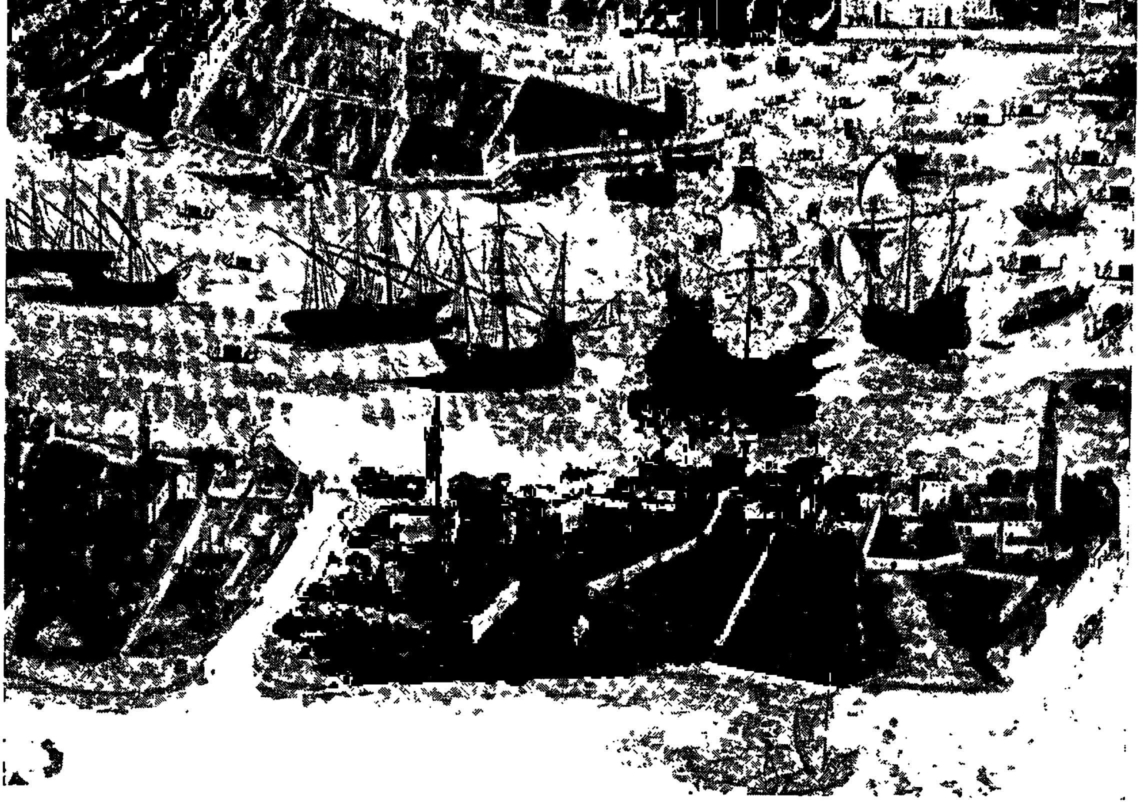
She goes off without answering me. I dress in some alarm, determined in any case to feign complete ignorance; I go to the Greek's room, where I find the entire household, the archpriest, and the beadle, who is arguing with him because he does not want to bury the arm, which I saw there, over again. They all look at me with horror, and only laugh when I insist that I know nothing about the matter and am amazed that they should so rashly find me guilty. "It is you, you're the only one here who would dare do such a thing, it's just like you," they all answer me together. The archpriest tells me I have committed a great crime and that he must report it at once. I reply that he is free to do whatever he pleases, but that I have nothing to fear, and walk off.

At table I am told that the Greek had been bled, that he had recovered the ability to move his eyes, but not his speech, nor control over his limbs. The next day he spoke; after I left I learned that he remained in a stupor and spasmodic. He passed the rest of his life in the same condition. The archpriest had the arm buried the same day, drew up his report, and sent an indictment for the crime to the episcopal chancellery at Treviso.

Tired of listening to reproaches, I returned to Venice, and two weeks later, on receiving a summons to appear before the magistrate against blasphemy,[18] I asked Signor Barbaro to find out why, for he is a magistrate to be feared. I was astonished that I was being indicted as if it were known for certain that I had cut off the dead man's arm. I thought I ought to be given the benefit of the doubt. But it turned out not to be that at all. In the evening Signor Barbaro informed me that it was a woman demanding that I be punished for having taken her daughter to La Giudecca and there raped her; in witness whereof, the complaint alleged, she was sick in bed from the blows I had given her, which had bruised her all over.

This business was of the sort which brings expense and trouble to anyone into whose lap it falls even if he is innocent. I was innocent so far as the charge of raping her was concerned; but it was true that I had beaten her. Here is my defense, which I asked Signor Barbaro to convey to the magistrate's clerk.

"On such-and-such a day I saw such-and-such a woman with her daughter. There being a malvasia in the street where I met them, I invited them to go in. The girl having refused my caresses, the mother told me she was a virgin and that she was right not to abandon herself without making something from it. Having taken the liberty of convincing myself of the fact with my hand, I saw that it might be true, and I offered her six zecchini if she would bring her to me on La Giudecca after dinner. My offer was accepted, and the mother left her daughter with me at the end of the garden of La Croce.[19] She took the six zecchini and left. The fact is that the girl, when I wanted to proceed to business, began fencing with me, so that I was constantly thrown off. At first the game made me laugh, then growing tired and bored, I turned serious and told her to stop it. She said gently that if I couldn't it was not her fault. Knowing this trick, and having been stupid enough to pay in advance, I could not consent to be duped. After an hour I put the girl in a posture in which she could not play her game; she immediately changed her position.



The Giudecca with Its Gardens

" 'Why do you not stay as I put you, my pretty child?'

" 'Because that way I won't.'

" 'You won't?'

" 'No.'

"At that, without making the slightest sound, I took the broomstick which was within reach and gave her a good beating. She screamed like a pig; but we were on the lagoon, where no one could come running. I know, however, that I broke neither her arms nor her legs, and that the welts from my blows can only be on her buttocks. I made her get dressed, I got her into a boat which happened to go by, and I put her ashore at La Pescheria.[20] The girl's mother received six zecchini, the girl kept her detestable flower. If I am guilty, I can be guilty only of having beaten the infamous daughter and pupil of a still more infamous mother."

My document had no effect, for the magistrate was certain that the girl was not a virgin and the mother denied having received six zecchini and even having made the bargain. Influence was of no avail. I was summoned, I did not appear, and a warrant for my arrest was about to be issued, when the complaint against me stating that I had dug up a dead man and all the rest of it was laid before the same magistrate. It would have been better for me if it had been presented to the Council of Ten, for one tribunal would perhaps have saved me from the other. The second crime, which at bottom was only a joke, was a crime of the utmost gravity. I was summoned to appear in person within twenty-four hours, after which a warrant for my arrest would certainly be issued at once. It was at this point that Signor Bragadin told me I should bow to the storm. So I immediately packed my things.

I have never left Venice with such great regret, for I had two or three long-standing involvements all of which were dear to me, and I was lucky at cards. My friends assured me that the two cases against me would be quashed by the end of a year at most. Anything can be smoothed over in Venice once everyone has forgotten it.

After packing my trunk I set out at nightfall; the next day I slept in Verona, and two days later in Milan, where I lodged at the Albergo del Pozzo.[21] I was alone, well outfitted, well supplied with jewels, without letters of recommendation, but with four hundred zecchini in my purse, a complete stranger in the great and beautiful city of Milan, in excellent health, and at the happy age of twenty-three. It was January in the year 1748.

After eating a good dinner, I set out by myself, I go to a coffeehouse, then to the opera,[22] and after admiring the principal beauty of Milan in the fact that no one paid any attention to me, I am delighted to see Marina in the role of a comic dancer receiving general applause, and deserving it; I see her grown up, filled out, and in short all that a pretty girl of seventeen could be; I decide to resume my relation with her if she is not otherwise involved. At the end of the opera I take a carriage to her house. She had just sat down at table with someone; but as soon as she sees me she throws down her napkin and runs into my arms with a rain of kisses, which I return, supposing that her companion at table was a person of no importance. The servant sets a third place without waiting to be told, she invites me to sup with her; but before sitting down I ask her who the gentleman is. If he had been polite, I would have asked Marina to introduce me; but as he saw fit not to stir, I could not sit down until I knew who he was.

“I congratulate you. You will not take offense at our transports, Signore, for she is my daughter.”

“She is a wh....”

"Very true," said Marina, "and you can believe him, for he is my pi..."

The brute throws a knife at her face, she ducks it and runs; he starts to run after her; but I stop him by putting the point of my sword to his throat. At the same time I tell Marina to have her servant light me out. Marina picks up her cloak, takes my arm, I sheathe my sword, and willingly lead her toward the stairs. The self-styled Count challenges me to come alone the next day to the Cascina dei Pomi[24] to hear what he had to say to me. I answer that he will see me there at four in the afternoon. I took Marina to my inn, where I at once procured the room next to mine for her and ordered supper for two.

At table Marina, seeing me rather thoughtful, asked me if I was displeased that she had escaped from the brute to come with me. After assuring her that I was very glad of it, I asked her to give me a full account of the man.

"He is," she said, "a professional gambler who calls himself Count Celi. I met him here; he made advances to me, he invited me to supper, he got up a table at cards, and having won a considerable sum from an Englishman whom he invited to supper, assuring him that I would be there, he gave me fifty guineas the next morning, saying that he had given me a share in the bank. He had scarcely become my lover before he made me accept the advances of all the men he intended to dupe. He came to live with me. The reception I gave you apparently offended him, he called me wh..., and you know the rest. Here I am, and I mean to stay here until I leave for Mantua, where I am engaged as prima ballerina. I have told my servant to go and fetch me whatever I needed for tonight, and tomorrow I will send for all my possessions. I will not see the scoundrel again. I wish to be yours alone, if you want me. At Corfu you were involved, I hope that is not the case here, tell me if you still love me.''

''I adore you, my dear Marina, and I think we will go to Mantua together; but you must be mine alone.''

''My dear, you will make me happy. I have three hundred zecchini and I will give them to you tomorrow at no other interest than to be in possession of your heart.''

''I do not need money. I want nothing from you except that you should love me, and by tomorrow night we shall be more at our ease.''

''Perhaps you think you will have to fight a duel tomorrow. Don't worry about it, my dear, he is a coward, I know him. I understand that you must go there; but you will find you have nothing to do, and so much the better.''

She then told me that she had broken with her brother Petronio, that Cecilia was singing at Genoa, and that Bellino-Teresa was still in Naples, where she was getting rich by ruining dukes.

''I am the only unlucky one of us.''

''How can you say that? You have become a beauty and an excellent dancer. Be less prodigal of your favors, and you too will find a man to provide for you.''

''To be chary of my favors is hard, because when I love I must give myself, and when I am not in love I am awkward. The man who gave me fifty zecchini won't come back. It is you I want.''

''I am not rich, my dear; and my honor—''

''Say no more. I understand.''

''Why, instead of a manservant, do you not keep a chambermaid?''

''You are right; I would make a better impression; but the ugly devil serves me well and is loyalty itself.''

''He is at least a pi. .''

''Yes, but only when I tell him to be. Believe me, he is one in a thousand.''

I spent a very pleasant night with the girl. In the morning all her things arrived. We dined together in high spirits, and after dinner I left her dressing for the theater. At three o'clock I put all my valuables in my pocket and told a coachman to take me to the Cascina dei Pomi, where I immediately dismissed him. I felt sure that one way or another I should put my scoundrelly challenger out of action. I saw very well that I was being foolish and that I could break my word to a man of such low reputation without any risk; but I hankered for a duel, and I thought this one was just the thing for me, since all the right was on my side. A visit to a dancer; an impudent self-styled nobleman calls her wh... in my presence; then he tries to kill her; I take her away from him; he puts up with it, but issues a challenge which I accept. I thought that if I did not go, I gave him the right to proclaim me a coward everywhere.

Going into a coffeehouse to wait until four o'clock, I fall into talk with a Frenchman whose appearance I liked. Enjoying his conversation, I warned him that upon the arrival of someone who was to be alone my honor demanded that he should find me alone too, for which reason I must ask him to disappear when he appeared. A quarter of an hour later I see him arrive with a companion, I tell the Frenchman that I should be glad if he would stay.

He comes in, and I see that the fellow with him was wearing a sword at his side a good forty inches long and looked a perfect cutthroat. I rise, saying coldly to the bas.... :[25]

"You told me you would come alone."

"There's no harm in having my friend along, since I have only come to talk with you."

"If I had known that, I would not have gone to the trouble. But let us make no disturbance and go and talk where no one can see us. Follow me."

I go out with the Frenchman, who, knowing the place, takes me where there is no one, and we stop to wait for the two men, who were coming slowly along, talking together. When I see they are ten paces away, I draw my sword, telling Celi to be quick and draw his, and the Frenchman unsheathes his sword too.

"Two against one?" says Celi.

"Send your friend away and this gentleman will leave too. Besides, your friend has a sword, so we are two against two."

The man with the long sword said he would not fight with a dancer; my second replies that a dancer is as good as a bas...., and so saying he advances on him, gives him a blow with the flat of his sword, I pay the same compliment to Celi, who falls back with his friend, saying that he only wanted to have a word with me and that he would fight after that.

"Speak."

"You know me and I do not know you. Tell me who you are."

It was then that I began to hit him in good earnest, as my brave dancer did the other; but only for a moment, for they ran away as fast as their legs could carry them. So the whole pretty affair was over and done with. My brave second was expecting company, so I went back to Milan alone after thanking him and asking him to sup with me after the opera at the "Pozzo," where I was lodging. For that purpose I told him the name I had given for the register.

I found Marina just going out; when she had heard how the whole thing had gone off she promised me she would tell it to everyone she saw; but what delighted her was that she was certain that if it was true that my second was a dancer it could be no one but Balletti,[26] who was to dance with her at Mantua.

After putting my papers and my jewels back in my trunk, I went to the coffeehouse, then took a place in the parterre of the theater, where I saw Balletti pointing me out as he told our comical story to all his acquaintances. At the end of the opera he met me and we went to the "Pozzo" together. Marina, who was in her room, came into mine as soon as she heard me speak, and I enjoyed Balletti's surprise when he saw his future dancing partner, on whose account he had to prepare to dance demi-caractère parts. Marina simply could not risk appearing as a serious dancer. When we sat down at table these fair votaries of Terpsichore, who had never met before, declared an amorous war which kept me amused throughout supper, for confronted with a dancer, Marina, who knew what she was about in matters of love, adopted an entirely different behavior from that which her catechism instructed her to use with "gulls." In any case, Marina was in excellent spirits because of the extraordinary applause which greeted her appearance in the second ballet, by which time the story of Count Celi was known to the whole parterre.

There were only to be ten more performances, and Marina having decided to leave on the day after the last one, we settled that we should leave together. Meanwhile, I invited Balletti to come to dinner and supper with us every day. I took a great liking to the young man, which developed into a firm friendship which greatly influenced much of what has befallen me during my life, as the reader will see at the proper time and place. Balletti was highly gifted in his profession, but that was the least of his qualities. He was virtuous, his feelings were noble, he had gone to school and had received all the education that a well-born man in France can be given.

Not later than the third day I saw that Marina was trying to make Balletti fall in love with her, and realizing how useful this could be to her in Mantua, I resolved to help her. She had a post chaise with two seats, I easily persuaded her to take Balletti with her, for a reason which I could not tell her and which made it necessary for me not to arrive in Mantua with her, for it would be said that I was in love with her, and word of it would reach a quarter where I did not want it believed. Balletti agreed; but he insisted on paying half the hire for post horses, and Marina would not hear of it. I had the greatest difficulty in persuading Balletti to accept such a present from Marina, for the reasons he gave me were all excellent. I promised to wait for them for dinner and supper; so on the appointed day I set off an hour before them.

Reaching Cremona early, where we were to sup and spend the night, instead of waiting for them at the inn I went to while away the time at a coffeehouse. There I saw a French officer, who at once picked up an acquaintance with me. We having gone out together to stretch our legs a little, he stopped to speak to a charming woman who ordered her carriage to stop as soon as she saw him. After talking with her he rejoined me, and when I asked him who the beautiful lady was, he gave the following answer, which I think worthy of being recorded in history:

"You will not think me indiscreet in telling what I am about to tell, for the circumstance which you will learn is known to the whole city. The charming lady whom you have just seen has a rare wit, and here is an example of it. A young officer, one of several who were paying court to her when the Maréchal de Richelieu was in command at Genoa,[27] flattered himself that he was more in her favor than any of the others. One day in this same coffeehouse he advised one of his fellow officers not to spend his time courting her, as he would never have any success. The other told him to keep his advice for himself, since he had already obtained from her all that a lover could desire. The other answered that he was sure he was lying and told him to come outside. 'What is the use,' the blabber objected, 'of fighting a duel over a fact whose truth cannot depend on a duel? The Signora has made me perfectly happy, and if you do not believe me I will get her to tell you so herself.' The skeptic replied that he would wager twenty-five louis[28] that he would not get her to tell him so; and the self-styled happy lover having accepted the wager, they at once went to call on the lady whom you have just seen, who was to decide which of the two had won the twenty-five louis.

"They found her making her toilet.

"'A wager, Signora,' answered the skeptic, 'which you alone can decide. The Signore boasts that you have granted him the greatest favors to which a lover can aspire, I told him he was lying, and to avoid a duel he said that you would yourself tell me that he was not; I offered to wager him twenty-five louis that you would not admit it, and he has accepted. So now, Signora, decide.'

"'You have lost,' she answered, 'but I now ask you both to leave, and I warn you that if you ever set foot in my house again you will find a very bad reception.'

"The two young fools left, equally mortified; the skeptic paid; but, cut to the quick, he treated the winner in such a fashion that a week afterward he gave him a sword thrust from which he died. Ever since then the lady goes to the casino and everywhere; but she refuses to receive anyone in her house, where she lives on excellent terms with her husband."

"How did her husband take it?"

"He says that if his wife had declared the other the winner he would have obtained a divorce, for then no one would have doubted the fact."

"Her husband is intelligent. It is certain that if the lady had said that the one who had boasted had lied, he would have paid the wager; but he would have gone on amusing himself by saying he had had her favors, and everyone would have believed him. By declaring him the winner, she put a stop to that, and avoided the contrary opinion, which would have dishonored her. The braggart was doubly in the wrong, as the outcome proved, for he paid with his life; but the skeptic was very wrong too, for in matters of this sort good manners forbid wagers. If the man who bets on the affirmative is shameless, the one who bets on the negative is a great ninny. I am much taken with the lady's presence of mind."

"But what do you believe?"

"I believe she is innocent."

"I agree with you, and such is the general opinion. If you stay here tomorrow I will take you to the casino and you shall make her acquaintance."

I invited the officer to sup with us, and we found him most entertaining. After he left, Marina gave a proof of her intelligence which pleased me. She had ordered a separate room for herself, for she thought that her respectable dancing partner would take it ill if she slept with me.

As I had told Marina that I wanted to see her only occasionally in Mantua, she went to live in the quarters which the manager had provided for her, and Balletti went to his. I went to lodge at the Albergo della Posta, in the San Marco quarter.

The same day, having gone out too late to take a walk outside the city, I entered a bookstore to see if the bookseller might have anything new. Night having fallen, and seeing that I was making no move to leave, he says he wants to close his shop. I go out, and at the end of the arcade am stopped by a patrol. The officer tells me that as two o'clock (Italian time) had struck, and I had no lantern, he must take me to the guardpost. I vainly protest that since I had arrived only that day I did not know the laws of the city; he answers that it is his duty to put me under arrest, and I give in. He presents me to the captain, a tall, handsome young man,[29] who brightens up when he sees me. I ask him to send me to my inn, as I needed sleep, and my request sets him laughing. He answers that he will show me a very amusing night, and in good company, and orders my sword returned to me, saying that he wishes to consider me only a friend who is going to spend the night with him.

He gave some orders to a soldier, addressing him in German, and an hour later a table for four is laid, two officers arrive, and we have a gay supper. At dessert three or four other officers arrive, and a quarter of an hour later two disgusting prostitutes. What takes my interest is a small bank at faro which one of the officers makes. I punt, to do as the others were doing, and after losing a few zecchini I get up to take a breath of air, having drunk too much. One of the two whores lays hands on me, sets me laughing, I let her go on, I go on myself. After the sordid performance I return to the bank.

A very likable young officer who had lost fifteen or twenty ducati was swearing like a grenadier because the banker was picking up his money and ending the game. He had a quantity of gold coins in front of him, and he said that the banker should warn him that it was the last deal. I said politely that he was wrong, for faro was the freest of all games, at the same time asking him why he did not make the bank himself since he had so much gold in front of him. He answers that he would be bored because all these gentlemen punted too stingily; and he says with a smile that if it would amuse me I could make the bank myself. I ask the guard officer if he will go in for a fourth and, on his answering yes, I announce that I will make only six deals. I ask for new cards, I count out three hundred zecchini, and the officer writes "Good for a hundred zecchini, O'Neilan" on the back of a card and puts it on top of my money.

Well satisfied, the young officer jokingly says that my bank might well die before I could get to the sixth. I made no answer.

At the fourth deal my bank was at death's door; the young man was crowing. I rather surprised him by saying that I was delighted to lose, for when he was winning I found him much more likable. There are compliments which bring bad luck to those to whom they are addressed. Mine made him lose his head. At the fifth deal a flood of bad cards made him lose all he had won; and on the sixth he plunged, and lost all the gold he had before him. He asked me to give him his revenge the next day, and I answered that I played only when I was under arrest.

Counting my money, I found that I had won two hundred and fifty zecchini after giving his fourth to Captain O'Neilan, who made himself responsible for fifty zecchini which an officer named Laurent had lost on his word. At dawn he let me go.

When I woke I saw before me the same Captain du Laurent who had lost the fifty ducati to my bank. Thinking he had come to pay them, I said that he owed them to Signor O'Neilan. He answered that he knew it, and ended by asking me to lend him six zecchini on a note in which he would pledge his honor to repay me within a week. I agreed, and he wrote the note. He asked me to mention it to no one, and I gave him my word on condition that he would keep his.

The next morning I found that I was sick from the bad quarter of an hour I had spent with the whore at the guardpost on the Piazza San Pietro. I cured myself completely in six weeks simply by drinking a decoction of saltpeter, but at the same time observing a diet which I found extremely monotonous.

On the fourth day Captain O'Neilan paid me a visit; and I was surprised to see him laugh when I showed him the state in which I had been put by one of the prostitutes he had summoned to the guardpost.

"Then you must have been well," he said, "when you reached Mantua?"

"Never better."

"It is a pity you lost your health in such a sewer. If I had guessed what you were about, I would have warned you."

"Then you knew?"

"I had good reason to know, for it is only a week since I did the same thing with her, and I believe that at that time she was in good health."

"So it is to you that I owe the present she gave me?"

"It is nothing, and in any case you can be cured, if that entertains you."

"Aren't you entertaining yourself doing just that?"

"Not a bit of it. A diet would bore me to death. Besides, what's the use of curing a cl. .[30] when you're scarcely cured before you catch another? I went through that rigmarole ten times; but two years ago I resigned myself."

"I am sorry for you, because, with your presence, you are a man to have the greatest successes in love."

"What do I care about that? The effort they entail is much more of a burden than the slight inconvenience I put up with."

"I do not agree with you. The pleasure of love without love is flat. Do you think that ugly wench is worth the pain I am suffering at this moment?"

"And I am very sorry for it. I could have introduced you to some wenches who would be worth the trouble."

"There's not a wench in the world who is worth my health. Only love deserves that sacrifice."

"So you want women who are worthy to be loved; there are some such in this city. Stay here, and when you are cured you can hope to make conquests."

O'Neilan was twenty-three years of age, his father[31] had died with the rank of general, the beautiful Countess Borsati was his sister; he took me to see a Countess Zanardi Nerli, who was even more beautiful; but I burned incense to none of them. My condition humiliated me; I thought that no one was unaware of it.

I never met a more debauched young man than O'Neilan. I spent my nights with him, going from one house of ill fame to another; and he always astonished me by everything he did. When he found the place occupied by some townsman, he ordered him to hurry up, and if he made him wait he had him cudgeled by a manservant whom he kept for no other purpose than to carry out orders of this kind. He served him exactly as a mastiff serves an assassin by bringing down the man he means to kill. The poor lecher whom I saw treated in this fashion moved me to laughter rather than to pity. After thus disposing of him, he punished the whore by profaning the most essential of human acts with her; and then he left without paying her, laughing at her tears.

Despite all this O'Neilan was noble, generous, brave, and a man of honor.

"Why," I asked him, "don't you pay these wretched creatures?"

"Because I'd like to see them all dead from starvation."

"But what you do to them must convince them that you love them, and certainly a well-set-up man like yourself cannot but give them pleasure."

"Pleasure? I am certain that I give them none. Do you see this ring and this little spur on it?"

"Yes, I see it. What is it for?"

"To make them cavort by pricking them with it betwixt and between. Do you think that tickles them?"

One day he rides into the city at full gallop. An old woman who was crossing the street did not have time to get out of his way, and there she lies with her head split open; he submitted to arrest, but he was freed the next morning after proving that it was an unfortunate accident.

One morning we go to call on a lady and are waiting in the anteroom for her to get up. He sees ten or twelve dates on the harpsichord and eats them. The lady appears and a moment later asks the maid where her dates are; O'Neilan says he ate them; she is annoyed; she takes him to task. He asks her if she wants him to give them back, and she answers yes, thinking that he had them in his pocket. The shameless villain then makes a slight movement of his mouth and instantly vomits up the dates in front of her. She ran out of the room, and the rake did nothing but laugh. I have seen several other men who had the same ability, principally in England.

The officer who had given me the note for six zecchini had not come back to redeem it within the week and, meeting him one day in the street, I told him I no longer considered myself obliged to keep his secret; he answered rudely that he did not care. Deeming his answer an insult, I was considering how to obtain satisfaction for it when O'Neilan told me, as a piece of news, that Captain du Laurent had gone mad and had already been locked up. He recovered afterward; but his bad behavior resulted in his discharge.

O'Neilan, the brave O'Neilan, perished some years later at the Battle of Prague.[32] Being the man he was, he was bound to perish the victim either of Venus or of Mars. He might still be alive if his courage had been that of the fox, but his was the courage of the lion. In an officer this is a fault, in a soldier it is a virtue. Those who brave danger knowing what it is may deserve praise; but those who have no sense of it escape from it only by a miracle. Yet these great warriors deserve respect, for their indomitable courage springs from greatness of soul and from a virtue which sets them above humankind.

Every time I think of Prince Charles de Ligne[33] I weep. His courage was the courage of Achilles; but Achilles knew that he was invulnerable. He would still be alive if in battle he could have remembered that he was mortal. Who that knew him did not mourn at his death? He was handsome, gentle, polite, learned, a lover of the arts, gay, witty in conversation, and always unruffled. Fatal and infamous revolution! A cannon shot took him from his illustrious family, his friends, and his future glory.

So too Prince Waldeck[34] lost his arm because of his courage; I am told that he takes comfort in the fact that the loss of an arm cannot prevent him from commanding an army. O you who scorn life, tell me if you believe you are worthier of it for scorning it?

The opera began after Easter. I never missed a performance. I was completely cured. I was delighted to see that Balletti put Marina forward. I did not go to see her, but Balletti came to breakfast with me nearly every morning. As he often talked about an old actress who had been his father's mistress[35] and had retired from the stage twenty years since, his account of her character made me want to make her acquaintance.

Her clothes did not surprise me as much as her person. Despite her wrinkles she used powder and rouge; and she dyed her eyebrows black. She displayed one half of her flaccid bosom, which aroused disgust precisely because it showed what it might have been, and two rows of teeth which were obviously false. Her hair was nothing but a wig which adhered very imperfectly to her forehead and temples; and her shaking hands set mine shaking when she pressed them. She smelled of ambergris, as did the whole room, and the fawning in which she indulged to show me that she found me attractive very nearly overcame the effort I was making to keep from laughing. Her extremely elaborate attire was of a fashion which must have been outmoded twenty years earlier. I saw with terror the marks of hideous old age on a face which, before time had ruined it, must have made many a man a lover. But what put me in a sort of daze was the childish effrontery with which this relic of time played up her supposed attractions.

Balletti, who feared that my astonishment would offend her, said that what rendered me speechless was that time had not had power to lessen the beauty of the bright strawberry mark on her chest.

"That strawberry mark," said the matron with a smile, "is what gave me my name. I still am, and I shall always be, La Fragoletta."[36]

At that name I trembled.

The phantom before me was the cause of my existence. I saw the object whose magic had seduced my father thirty years earlier, the being but for whom he would never have left his father's house and never have begotten me on a Venetian woman. I have never shared the opinion of the antique writer who says that nemo vitam vellet si daretur scientibus ("no one would accept life if he knew what life is").[37]

Seeing me lost in thought, she politely asked Balletti what my name was; and seeing her surprised when she heard him say "Casanova,"

"Yes, Signora," I said, "and my father, whose name was Gaetano, was from Parma."

"What do I hear? What do I behold? I adored your father. Unjustly jealous, he abandoned me. But for that, you would have been my son. Let me embrace you like a mother."

I expected as much. Fearing she would fall, I went to her and submitted to her tender memories. Always the actress, she put a handkerchief to her eyes and pretended to wipe away her tears, saying that I must not doubt what she had told me, despite the fact that she did not look old enough for it to be true. She said that my father's only fault was ingratitude; and she was to find the same fault in his son, for despite all the obliging offers she made me I did not set foot in her house again.

Master of a purse full of gold, I resolved to leave Mantua in order to have the pleasure of seeing my dear Teresa, Donna Lucrezia, Don Gennaro Palo and his son Paolo, Don Antonio Casanova, and all my old acquaintances once again; but my Genius disapproved of my plan. I would have left three days later if I had not taken it into my head to go to the opera.

During the two months I spent in Mantua I can say that I lived wisely as a result of the folly which I committed on the first day I was there. I gambled only that one time, and I won; my lost health, which forced me to follow a regimen, perhaps saved me from the misfortunes which would have befallen me if I had not been entirely taken up with recovering it.

CHAPTER XI

1748.

AT THE opera I was approached by a young man who, without further introduction, told me that I was at fault, as a foreigner, in not having gone to see the natural history collection of his father Antonio de Capitani, commissary and presiding judge for canon law. I answered that if he would be so good as to call for me at the Albergo San Marco I would repair the omission and cease to be at fault. The canonical commissary turned out to be as strange an eccentric as I have ever encountered. His collection of rarities consisted in the genealogy of his family, books of magic, saints' relics, antediluvian coins, a model of Noah's Ark, numerous medals, including one of Sesostris[1] and one of Semiramis,[2] and an old knife[3] of a very curious shape and covered with rust. What he kept under lock and key was the paraphernalia of Freemasonry.

"Be so good as to tell me," I said, "what there is in common between natural history and your collection, for I see nothing which has any connection with the three kingdoms.''[4]

''What! Do you not see the antediluvian kingdom, the kingdom of Sesostris, and that of Semiramis?''

At this answer, I embraced him, whereupon he displays his erudition over each of his possessions, ending by telling me that the rusty knife was the one with which St. Peter had cut off Malek's[5] ear.

''You own this knife,[6] and you are not a very rich man?''

''How could the knife make me rich?''

''In two ways. First, by putting you in possession of all the hidden treasures in the territories belonging to the Church.''

''That follows, for St. Peter has the key to them.''

''God be praised. Secondly, by selling it to the Pope himself, if you have the chirographs which prove its authenticity.''

''You mean the certificate. I should not have bought it otherwise. I have all that.''

''Very good. To obtain this knife, I am certain that the Pope would make your son a cardinal; but he would want the sheath too.''

''I haven't it; but it is not needed. In any case, I will have one made.''

''It must be the very one in which St. Peter himself put the knife when God commanded him: Mitte gladium tuum in vaginam[7] (''Put up thy sword into the sheath''). It exists, and it is in the hands of someone who would sell it to you cheaply, unless you wish to sell him the knife, for the sheath without the knife is useless, as is your knife without the scabbard.''

''How much would the sheath cost me?''

''A thousand zecchini.''

''And what would he give me if I would sell him the knife?''

"A thousand zecchini."

The commissary looks at his son in amazement and asks him if he would ever have believed that anyone would offer him a thousand zecchini for his old knife. So saying, he opens a drawer and unfolds a document written in Hebrew on which there was a drawing of the knife. I pretend to be greatly impressed, and I advise him to buy the sheath.

"It is not necessary," he says, "either for me to buy the sheath or for your friend to buy the knife. We can dig up the treasures on half shares."

"Certainly not. The magistery demands that the owner of the knife in vaginam ['in its sheath'] be one person. If the Pope had it he could, by a magical operation of which I have knowledge, cut off one ear of any Christian king who tried to encroach on the rights of the Church."

"Very strange. It is true that the Gospel says St. Peter cut off somebody's ear."

"The ear of a king."

"Oh, not a king!"

"A king, I tell you. Inquire if Malek or Melek does not mean king."[8]

"And if I decided to sell my knife, who would give me the thousand zecchini?"

"I would. Five hundred in cash tomorrow, and the remaining five hundred in the form of a bill of exchange payable one month from date."

"That is what I call talking! Do me the honor to come and eat a dish of macaroni with us tomorrow, and we will discuss a very important matter with all the secrecy which it demands."

I accepted his invitation, and I went. The first thing he told me was that he knew where there was a treasure in the Papal State, so he would decide to buy the sheath. Certain that he would not believe me on my mere word, I took a purse from my pocket and showed him five hundred zecchini; but he replied that the treasure was worth millions. We sat down at table.

"You will not be served," he said, "on silver, but on dishes by Raffaello."[9]

"Signor Commissario, your munificence becomes your exalted rank. A fool would think that this was ugly earthenware."

"A man in very good circumstances," he told me after dinner, "who is domiciled in the Papal State, where he owns a country house in which he resides with his family, is certain that there is a treasure in his cellar. He has written to my son that he is prepared to spend whatever is necessary to obtain possession of it if he can find him a skillful magician capable of unearthing it."

The son then drew from his pocket a letter, several parts of which he read to me, asking me to excuse him for not giving me the whole letter to read, since he had promised secrecy; but without his noticing it I had already seen "Cesena," which was the name of the city from which it had been written.

"So the thing is," the canonical commissary resumed, "to arrange for me to buy the sheath on credit, for I have no ready money. You would risk nothing by endorsing my bills of exchange, for I own property; and if you know the magician you could go halves with him."

"The magician is all ready. It is myself; but if you do not begin by paying me five hundred zecchini in cash, we will proceed no further."

"I have no money."

"Then sell me the knife."

"No."

"You are making a mistake, for now that I have seen it I have the power to take it from you. However, I am too honest to want to play you such a trick."

"You have the power to take my knife? I should like to see proof of that, for I do not believe a word of it."

"Very well. Tomorrow you will no longer have it; but don't expect me to give it back to you. An elemental spirit which is at my command will bring it to me in my room at midnight, and the same spirit will tell me where the treasure is."

"Make him tell you, and you will convince me."

I thereupon called for pen and paper; I questioned my oracle in their presence, and I made it answer that the treasure was beside the Rubicon, but outside of the city. They did not know what the Rubicon[10] was; I told them it was a stream which had formerly been a river; they went for a dictionary, I saw that they were amazed when they found it was at Cesena. I then relieved them of my presence, to give them time to reason falsely. I had taken a fancy, not to steal five hundred zecchini from the poor fools, but to go with the young man and at his expense dig him up the treasure which the other fool at Cesena believed he had in his cellar. I could not wait to play the role of magician.

So when I left the good man's house I went to the public library,[11] where, with the help of a dictionary, I wrote the following piece of mock erudition: "The treasure is seventeen and one half fathoms underground, where it has lain for six centuries. Its value amounts to two million zecchini, and the treasure itself is contained in a wooden chest, the same which Godfrey of Bouillon[12] took from Matilda[13] Countess of Tuscany in the year 1081 when he came to help the Emperor Henry IV[14] to win his battle against that princess. He buried the chest where it is now before he went to besiege Rome. Gregory VII,[15] who was a great magician, having learned where the chest was buried, resolved to go and recover it in person; but death thwarted his plan. After the death of Countess Matilda in the year 1116, the Genius who presides over hidden treasures[16] set seven guards over it.

On a night when the moon is full a learned philosopher can bring it to the surface of the earth by standing in the Great Circle." [17]

The next day, as I expected, I see both the father and the son in my room. I give them the history of the treasure which I had composed, and at the height of their amazement I say that I am determined to recover the treasure, of which I offer them one fourth if they will buy the scabbard. Otherwise I again threaten them that I will take the knife. The commissary says that he will decide when he sees the sheath, and I undertake to show it to him the next day. They left well satisfied.

I spent the day putting together a sheath, and a more ridiculous one would be hard to find. I boiled the thick sole of a strong boot, and I made a slit in it which the knife could not fail to enter. Then by rubbing it with sand I gave it the proper look of antiquity. The commissary could not get over his astonishment when I went to see him the next morning and had him put the knife in it. We dined together, and after dinner we settled it that his son should go with me to introduce me to the owner of the house in which the treasure was; that I should receive a bill of exchange on Bologna for one thousand Roman scudi drawn to the order of his son; but that he would not make it over to my order until I had brought up the treasure; and that the knife in the sheath should not be put into my hands until I needed it to perform the great operation. Until then his son would keep it in his pocket.

We bound ourselves to these conditions by exchanging agreements in writing, and we stipulated that we should set out on the next day but one. When we set out the father blessed his son, at the same time telling me that he was a Count Palatine[18] and showing me the certificate issued by the reigning Pope.[19] I thereupon embraced him, addressing him as Count, and I received the bill of exchange.

After saying good-by to Marina, who had become Count Arconati's[20] mistress, and to Balletti, whom I was sure I should see at Venice the following year, I went to sup with my dear O'Neilan.

In the morning I took ship and traveled to Ferrara, and from there to Bologna and Cesena, where we lodged at the Albergo della Posta. Very early the next day we proceeded, on foot, to the house of Giorgio Francia, a rich peasant and the owner of the treasure, who lived a quarter of a mile outside the city and was not expecting such a fortunate visit. He embraced Capitani, whom he knew, and, leaving me with his family, went off to discuss the business with him.

The first thing I noticed, which I instantly recognized as my treasure, was the man's elder daughter. I saw her ugly younger sister, a booby of a son, a wife who ruled the roost, and three or four serving-women.

When the elder daughter, the one who attracted me at once, and who was named Genoveffa, like almost all the peasant women of Cesena, heard me say that she must be eighteen, she answered very seriously that she was only fourteen. The house had an excellent exposure and was isolated for a distance of four hundred paces in every direction. I saw with pleasure that I should be well lodged there. What troubled me was a stinking exhalation, which could not but infect the air. I ask Francia's wife where the stench comes from, and she answers that it is the smell of hemp being macerated.

"How much is your hemp worth?"

"Forty scudi."

"Here they are. The hemp is mine, and I will tell your husband to have it taken far away."

My companion called me, and I went down. Francia treated me with the respect he would have shown to a great magician, even though I did not look like one. We agreed that he should have one fourth of the treasure, the second fourth would belong to Capitani, and the remaining two fourths to me. I told him that I needed a room to myself with two beds and an antechamber in which there must be a tub for bathing. Capitani must be lodged at the opposite end of the house from mine, and in my room I must have three tables, two small and one large. In addition I ordered him to procure me a virgin seamstress between fourteen and fifteen years old. The girl must keep the secret, as must all the people in the house, for if the Inquisition[21] learned what we were about, all would be lost. I said that I would come to lodge with him the next day, that I ate two meals a day, and drank no wine but Sangiovese.[22] For breakfast, I would bring my own chocolate with me. I promised to pay him whatever expense he incurred if I failed in my attempt. The last order I gave him was to have the hemp taken away and to purge the air the same day with gunpowder. I told him to find a trustworthy man to go to the Albergo della Posta early the next morning and fetch all our luggage. He was to have a hundred candles and three torches at my disposition in the house.

We had not gone a hundred steps before Francia comes running after me to give me back the forty scudi I had given his wife for the hemp. I would not take them until he assured me that he was certain to sell it the same day for the same price. At this behavior on my part the man conceived the greatest respect for me, which became even greater when, despite Capitani, I refused the hundred zecchini he wanted to give me to pay for my journey. I saw that he was delighted when I said that on the eve of acquiring a treasure one does not even consider such trifles. The next morning we found that we were very well lodged, with all our paraphernalia at hand.

Dinner having been too copious, I told him to economize and give me only some good fresh fish for supper. After supper he came and said that he had consulted with his wife and that I could be sure of his daughter

Genoveffa. After telling him to come back with her, I asked him what grounds he had for believing that he had a treasure in his house.

"In the first place," he replied, "the tradition handed down by word of mouth from father to son for eight generations. In the second place, the loud knocking underground which goes on all night. Thirdly, my cellar door opening and shutting by itself every three or four minutes, which is the work of demons we see moving about the countryside every night in the form of pyramidal flames."

"If all this is so, it is as sure as that two and two make four that you have a treasure in your house. God preserve you from putting a lock on the door which opens and shuts, you would have an earthquake which would open an abyss in the same spot, for the spirits want to be able to go in and out freely to attend to their affairs."

"Thank God that a learned man whom my father brought here forty years ago said the same thing. Great man that he was, he needed only three more days to bring up the treasure, when my father learned that the agents of the Inquisition were about to take him. He got him out of the way in a hurry. Tell me, please, why magic cannot resist the Inquisition."

"Because the monks have more devils in their service than we have. I am sure that your father had already spent a great deal with that learned man."

"Two thousand scudi or very nearly."

"More, more."

I told them to follow me; and to do something by way of magic, I dipped a napkin in water, and uttering frightful words in no known language, I washed their eyes, their temples, and their chests, though Genoveffa might not have surrendered hers to me if I had not begun with her father's hairy one. I made them swear, on a portfolio which I took from my pocket, that they had no impure diseases, and Genoveffa that she had her maidenhead. Since she blushed very red as she swore it, I was so cruel as to explain to her what the word "maidenhead" meant, and I was delighted when, telling her to repeat her oath, she said, blushing even more deeply, that she knew what it was and so did not need to swear over again. I ordered them to give me a kiss, and having smelled an insufferable stench of garlic coming from my dear Genoveffa's mouth, I instantly forbade it to them. Giorgio assured me that there would be no more of it in his house.

Genoveffa was not a perfect beauty so far as her face was concerned, for she was tanned and her mouth was too big; but her teeth were fine and her lower lip protruded in a way which made it seem intended to gather kisses. She had begun to interest me when, in washing her chest, I found that her breasts were of a firmness of which I had no conception. She was also too blonde, and her hands were too fleshy to appear soft, but I was prepared to overlook all that. My plan was not to make her fall in love with me, for that would have taken too long with a peasant girl, but to make her obedient and submissive. I decided to make her feel ashamed of showing any antagonism, and thus to assure myself of encountering no opposition. In default of love, the chief thing in undertakings of this kind is submissiveness. Grace, vice, and ecstasy are sure to be wanting; but their absence is almost made up for by the exercise of absolute domination. I told them that each of them was to sup with me in turn, the eldest first, and that Genoveffa would always sleep in my anteroom, where there would be a tub in which I would bathe my guest an hour before he sat down at table and that he must be fasting.

I gave Francia a written list of all the things he was to buy for me in Cesena the next day, but without haggling. They were a piece of white linen twenty or thirty ells long costing eight or ten zecchini, thread, a pair of scissors, needles, storax, myrrh, sulphur, olive oil, camphor, a ream of paper, pens, ink, twelve sheets of parchment, fine paintbrushes, an olive branch which could be made into a staff a foot and a half long.

Delighted with the role of magician which I was about to play, and in which I had not thought that I was so well versed, I went to bed. The next morning I ordered Capitani to go to the principal coffeehouse in Cesena every day, to listen to what people might be saying so that he could report it to me. Francia came back before noon with all the things I had ordered him to get. He assured me he had not haggled, and that the shopkeeper who had sold him the cloth would certainly go about saying that he was drunk, for he had paid at least six scudi more for it than it was worth. I told him to send me his daughter and to leave me alone with her.

I had her cut four pieces six feet long, two two feet long, and a seventh two and a half feet long to make the hood of the surplice I needed [23] for the great conjuration. I ordered her to sit down near my bed and start sewing.

"You will eat dinner here," I said, "and stay here until evening. When your father arrives you will leave us; but you will come back to sleep here after he goes."

So she ate dinner beside my bed, where her mother served her all the things I sent her, and drank only Sangiovese wine. Toward evening when her father arrived, she disappeared.

I had the patience to bathe the good man in the tub and to sit with him at the supper table, where he ate like a wolf, assuring me that it was the first time in his life he had gone twenty-four hours without eating. Drunk on Sangiovese wine, he slept until his wife appeared, bringing me my chocolate. His daughter came and sewed until evening,[24] then disappeared on the arrival of Capitani, whom I treated as I had treated Francia. The next day was Genoveffa's turn. I had awaited it with the greatest impatience.

At the appointed hour I told her to get into the tub, and to call me when she had done so, because I had to bathe her as I had bathed her father and Capitani. She went off at once without answering me, and called me a quarter of an hour later. I went to the end of the tub, looking as gentle and as serious as possible. She was on her side; I told her to lie on her back and to look at me while I pronounced the formula for the rite. She obeyed with perfect docility, and I washed her all over, in every position. As I had to give a faultless performance in my role, I found it more trying than enjoyable, and she must have found it no less trying to display indifference and to conceal the emotion which must have been aroused in her by my hand which kept washing her just where she must have felt its touch more acutely than anywhere else. I made her get out of the bath to dry her; and it was then that my zeal to do the thing properly ordered her to assume postures which very nearly made me step out of my role. A modicum of relief which I contrived to give myself at a moment when she could not see me having calmed me, I told her to get dressed.

As she was fasting she ate with a ravenous appetite, and the Sangiovese wine which she drank like water heated her so much that I no longer saw she was tanned. As soon as we were alone I asked her if she had disliked what I had made her do and she answered that, on the contrary, she had enjoyed it.

"Then I hope," I said, "that tomorrow you won't mind getting into the bath after I do, and washing me as I have washed you."

"I'll be glad to; but how will I know what to do?"

"I will tell you, and in future you will sleep in my room every night, for I must make certain that on the night of the great operation you are still a virgin."

After this announcement, Genoveffa began to be at ease with me, she looked at me with assurance, she often smiled, and she showed no more embarrassment. She went to bed, and having nothing more which could be new to me, she did not need to overcome any feeling of modesty. To offset the heat, she stripped naked, and she went to sleep. I did likewise, but feeling sorry that I had undertaken not to make the great sacrifice until the night on which I was to bring up the treasure. The operation would fail, I knew; but I knew that it would not fail because I had failed to take her maidenhead.

Genoveffa got up very early and set to work. When she had finished the surplice she spent the rest of the day making me a parchment crown with seven points, on which I painted terrifying characters.

An hour before supper I got into the tub, she came in as soon as I told her it was time, and she performed the same ablutions on me which I had performed on her the evening before, and with the same zeal and the same gentleness, giving me the same tokens of the most ardent affection. I passed a charming hour, during which I respected only the sanctuary. Having been kissed all over, she thought she should do as much for me when she found that I did not forbid it.

"I am delighted," I said, "to see that you are taking pleasure in all this. Know, my dear child, that the perfect success of our operation hangs upon nothing but the pleasure you can obtain from my presence, without the slightest constraint."

So instructed, she completely surrendered to nature, doing unbelievable things to convince me that the pleasure she experienced was beyond expression. Despite abstaining from the forbidden fruit, we feasted sufficiently to be able to sit down at table thoroughly pleased with each other. It was she who, as she was going to her bed, asked me if our sleeping together would ruin the undertaking. She came joyously into my arms when I answered that it would not, and we went at it until love itself demanded sleep. I had occasion to admire the richness of her temperament in her wonderful inventiveness.

I spent most of the following night with Francia and Capitani observing with my own eyes the phenomena of which the peasant had told me. Standing on the balcony which gave on the courtyard of the house, I heard the door opening and shutting every three or four minutes by itself, I heard subterranean knockings which followed one another regularly at the rate of three or four a minute. The sound was like that which would be made by a great bronze pestle pounded into a mortar of the same material. Taking my pistols, I stationed myself by the moving door with a lantern in my hand. I saw the door open slowly and thirty seconds later shut with a bang. I opened and closed it myself, and finding no hidden physical reason for the strange phenomenon, I decided that some trickery was afoot. I took care not to say so.

Back on the balcony again, I saw shadows coming and going in the courtyard. It could only be masses of dense, humid air; and as for the pyramidal flames which I saw gliding about the countryside, they were a phenomenon with which I was already acquainted. I let them go on believing that they were spirits guarding the treasure. The whole countryside of southern Italy is full of will-o'-the-wisps which the common people take to be devils. This is the origin of the name spirito folletto.[25]

It was at night . . .[26]

Volume Three

CHAPTER I

I attempt my magical operation. A terrible storm comes up. My fear. Genoveffa remains pure. I give up, and sell the sheath to Capitani. I meet Giulietta again, with the pretended Count Celi, now Count Alfani. I decide to go to Naples. What puts me on a different road.

the 23rd of my age.

IT WAS on the next night that I was to perform the great operation, for otherwise we should have had to wait for the full moon of the following month. I was supposed to compel the gnomes to bring the treasure to the surface at the place where I would put my conjurations on them. I knew that the operation would fail, but that it would be easy for me to explain the reason; meanwhile I must continue to give a flawless performance in my role of magician, which I very much enjoyed. I made Genoveffa work all day at sewing together a circle of thirty sheets of paper on which I had painted characters and terrifying figures in black. This "Great Circle,"[2] as I called it, had a diameter of three paces. I had made a sort of scepter from the olive branch which Giorgio Francia had brought me. So, having everything I needed, I warned Genoveffa that at midnight, when I came out of the circle, she must be ready for anything. She could not wait to give me such a proof of her obedience; but that did not lessen my feeling that I was still in her debt.

So, having instructed her father Giorgio and Capitani to station themselves on the balcony, not only to be ready to carry out my orders if I called to them but also to prevent the household from seeing what I was about to do, I take off all my profane garments; I put on the great surplice which had been touched only by the pure hands of the innocent Genoveffa; then I let my long hair hang loose, I set the seven-pointed crown on my head and take the great circle on my shoulders, and with one hand holding the scepter and the other the very knife with which St. Peter once cut off Malek's ear, I go down to the courtyard and, after spreading out my circle on the ground and walking around it three times, I jump into it.

After crouching inside it for two or three minutes, I rise and stand motionless, watching a heavy black cloud which was coming up on the western horizon while thunder rumbled violently in the same direction. How I should have been admired if I had dared to predict it! The lightning grew more frequent as the cloud ascended, leaving the celestial vault without a glimmer of light; that from the lightning was enough to make the terrible darkness brighter than day.

As all this was perfectly natural, I had no reason to be surprised at it; nevertheless a beginning of terror made me wish I were in my room, and I began to shudder when I heard and saw the thunder and lightning which were following one another with the greatest rapidity. The flashes, which were all about me, froze my blood. In the terror which overtook me I persuaded myself that if the flashes of lightning I saw did not strike me down it was because they could not enter the circle. For this reason I did not dare leave it and take to my heels. But for my false belief, which was only the product of fear, I should not have remained in the circle for as long as a minute, and my flight would have convinced Capitani and Francia that, far from being a magician, I was an utter coward. The force of the wind, its frightful howling, my fear, and the cold combined to set me shaking like a leaf. My philosophical system, which I thought was proof against any assault, was gone. I recognized an avenging God who had lain in wait for me there to punish me for all my misdeeds and thus end my unbelief by death. What convinced me that my repentance was of no avail was that I absolutely could not move.

But now down comes the rain, I hear no more thunder, I see no more lightning, I feel my old courage reborn. But what a rain! It was a torrent falling from the sky through the air, which would have flooded everything if it had lasted for more than a quarter of an hour. When the rain ended both the wind and the darkness were gone. High in the absolutely cloudless sky I saw the moon, more beautiful than ever. I gathered up my circle, and after ordering Capitani and Francia to go to bed without speaking to me, I went to my room, where one glance showed me Genoveffa looking so beautiful that she frightened me. I let her dry me off without looking at her, and then in piteous tones told her to get into her bed. She said in the morning that, seeing me shivering despite the heat of the season, she had felt afraid for me.

After sleeping for eight hours I was sick of the comedy. When Genoveffa appeared I was astonished that she seemed a different person. She no longer seemed to be of a different sex from mine, since I no longer felt that mine was different from hers. At the moment an idea whose superstitiousness took nothing from its power made me believe that the girl's innocence was protected and that I should be struck dead if I dared to assail it. In the resolve which I made I had no other thought than that her father Francia would be less gulled and she less unhappy, unless, that is, the same thing happened to her which had happened to poor Lucia at Pasiano.

As soon as Genoveffa became an object of sacred terror in my eyes I determined to leave immediately. What made my resolve irrevocable was a panic yet very reasonable terror. Some peasants might have seen me in the circle and, convinced that the storm had been the effect of my magical operation, might go and accuse me to the Inquisition,[3] which would lose no time in seizing my person. Shaken by the possibility, which would have destroyed me, I sent for Francia and Capitani and told them in Genoveffa's presence that I had to put off the operation because of an agreement I had made with the seven gnomes who guarded the treasure, of which they had given me as full an account as I could wish. I left it with Francia in writing, drawn up in the following terms, and the same as the one I had given Capitani in Mantua:

"The treasure which lies here at seventeen and one half fathoms underground has been there for six centuries. It consists of diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, and a hundred thousand pounds of powdered gold. All this is contained in one chest, which is the same one which Godfrey of Bouillon took from Matilda Countess of Tuscany in the year 1081, when he went to help the Emperor Henry IV win his battle against that princess.[4] He buried the chest where it now is before he went to besiege Rome. Gregory VII,[5] who was a great magician, having learned where the chest was buried, determined to go and recover it in person; but he died before he could carry out his plan. In the year 1116, immediately upon the death of the Countess Matilda, the gnome who is the Genius presiding over hidden treasures gave it seven guardians."

After giving him this document I made him swear to wait for me, or to believe no one who did not give him an account of the treasure exactly like the one I was leaving him. I had the crown and the circle burned, ordering him to keep the other things until I should return, and I sent Capitani to Cesena at once to wait at the Albergo della Posta for the man whom Francia would send him with all our baggage.

Seeing that Genoveffa was inconsolable, I took her aside and assured her that she would see me soon. Some scruples of conscience made me feel obliged to tell her that, since her innocence was no longer necessary to the raising of the treasure, she was under no further obligation and was free to marry if the opportunity arose.

I went on foot to Cesena and to the inn, where I found Capitani ready to return to Mantua after having visited the fair at Lugo.[6] He shed tears as he told me that his father would be in despair when he saw him come back without St. Peter's knife. I gave it to him, and offered him the sheath as well if he would buy it for the 500 Roman scudi stipulated in the bill of exchange he had given me; and considering it a very good bargain he agreed at once and I gave him back the bill. I made him sign an agreement by which he undertook to return my sheath to me whenever I sent him the same sum of 500 Roman scudi.[7]

I had no use for the sheath, and no need of money; but I thought that to let him have it for nothing would dishonor me and give him an idea that I set no value on it. Chance decreed that we should not see each other until long afterward and when I was not able to give him the 250 zecchini.[8] So, as it turned out, my escapade made me the richer by that amount, while at the same time it never entered Capitani's head to complain or to believe that I had gulled him; for, with the sheath in his possession, he believed that he was master of all the treasures which might be hidden in all the Papal States.

Capitani left the next day, and for my part I would have set off for Naples without losing any time, had not something immediately happened which caused me to put off following my plan.

The innkeeper handed me a printed bill announcing four public performances of Metastasio's Didone[9] at the Teatro Spada.[10] Reading the names of the actresses and actors and seeing that none of them is known to me, I decide to wait and see the first performance and to leave at dawn the next morning by the post. A nagging fear of the Inquisition still urged me to be off, and I felt that I already had spies on my track.

I enter the theater before the opera begins and see the actresses dressing, and the leading lady strikes me as most attractive. She was from Bologna and went by the name of Narici.[11] After making her a bow I ask her if she is at liberty; she answers that her only engagement is to the managers, Rocco and Argenti. I ask her if she has a lover, she answers that she has not; for politeness' sake I offer myself; she laughs at me and invites me to subscribe two zecchini for four tickets to the four performances. I give her two zecchini, I take the four tickets, and I give them to the girl who was dressing her hair and who was prettier than she was. After that I leave; she calls me back, and I pay no attention. I go to the door; I take a parterre ticket, and go and sit down. After the first ballet, having found everything bad, I am thinking of leaving, when to my great astonishment I see in the principal box the Venetian Manzoni[12] with Giulietta, "La Cavamacchie," whom my reader may remember. Seeing that I am not noticed, I ask the man beside me the name of the beautiful lady who shone more than her diamonds. He answers that she is Signora Querini, a Venetian lady, whom General Count Bonifazio Spada,[13] the owner of the theater, whom I saw beside her, had brought from Bologna and from Faenza, her native city. Delighted to learn that Signor Querini had finally married her, I have no thought of approaching her. I should have had to address her as "Your Excellency," I did not wish to be known; then, too, I might be badly received. The reader may remember our falling out when she made me dress her as an abate.

But at the very moment when I am leaving she sees me and beckons to me with her fan. I go to her and say in a whisper that, as I do not wish to be known, I am using the name of Farussi.[14] Signor Manzoni likewise whispers to me that I am speaking to Signora Querini. I tell him that I knew it from a letter I had received from Venice.

Giulietta, who is waiting for me, instantly creates me a baron and presents me to Count Spada. The nobleman invites me into his box, and after inquiring whence I had come and where I was going asks me to supper.

Ten years earlier[15] he had been Giulietta's lover in Vienna, at the time when the Empress Maria Theresa, seeing the bad influence exercised by her charms, had turned her out. She had later renewed her acquaintance with him in Venice, where she had induced him to take her to visit Bologna; Signor Manzoni, her erstwhile fancy man, who told me all this, was traveling with her so that he could certify her good conduct to Signor Querini. At Venice she tried to make everyone believe that he had married her secretly; but fifty leagues from home she did not feel constrained to secrecy. The General had already announced her as Signora Querini Papozze[16] to the entire nobility of Cesena. In any case, Signor Querini would have been wrong to be jealous of the General, for it was an old acquaintance. Women maintain that any current lover who says he is jealous of an old acquaintance must be an utter fool. Giulietta had quickly called me over, fearing that I would be indiscreet; but seeing that I must be equally afraid that she would be so, she felt reassured. I at once began to treat her with all the respect which was due to her rank.

I found a large company at the General's, and some quite pretty women. I look in vain for Giulietta; Signor Manzoni tells me she is at the faro table, where she is losing her money. I go there and see her sitting at the left of the banker, who, seeing me, turns pale. It was the self-styled Count Celi.[17] He immediately offers me cards,[18] which I politely refuse, at the same time accepting Giulietta's offer to go halves with her. She had fifty zecchini in front of her. I give her another fifty and take a place beside her. At the end of the deal she asks me if I know the banker, and I see that he has heard her; I answer no, and the lady who was seated on my left tells me that he is Count Alfani. A half hour later Signora Querini, who was losing, had a sept et le va[19] for ten zecchini; it was crucial. I rise and fix my eyes on the banker's hands; but it makes no difference: he cheats, and the Signora loses her card. Just then the General comes to take her to supper, and she stops, leaving the rest of her money on the table. At dessert she returns to the game and loses it all.

The amusing stories with which I enlivened supper gained me everyone's friendship, but especially that of the General, who, having heard me say that I was only going to Naples to satisfy an amorous fancy, begged me to spend a month with him instead; but in vain for, my heart being empty, I could not wait to be with Teresa and Donna Lucrezia, whose charming faces I could only remember dimly after five years. However, I consented to remain in Cesena to pay my respects to him for the four days he had decided to stay there.

The next morning while my hair was being dressed, I see the swindler Alfani. I receive him with a smile, saying that I expected him. He does not answer, for the hairdresser is there; but no sooner is he gone than he asks me what reason I could have to expect him.

"My reasons were probabilities which you shall hear at length after giving me back a hundred zecchini this instant."

"Here are fifty. You cannot ask more."

"I accept them on account; but warning you out of the kindness of my heart not to come to the General's this evening, for you will not be admitted, and the company will have me to thank for it."

"I hope that before you do anything so malicious you will think it over."

"I have already thought it over. Now go, and quickly."

What may also have made him leave was a visit from the first castrato of the opera, who came to ask me to dine at La Narici's. The invitation having set me laughing, I accepted it. His name was Niccolò Peretti,[20] he claimed to be descended from a natural son of Sixtus V. We shall speak of this mountebank, whom I met again in London fifteen years later, when we come to that time.

Arriving at La Narici's for dinner, I see Count Alfani, who certainly did not expect to see me there. He at once asked me to let him speak with me in private.

"If I give you another fifty zecchini," he said, "as a man of honor you cannot take them except to give them to Signora Querini, and you cannot give them to her without telling her that you made me give them back to you. You see what the consequences will be."

"I will give them back to her when you are no longer here; in the meanwhile I will be discreet; but take care that you do not improve upon fortune in my presence, for I will do you a bad turn."

"Double my bank, and you shall have a half share."

His proposal made me laugh. He gave me the fifty zecchini, and I promised to say nothing. The company at La Narici's was largely made up of young men, who after dinner lost all their money. I did not play. She had invited me only because she thought I was of the same stamp as the others. Remaining a spectator, I saw how wise Mohammed was in forbidding games of chance in his Koran.

After the opera he made the bank, and I played and lost two hundred zecchini; but I had nothing to complain of except fortune. Signora Querini won. The next day before supper I almost broke his bank; and after supper I went to bed.

The next morning, which was my last day, I learned at the General's that his Adjutant had thrown the cards in his face and was to meet him at midday somewhere to receive or give him a sword thrust. I went to his room to offer him my company, assuring him at the same time that no blood would be shed. He thanked me; and when I came to dinner he told me with a laugh that I had prophesied rightly. Count Alfani had left for Rome. I promised the distinguished company that I would make a bank for them myself. But this is what Signora Querini answered me when, taking her aside, I tried to give her the fifty zecchini which in honor I owed her, after telling her how I had made the scoundrel return them to me.

"By means of this fairy tale," she said, "you wish to make me a present of fifty zecchini; but permit me to tell you that I do not need your money, and besides I am not such a fool as to let myself be cheated."

Philosophy forbids the wise man to repent of having performed a good action; but he is at liberty to regret it when a malevolent interpretation makes it appear a bad one.

After the opera, of which this was the last performance, I dealt at the General's, as I had promised to do, and I lost a little; but I was liked. That is sweeter than to win, when need does not drive the player to be on the watch for money.

Count Spada invited me to go to Brisighella[21] with him, but to no avail, for I could not wait to set off for Naples. I promised him I would pay him my respects again the next day at dinner.

The next morning at daybreak I am awakened by an extraordinary uproar in the public room and almost at the door of my bedroom. A minute later I hear the noise in the room next to mine. I get out of bed and quickly open my door to see what is going on. I see a troop of sbirri[22] at the open door of the room and in the room I see a decent-looking man sitting up in bed and shouting in Latin at the ruffians and at the innkeeper, who was there and who had dared to open his door for them. I ask the innkeeper what it was all about.

"This gentleman," he answers, "who apparently speaks only Latin, is in bed with a young woman, and the Bishop's constables have come to find out if she is his wife. It is perfectly simple: if she is, he has only to prove it to them by some certificate, and the thing will be over; but if she is not, he must put up with going to prison with the girl; but that won't happen to him, for I will undertake to patch the matter up for two or three zecchini. I will speak to their captain, and they will all go away. If you speak Latin, go in and make him see reason."

"Who forced the door of his room?"

"It was not forced; I opened it myself; it is my duty."

"It is the duty of a highway robber."

Surprised by such infamous proceedings, I cannot refrain from interfering. I enter, and I tell the man in the nightcap all the circumstances of the intrusion. He answers, with a laugh, that in the first place no one could know if whoever was in bed with him was a girl, for the person had been seen only in male attire, and that in the second place he considered that no one on earth had the right to force him to declare whether it was his wife or his mistress, always supposing that the person in bed with him was indeed a woman.

"Furthermore," he said, "I am determined not to spend a single paolo[23] to end the matter, and not to get out of bed until my door has been shut. As soon as I have dressed I will show you a pretty ending to this comedy. I will send all these robbers running with my saber."

I then see in the corner of the room a saber and a Hungarian coat which looked as if it belonged to a uniform. I ask him if he is an officer, and he answers that he had written his name and rank in the innkeeper's register. Absolutely astounded at this extraordinary state of affairs, I question the inkeeper,[24] who says that it is true, but that the ecclesiastical tribunal nevertheless had the right to inquire into any scandalous conduct.

"The insult you have just offered this officer," I tell him, "will cost you dear."

In answer to my threat they all laughed in my face. Much annoyed at being mocked by such riffraff, I ask the officer if he dares entrust his passport to me; he says that, since he has two, he can very well entrust me with one of them and, so saying, he takes it from a portfolio and hands it to me to read. It was from Cardinal Albani.[25] I see the officer's name and his rank as captain in a Hungarian regiment of the Empress-Queen. He tells me that he has come from Rome and is on his way to Parma to deliver to Monsieur Dutillot,[26] Prime Minister of the Infante the Duke of Parma, a package entrusted to him by Cardinal Alessandro Albani.

Just then a man enters the room asking me to tell the Signore in Latin that he wished to leave at once and had not time to wait for him; so that he should either settle matters with the constables immediately or pay him. He was the vetturino.[27]

Seeing it was obviously a plot, I asked the officer to leave the whole matter to me, assuring him that I would bring him off with honor. He told me to do whatever I pleased. I told the vetturino that he had only to bring up the Signore's trunk and he would receive his money. He brought up the trunk and received the eight zecchini from my hands, giving a receipt to the officer, who spoke only German, Hungarian, and Latin. The vetturino left at once; and the sbirri likewise, in great alarm, except for two, who remained in the public room.

I then advised the officer not to get out of bed until I returned. I said that I was going to the Bishop to tell him that he owed him the most complete satisfaction, and he had no doubt of it when I told him that General Spada was in Cesena; he answered that he knew him, and that if he had known he was there he would have blown out the innkeeper's brains for opening the door of his room to the sbirri. I quickly put on my redingote and not stopping to undo my curl-papers I went to the Bishop's palace and, raising a row, was conducted to the Bishop's room. A lackey told me he was still in bed; but not having time to wait I go in and I tell the prelate the whole story, exclaiming over the iniquity of such proceedings and railing at a police force which violated the law of nations.

He does not answer me. He calls, and orders me taken to the Chancellor's room.

I repeat the facts to the Chancellor, not measuring my words[28] and using a style calculated to irritate and not to gain favors. I threaten; I say that if I were the officer I would demand exemplary satisfaction. The priest smiles and, after asking me if I have a fever, tells me to go and talk with the captain of the sbirri.

Delighted that I had irritated him and so brought the matter to the point where only the authority of General Spada could, and must, end it to the honor of the insulted officer and the confusion of the Bishop, I go to the General's. I am told that he cannot be seen until eight o'clock, and I return to the inn.

The ardor with which I had embraced the affair appeared to spring from my innate sense of decency, which could not bear to see a foreigner treated in such a fashion; but what made me so hot in it was a far stronger motive. I imagined that the girl in bed beside him was very attractive; I could not wait to see her face. Shame had never permitted her to expose her head. She had heard me, and I was sure that I had made a good impression on her.

As the door of the room was still open, I enter and give the officer an account of all that I had done, assuring him that in the course of the same day he would be free to leave at the Bishop's expense, after receiving complete satisfaction at the behest of the General. I say that I cannot see him until eight o'clock. He expresses his gratitude; he tells me that he will not leave until the next day, and he pays me the eight zecchini I had given the vetturino. I ask him of what nationality his traveling companion was, and he answers that the person is French and understands no language but his own.

"Then you speak French?"

"Not a word."

"That's odd. Then you never talk to each other except by gestures?"

"Exactly."

"I am sorry for you. May I hope to breakfast with you?"

"Ask him if he wishes it."

So I address my request to him, and I see a tousled head appear from under the covers, revealing a smiling, fresh, attractive face which leaves me in no doubt of its sex, though the hair is cut like a man's.

Enchanted by the lovely apparition, I say that having taken up her cause without seeing her, the sight of her could only have increased my eagerness to be of use to her and my zeal. She refutes my reasoning as prettily as possible and with all the wit of her nation. I go out to order coffee and to give her time to sit up; for it had been settled that neither of them would get out of bed so long as the door of their room remained open.

The waiter having come, I go back, and I see the Frenchwoman in a blue redingote and with her hair awkwardly arranged like a man's. I am surprised by her beauty and sigh for the moment when I shall see her up. She drank coffee with us, never interrupting the officer, who was talking to me and to whom I did not listen in the ecstasy into which I was thrown by the face of this creature who did not look at me and whom the pudor infans ("silent shame")[29] of my dear Horace kept from uttering a single word.

At eight o'clock I go to the General's and I tell him the circumstances, exaggerating as much as possible. I say that if he does not deal with the situation, the officer considered that he must send an express to his patron the Cardinal. But my eloquence was not needed. Count Spada, after reading the officer's passport, said that, comedy though it was, he would treat it as a matter of the gravest importance. He ordered his Adjutant to go to the posthouse inn at once and invite the officer to dinner together with his companion, whose sex no one had been able to discover; and then to go and inform the Bishop officially that the officer would not leave until he had obtained whatever satisfaction he wished and whatever sum of money he considered proper as damages.

How I enjoyed witnessing this gratifying scene, of which, filled with justifiable vanity, I considered myself the author!

The Adjutant, preceded by me, waits on the Hungarian officer, gives him back his passport, and invites him to dinner with his companion; then tells him to put in writing the kind of satisfaction he wishes and what sum he asks in recompense for the time he has lost. I hurried to my room to provide him with ink and paper; and the brief document, in passable Latin for a Hungarian, was ready at once. The sbirri had vanished. The good Captain would ask for only thirty zecchini, despite all that I said to persuade him to ask for a hundred. On the score of satisfaction he was also too lenient. He insisted only upon seeing the innkeeper and all the sbirri asking his pardon together on their knees in the public room and in the presence of the General's Adjutant. Otherwise, if this was not done within two hours, he would send an express to Rome to Cardinal Alexander and would remain in Cesena until the answer came, with the Bishop paying his expenses at the rate of ten zecchini a day.

The Adjutant set off at once to take the document to the Bishop. A moment later in comes the innkeeper to tell the officer that he is free; but he left as fast as his legs could carry him when the officer told him he owed him a caning. After that I left them and went to my room to have my hair dressed and to change my clothes, as I was to dine with them at the General's. An hour later I saw them before me, well dressed in uniform. The lady's was simulated, and very elegant.

It was at this moment that I decided to leave for Parma with them. The girl's beauty reduced me to slavery on the spot. Her lover appeared to be sixty years of age; I thought their union very incongruous; and I imagined that I could settle everything amicably.

The Adjutant came back with a priest from the Bishop's palace, who told the officer that he would have all the satisfaction he desired in half an hour; but that he must be content with fifteen zecchini, since the journey to Parma took only two days. The officer answered that he would reduce none of his demands, and he was given the thirty zecchini, for which he refused to sign a receipt. So the matter was settled, and the welcome victory having been the fruit of my efforts, it gained me the unalloyed friendship of the couple. To see that the girl was not a man one had only to examine her figure. Any woman who thinks she is beautiful because, when she is dressed as a man, everyone takes her for a man, is not a beautiful woman.

When, toward the dinner hour, we entered the drawing room where the General was, he took pains to introduce the two officers to the ladies who were present and who laughed as soon as they saw the masquerader; but having already heard the whole story, they were surprised, for they had not expected to have the pleasure of dining with the heroes of the play. The women saw fit to treat the young officer as if he were a man, and the men paid him the homage they would have paid him if he had declared that he was a girl. The only woman who sulked was Signora Querini, for finding that she was receiving less attention, she thought that she was outshone. She addressed him only to show off her French, which she spoke fairly well. The only person who never spoke was the Hungarian officer, for no one cared to speak Latin, and the General had almost nothing to say to him in German.

An old abate who was at the table tried to justify the Bishop by assuring the General that the constables and the innkeeper had acted as they had done only by order of the Holy Office of the Inquisition. That, he told us, was why there were no bolts in rooms in inns, because foreigners were not permitted to lock themselves in. Nor were two persons of different sex permitted to sleep together unless they were husband and wife.

Twenty years later[30] in Spain I found that all rooms in inns had a bolt on the outside, so that foreigners who slept in them could be to all intents and purposes imprisoned.

CHAPTER II

I buy a fine carriage and leave for Parma with the old Captain and the young Frenchwoman. I see Genoveffa again and present her with a fine pair of gold bracelets. My perplexities concerning my female traveling companion. Monologue. Conversation with the Captain. Private interview with the Frenchwoman.

"IT IS strange," said Signora Querini to the masquerader, "that you can live together and never speak to each other."

"Why strange, Signora? We understand each other none the worse, for speech is not necessary in the business we do together."

This answer, which the General translated into good Italian for the whole company at the table, provoked a burst of laughter; but Signora Querini affected the prude: she thought it too revealing.

"I do not know," she said to the pretended officer, "of any business in which speech, or at least writing, is not necessary."

"I beg your pardon, Signora. Is not gaming a business?"

"Then you do nothing but play cards?"

"Nothing else. We play faro, and I keep the bank."

This time the laughter lasted until everyone was out of breath; and Signora Querini could not help laughing too.

"But does the bank," asked the General, "win a great deal?"

"Hardly. The stakes are so small that it's not worth counting up."

No one took the trouble to translate this answer for the worthy officer. Late in the afternoon the company broke up, and everyone wished the General, who was leaving, a good journey. He likewise wished me a good journey to Naples; but I told him that I wanted first to see the Infante, the Duke of Parma, and at the same time serve as interpreter to the two officers who could not understand each other: he answered that if he were in my place he would do the same. I promised Signora Querini that I would let her hear from me at Bologna, not intending to keep my promise.

The officer's mistress had begun to interest me when she was hidden under the bedclothes; she had attracted me when she put her head out, and far more when I saw her up; but she added the finishing touch at dinner, when she displayed a kind of wit which I greatly admired, which is seldom found in Italy and often found in France. As her conquest seemed to me no difficult matter I considered how to go about achieving it. Assuming, without the least conceit, that I was better suited to her than the officer, I did not imagine that I should find him making any difficulties. I thought him one of those natures who, considering love a trifle, yield easily to circumstances, adapt themselves, and accept whatever compromises chance may offer. Fortune could not possibly provide me with a better opportunity to push my attack than making me the couple's traveling companion. There was no likelihood that I would be refused; indeed, I thought my company would be very welcome to them.

As soon as we were back at the inn I asked the officer if he intended to go to Parma by post or by carriage. He answered that, having no carriage of his own,[1] he would prefer to go by post.

"I have a carriage," I said, "and a very comfortable one; and I offer you the two back seats in it, if my company is not distasteful to you."

"It falls out perfectly. Please propose your excursion to Henriette."[2]

"Will you, Madame Henriette, grant me the honor of conducting you to Parma?"

"I should be delighted, for we will talk; but your part will not be easy since you will often have to play a lone hand."

"I shall do so with the greatest pleasure, only regretting that our journey is a very short one. We will discuss it at supper. In the meanwhile permit me to go and finish some business."

The "business" was a carriage, which I owned only in imagination. It was to the Caffè della Nobiltà[3] that I immediately went to ask where there might be a good carriage for sale. I at once heard that there was an English carriage for sale at Count Dandini's[4] and that no one would buy it because the price was too high. He asked two hundred zecchini for it, and it was only a two-seater, with a folding seat. It was just what I wanted. I find someone to guide me to the coach house, the carriage is to my liking; the Count had gone out to supper, I promise to buy it the next day, and I return to the inn well satisfied. During supper I talked to the officer only to settle it that we would leave the next day after dinner and would each pay for two horses. The long dialogues were between Henriette and myself on any number of pleasant topics, in which I admired a wit in her which was entirely new to me, for I had never conversed with a Frenchwoman. Finding her always charming and unable to suppose her anything but an adventuress, I was surprised to find her entertaining sentiments which I thought could only be the fruit of a most refined education; but when the idea came to me I dismissed it. Every time I tried to make her talk about her lover the officer she evaded my question, but in the most gracious way possible. The only question I asked her to which she felt it necessary to give me an answer was that he was neither her husband nor her father. The good man had fallen asleep. When he woke I wished them good night, and I went off to bed very much in love and very much delighted with the promising adventure, which I imagined would be full of charm and whose demands upon me I was certain that I could meet, since I had plenty of money and was completely my own master. What crowned my happiness was that I was sure I should see the culmination of the intrigue within two or three days.

The next morning very early I went to Count Dandini's. Passing a jeweler's shop, I bought a pair of gold bracelets made with Spanish links[5] such as are worn in Venice, five ells long and unusually fine. I at once thought that I would make Genoveffa a present of them.

When Count Dandini saw me he recognized me. He had seen me at Padua, in the house of his father, who, when I was a student in the university there, held the chair of Roman Civil Law. I bought the carriage, which must have cost twice as much, on condition that he would at once send for a harness maker who would bring it to me at the inn door in perfect order an hour after noon.

From there I went to Francia's, where I delighted Genoveffa beyond measure by giving her the bracelets, of which no girl in Cesena had a pair as beautiful. By this present I paid ten times more than all the expenditure the good man had made during the ten or twelve days I had passed in his house. But a present of far greater value which I gave him was to make him swear to wait for me and never trust any other magicians to bring up the treasure, even if ten years should pass before he saw me again. I assured him that at the first operation undertaken by another philosopher,[6] the guardian gnomes would make it go down twice as far, and that at thirty-five fathoms even I should find it ten times as difficult to bring it up. I said frankly that I could not tell him exactly how soon he would see me again; but that he must wait for me, for it was decreed that only I could bring up his treasure. I accompanied his oath with maledictions which, if he broke it, would bring certain ruin to his whole family. Thus, far from having to reproach myself with having deceived the good man, I became his benefactor. He did not see me again, for he died; but I am sure that his descendants are still waiting for me, for the name of Farussi by which they knew me must have remained immortal in their house.

Genoveffa saw me off to within thirty paces of the city of Cesena, and in the course of hearty embraces with which I took leave of her I saw that my fear of lightning had only had a temporary effect on me; but I was too glad not to have committed that particular piece of villainy to think of returning to it. The present I made her in twenty words was of greater consequence than the bracelets. I told her that if I put off coming back for more than three months she could set about finding herself a husband without any fear that her marriage would prevent acquiring the treasure, which I could not bring up until the Great Science should allow me to. After shedding a few tears she assured me that she would act in accordance with what I had just told her.

So ended the business of the Cesena treasure, in which instead of being a swindler I was a hero; but I dare not boast of it when I consider that if I had not been master of a purse full of gold I would have ruined poor Francia with a light heart; and I believe that any young man with a modicum of intelligence would have done the same thing. As for Capitani, to whom I sold the sheath for St. Peter's knife at rather too high a price, I have never felt any remorse over it, and I should consider myself the stupidest of men if I repented of it now; for Capitani himself thought that he had gulled me when he accepted it as security for the two hundred and fifty zecchini he gave me; and the canonical commissary, his father, valued it to his dying day more than he would have valued a diamond worth a hundred thousand scudi. Dying in that conviction, the man died rich; and I shall die poor. I leave it to the reader to decide which of us was better off.

Back at the inn I arranged everything for the short journey, the thought of which was enough to make me happy. Each time Henriette said anything to me I thought her more charming, and her intelligence enslaved me more than her beauty. I had the impression that the officer was well pleased that I should fall in love with her; and I thought I saw very clearly that the girl asked nothing better than to change lovers. I could assume as much without conceit, for aside from the fact that on the physical side I had all that an acceptable lover could have in order to hope to please, I also appeared to be very rich, even though I had no servant. I told her that, to have the pleasure of not having one, I spent twice as much and that by serving myself I was always sure to be well served; in addition, I was sure I should not be robbed and should not have a spy at my heels. Henriette understood me perfectly; and in short my future happiness intoxicated me.

The worthy officer was determined to give me the money which his share of the posts to Parma would have cost him. We dined, had our trunks put on and securely tied, and then set off after a contest of politeness over the seat beside Henriette, which he wanted me to take. He did not see that the folding seat was the one which my budding love could not but prefer to his; but I had no doubt that Henriette saw it perfectly. Seated facing her, my eyes saw her without my having to turn my head to give them that pleasure, which is certainly the greatest a lover can have among those which he cannot be denied.

In a happiness which I felt to be so great I had to endure one trial. When Henriette said amusing things which made me laugh, seeing the Hungarian distressed because he could not laugh at them too I undertook to explain the joke to him in Latin; but it often turned out that I explained it so badly that it became flat. The officer did not laugh, and I was mortified, for Henriette must suppose that I did not speak Latin as well as she spoke French; and it was the truth. In all the languages in the world what one learns last is their wit; and it is very often idiom which makes the joke. I did not begin to laugh over reading Terence, Plautus, and Martial[7] until I was thirty.

Some repair being needed to my carriage, we stopped at Forlì.[8] After a very gay supper I insisted on going to sleep in another room. During the day's journey the girl had struck me as so unpredictable that I was afraid she would leave her lover's bed and get into mine. I did not know how the Hungarian, who seemed a man of strict honor, might have taken it. I wished to obtain possession of Henriette in peace and quiet, as the result of an amicable and honorable arrangement. The girl had nothing but the male attire she was wearing, not a scrap of woman's clothing, not even a shirt. When she changed hers, she put on a fresh one of her lover's. This was something as new to me as it was puzzling.

It was at Bologna, when we were in high spirits over our supper, that I asked her by what strange chance she had become the mistress of this worthy man, whom one would expect to hear was her father rather than her husband. She answered with a smile that I should get him to tell me the story himself, in all its circumstances and perfectly truthfully. I at once told him that I was curious to hear it, and that she was willing. After making certain that it would not distress her, and making her say again that he should tell me everything, he addressed me as follows:

"An officer who was a friend of mine in Vienna having to go to Rome on a mission, I obtained a six months' leave and went with him. I eagerly availed myself of the opportunity to see the great city, assuming that the Latin language must be at least as well known there as it is in Hungary. But I was very much mistaken, for even among churchmen no one speaks it more than badly. Those who know it only claim to be able to write it; but it is true that they write it purely.

"After a month Cardinal Alessandro Albani gave my friend dispatches for Naples; and we parted; but before he left he introduced me to the Cardinal, giving me such a good recommendation that His Eminence told me that within a few days he would give me a packet and a letter addressed to Monsieur Dutillot, Minister to the Infante, the new Duke of Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla, paying me, of course, for the journey. As I wanted to see the port which the ancients called 'Centum cellae'[9] and which is now called 'Civitavecchia,' I decided to devote these days to it and went there with my guide, who spoke Latin.

"Visiting the port, I saw an old officer disembark from a tartan[10] with this girl, dressed as you see her. She made a great impression on me. But I should not have thought of her again if the same officer had not arrived with her and put up not only in the same inn where I was lodging but in a room so situated that from my windows I saw the whole inside of it. The same evening I saw the girl eat supper with him without ever seeing them exchange a single word. At the end of their supper I saw the girl get up and leave the table, while the officer never raised his eyes from a letter he was reading. A quarter of an hour later he closed his windows, and when I saw the room in darkness I supposed he had gone to bed. The next morning I saw him go out; and this girl here, left alone in the room with a book in her hand, interested me even more strongly. I went out, and coming back an hour later, I saw the officer speaking to her, while she only answered him by a word or two at intervals, in great dejection. At that I ordered my guide to go and tell the girl masquerading as an officer that if she could give me only an hour's meeting I would give her ten zecchini. Doing my errand at once, he came back and told me that she had answered in French that she was leaving for Rome after having eaten something, and that at Rome it would be easy for me to find out how I could arrange to talk with her. My guide assured me that he would learn where she would lodge from the vetturino who was driving her. She left after breakfasting with the same officer; and I left the next day.

"Two days after I returned to Rome I received from the Cardinal the packet, the letter for Monsieur Dutillot, and a passport with the money for my journey, which I was free to pursue at my leisure. So I took a carriage which was going back to Parma, for eight zecchini.

"I was really no longer thinking of the girl when, two days before my departure, my guide told me that he knew where she was lodging with the same officer. I told him to try to make her the same proposal, informing her that I was leaving on the next day but one and so the thing must be done quickly. He answered me the same day that, if she knew the hour of my departure and the gate by which I would leave, she would be on my road two hundred paces outside the city and that, if I were alone, she could get into my carriage, in which we could go somewhere and talk.

"Thinking this a very happy arrangement, I sent her word of the hour and the place, which would be outside the Porta del Popolo in the direction of the Ponte Molle.[11]

"She kept her promise in every detail. As soon as I saw her I stopped the carriage, and she seated herself beside me, saying that we should have plenty of time to talk since she had decided to come and dine with me.

You cannot imagine what efforts it took before I could understand her and how hard she tried to make herself comprehensible. It was by gestures. I agreed, and with great pleasure.

"So we dined together; and she refused me nothing I could ask of her; but she surprised me not a little when she would not take the ten zecchini I tried to give her, managing to make me understand that she would rather go with me to Parma, where she had something to do. Finding the adventure very much to my liking, I consented, only regretting that I could not warn her that, if she had been followed to force her to return to Rome, I was not in a position to protect her against such an attempt; I also regretted that, in our mutual ignorance of each other's language, I could not hope to entertain her with amusing talk nor entertain myself by learning of her adventures. Hence I can tell you nothing about her situation. All I know is that she wishes to be called Henriette, that she must be a Frenchwoman, that she is as gentle as a lamb, that she seems to have had a most excellent education, that she is in perfect health, and that she must be both intelligent and courageous, as appears from the examples of those qualities which she gave me in Rome and you at the General's table in Cesena. If she will tell you her story and allow you to translate it into Latin for me, say to her that she will give me the greatest pleasure, for I find that in these few days I have become sincerely her friend. To tell the truth, I shall be very much distressed when we have to part in Parma. Say to her that, instead of the ten zecchini I owe her, I will give her the thirty which, but for her, I should never have received from the Bishop of Cesena. Tell her that, if I were rich, I would give her a great deal more. Be so good as to make all this clear to her in her language."

After asking him if a faithful translation of all that he had just said to me would satisfy him and hearing him answer that he wished it to be perfectly faithful in every detail, I repeated to her word for word all that the officer had said to me.

Henriette, with a noble frankness in which there was, however, a trace of shame, substantiated everything. As for satisfying our curiosity by relating her vicissitudes to us, she asked me to tell him that he must excuse her.

"Tell him," she said, "that the same principle which forbids me to lie does not allow me to tell the truth."

As for the thirty zecchini which he had decided to give her when he left her, she asked me to tell him that she absolutely would not accept a single scudo and that he would distress her if he tried to insist.

"I want him," she said, "to let me go and lodge by myself wherever I see fit, and so far to forget me that he will not try to find out what has become of me in Parma and will pretend not to know me if he happens to meet me anywhere."

After speaking these terrible words to me in a tone as serious as it was gentle, and without any emotion, she embraced the old man in a way which expressed far more compassion than love. The officer, who did not know what words had led to the embrace, was greatly mortified when I translated them to him. He asked me to tell her that, to be willing to obey her order, he must be sure that in Parma she would have whatever she might need. Her only answer was to tell me to ask him not to feel any anxiety about her.

After this declaration we all became equally sad. We stayed there a good quarter of an hour, not only without speaking but without looking at one another. Getting up from the table to leave and wishing them good night, I saw that Henriette's face was fiery red.

As I went to bed I began talking to myself, as I always do when something by which I am greatly interested excites me. Silent thought is not enough for me. I must speak; and possibly at such moments I believe I am conversing with my demon. Henriette's unequivocal declarations confused me completely. "Who can this girl be," I asked the air, "who combines the finest feelings with an appearance of the greatest libertinism? In Parma she insists upon becoming her own mistress, and I have no reason to flatter myself that she will not impose the same law on me that she has decreed for the officer to whom she has already given herself. Farewell my hope! Who can she be? Either she is sure she will find her lover, or she has a husband in Parma, or respectable relatives, or, in a wild spirit of unbridled libertinism, she means to defy fortune to plunge her into the most terrible abyss if it will not raise her to the pinnacle of happiness by bringing her a lover who can lay a crown at her feet: that would be the project of a madwoman or a woman in despair. She has nothing, and as if she needed nothing she refuses to take anything from the officer from whom she could, without blushing, accept a small sum which in a manner of speaking he owes her. Since she does not blush for the favors she granted him without being in love with him, what shame can she feel at receiving thirty zecchini? Can she believe that it is less base to yield to the passing fancy of a man whom she does not know than to receive assistance of which she is absolutely in need to save her from destitution and the risk of finding herself in the street in Parma? Perhaps she thinks that her refusal will justify her misstep in the officer's eyes. She wants him to conclude that she took it only to escape from the man who had her in his power in Rome; and the officer could not think otherwise, for he could not suppose that he had made her fall irretrievably in love with him when he saw her at the window in Civitavecchia. So she might be right and believe that she has justified herself in his eyes; but not in mine. With her intelligence, she must have known that if she had not made me fall in love with her I would not have set off with her, and she could not have been unaware that she had only one means of deserving my forgiveness too. She might have virtues; but not the virtue which could have prevented me from claiming the usual reward which a woman owes to the desires of a lover. If she thought she could play the prude with me and make me her dupe, I ought to show her that she was mistaken."

After this monologue I decided, before I fell asleep, that I would have it out with her no later than the following morning, before we left. "I will ask her," I said to myself, "to grant me the same favors that she has granted the officer; and if she refuses I will avenge myself by showing her the most humiliating contempt even before we reach Parma." I thought it obvious that she could not refuse me tokens of real or feigned affection except by flaunting a virtue which she did not possess, and if her virtue was feigned I ought not to fall victim to it. As for the officer, I was certain, after what he had said to me, that he could have no reason to take offense at my declaration. As a sensible man, he could only be neutral.

With my mind both filled with this reasoning and convinced by it, for I thought it was framed and dictated by the ripest wisdom, I fall asleep and, in a dream which fell nothing short of the charms of reality, Henriette appears before me all smiles and, to my great surprise, with her hair dressed as a woman's. She pleads her case, and proves me wrong, in the following terms: "To demolish all the insulting sophisms you have heaped up, I have come to tell you that I love you and to prove it to you. I know no one in Parma, I am neither mad nor desperate, and I want to be only yours." After uttering these words she does not disappoint me; she yields to my amorous transports, which hers aroused.

In dreams of this sort the dreamer usually wakes an instant before the crisis. Nature, zealous for truth, will not let illusion go so far. A sleeping man is not wholly alive, and he must be alive at the moment when he can give life to a being like himself. But, oh miracle! I did not wake, and I spent the whole night with Henriette in my arms. But what a long dream! I could not know it was a dream until my waking at daybreak made it vanish. I lay there for a good quarter of an hour motionless and stupefied, going over the details of it in my astonished memory. I remembered that I had several times said in my sleep: "No, I am not dreaming"; and I should still have thought that I had not been dreaming if I had not found the door of my room bolted from inside. But for that, I should have believed that Henriette had left before I waked, after spending the night with me.

After this blissful dream I found that I was helplessly in love, and it could not be otherwise. Anyone who badly needs to eat and goes to bed without supper must, if he spends the night dreaming he is eating, wake in the morning ravenously hungry. I dressed quickly, determined to make certain of possessing Henriette before I got into the carriage, or to remain in Bologna, though letting her go on to Parma with the officer in my carriage. In order not to commit the slightest breach of good manners, I saw that before having it out with her I must talk frankly with the Hungarian Captain. I seem to hear even an intelligent reader laugh and exclaim: "Can anyone attach so much importance to such a trifle?" That reader, since he cannot be, and can never have been, in love, is right. For him it can be only a trifle.

After dressing I enter my traveling companions' room and after bidding them good morning and rejoicing with them over the good health which I saw depicted in their faces, I inform the officer that I have fallen in love with Henriette. I ask him if he would be offended if I tried to persuade her to become my mistress.

"If what obliges her," I said, "to ask you to leave her as soon as we reach Parma, and not even to inquire about her, is a lover she may have in that city, I flatter myself, if you will permit me to talk with her for half an hour alone, that I can persuade her to sacrifice her lover to me. If she refuses me I will remain here. You will go to Parma with her and leave my carriage at the posthouse, sending me a receipt here from the post master with which I can recover it at my convenience.''

''After we have breakfasted,'' he replied, ''I will go to see the Institute;[12] you will be left here alone with her; you shall speak to her. I hope that when I return in a couple of hours you will be able to tell me that you have persuaded her to do whatever you wish. If she persists in her resolve I can easily find a vetturino here; in that way you will keep your carriage with you. I should be infinitely happy to leave her in your custody.''

Delighted to have accomplished half of the business and to find that I am not far from the end of the play, I ask Henriette if she is curious to see what is worth seeing in Bologna, and she answers that she would like to if she were dressed as a woman; but that she did not care to go about showing herself to the whole city in men's clothes. We breakfast, then the officer leaves. I tell Henriette that he is leaving me alone with her until his return because I had told him that I needed to speak with her in private.

''The order,'' I said, after sitting down facing her, ''which you gave the Captain yesterday to forget you as soon as you have left him in Parma, to make no inquiries about you, and to pretend not to know you if he sees you anywhere—does it apply to me too?''

''It was not an order but an urgent request which I made of him, a favor which my circumstances forced me to ask of him and which, since he has no right to refuse it, I never supposed for a moment that he would make any difficulties about granting me. As for you, I would certainly not have failed to ask you to do me the same favor, if I could have supposed you were thinking of making indiscreet inquiries about me. You have shown me tokens of friendship and you can imagine that if, my circumstances being what they are, the protection which the Captain still wished to extend to me after my request to him would cause me distress because it might harm me, yours would harm me even more. If you were my friend, you should have understood all this.''

''Since I am your friend, you should likewise understand that I cannot possibly leave you alone, with no money and nothing you can sell, in the middle of the street in a city in which you cannot even converse. Do you suppose that a man whose friendship you have won can abandon you after he has become aware of your situation and has heard of it from your own lips? If you believe that, you have no notion of friendship; and if the man grants you the favor you ask of him, he is not your friend.''

''I am sure that the Captain is my friend, and you heard what he said. He will forget me.''

''I know neither of what nature the Captain's friendship for you may be, nor how much he can rely on his own will; but I know that if he can so easily grant you the favor you asked of him the friendship he feels for you is of an entirely different nature from mine. I am prepared to tell you that not only is it not easy for me to do you the strange favor of abandoning you in the state in which I see you, but that it is impossible for me to do what you wish if I come to Parma; for not only do I feel friendship for you, I love you, and I love you in such a way that it is absolutely necessary either that complete possession of your person should make me happy or that I should remain here, letting you go to Parma with the officer; for if I come to Parma, I should become the most unhappy of men, whether I see you with a lover, or a husband, or in the bosom of a respectable family, or, finally, if I cannot discover what has become of you. 'Forget me' is quickly said. Know, Madame, that a Frenchman may be able to forget, but that an Italian, to judge by myself, has no such strange power.

In short, I tell you that you must speak out now. Shall I come to Parma? Shall I remain here? One or the other. Decide. If I stay here that is the end of it. I will leave tomorrow for Naples; and I am sure that I shall be cured of the passion you have aroused in me. But if you tell me to accompany you to Parma you must, Madame, assure me that you will make me happy in the possession of your heart—no less. I wish to be your only lover, on condition, however, if you wish, that you will not make me worthy of your favors until I have been able to deserve them by my services and my attentions and by all that I will do for you with a submission of which you will never have seen the equal. Choose, before that worthy and only too fortunate man returns. I have already told him all."

"How did he answer you?"

"That he would be delighted to leave you in my care. What is the meaning of that sly laugh?"

"Let me laugh, I beg you, for I have never in my life conceived of a declaration of love being made in anger. Do you understand what it is to say to a woman in a declaration of love, which should be all tenderness: 'Madame, one or the other, choose this instant'?"

"I understand it very well. It is neither sweet nor touching as it ought to be in a novel; but this is history, and history which could not be more serious. I have never felt such an urgency. Do you realize the excruciating condition of a man in love at the moment when he must choose a course which can determine his very life? Consider that, despite all my passion, I treat you with perfect respect; that the course I will take if you persist in your resolve is not a threat but a heroic act which makes me worthy of all your esteem. The word 'choose' cannot sound harsh to you; on the contrary, it honors you, for it leaves you to decide your fate and mine. To be convinced that I love you must you see me come like an idiot weeping to you to have pity on me? No, Madame.

Sure that I have qualities to deserve your heart, I refuse to ask you for pity. Go where you will; but let me leave. If, prompted by a humane feeling, you want me to forget you, permit me, by going far from you, to make it less difficult for me to recover an unhappy mastery over myself. If I come to Parma I shall go mad. Consider now, I beg you, that you would be doing me an unforgivable wrong if you said to me at this moment: 'Come to Parma, even though I ask you not to try to see me.' Do you understand that in all decency you cannot say that to me?"

"I certainly understand it, if it is true that you love me."

"Thank God! Be sure that I love you. So choose. Decide."

"Still the same tone! Do you know that you appear to be in a rage?"

"Forgive me. I am not in a rage, but in a violent paroxysm, and at a decisive moment. I cannot but resent my too freakish destiny and the accursed sbirri of Cesena who waked me; were it not for them I should not have seen you."

"Then you are sorry you met me?"

"Have I not reason to be?"

"None whatever, for I have not yet chosen."

"I begin to breathe. I wager you tell me to come to Parma."

"Yes—come to Parma."

CHAPTER III

I set out from Bologna a happy man. The Captain leaves us at Reggio, where I spend the night with Henriette. Our arrival in Parma. Henriette resumes the dress of her sex; our mutual happiness. I encounter some of my relatives, but do not make myself known.

IT WAS then that the scene changed. I fell at her feet, I clasped her knees, kissing them a hundred times; no more anger, no more harsh tones, tender, submissive, grateful, ardent, I swear that I will never even ask to kiss her hands until I have deserved her heart. The divine woman, who was amazed to see me pass from despair to the utmost tenderness, tells me in a tone even more tender than mine to rise. She said that she was sure I loved her, and that she would do everything in her power to keep me faithful. If she had said that she loved me as much as I loved her, she would have said no more. I had my lips pressed to her beautiful hands when the Captain came in. He congratulated us. I told him happily that I would go and order the horses, and left him with her. We set off together, all three of us well satisfied.

Halfway through the post before reaching Reggio,[1] he put it to me that we ought to let him go on to Parma alone. He told us that if he arrived with us he would give occasion for talk, that he would be questioned, and that there would also be much more gossip about us if we arrived with him. We thought his view most prudent. We immediately decided to spend the night at Reggio and to let him go on to Parma alone in a postchaise. We acted accordingly. After having his trunk untied and put on the small carriage he left us, promising that he would come and dine with us the next day.

This procedure on the worthy man's part could not be as pleasing to Henriette as it was to me, for a certain delicacy, partly founded on prejudice, was felt on either side. After the new arrangement, how could we have lodged at Reggio? In all decency Henriette would have had to sleep in a bed alone, yet she could not have kept herself, or kept us, from realizing how absurd such a reserve would be, and the absurdity was unfortunately of a kind which would have made us all blush. Love is a divine child, to whom shame is so abhorrent that if he gives way to it he feels disgraced, and feeling disgraced makes him lose at least three quarters of his dignity. Neither Henriette nor I could feel perfectly happy unless we dismissed the worthy Captain's memory.

I at once ordered supper for Henriette and myself, finding the intensity of my happiness too much for my faculties; nevertheless I seemed downcast, and since Henriette seemed as downcast as I, she could not reproach me for it. We ate very little supper and talked scarcely at all, for our remarks seemed dull to us both; we vainly changed from one subject to another to find something interesting. We knew that we were going to sleep together; but we would have thought it indiscreet to say so to each other. What a night! What a woman she was, this Henriette whom I loved so greatly, who made me so happy!

It was not until three or four days after our union that I asked her what she would have done, without a scudo and knowing no one in Parma, if when I declared my love I had not gone on to tell her that I had decided to leave for Naples. She answered that in all likelihood she would have been in the most disastrous situation; but that, having been certain that I loved her, she could not but be equally certain that, unable to abandon her, I would have spoken my mind. She added that, impatient to make sure of what I thought of her, she had made me translate her resolution to the officer, knowing that he was not in a position either to oppose it or to continue to keep her with him. She said that, not having included me in the favor of forgetting her which she asked of the officer, she considered it impossible that I should not ask her if I could be of use to her, merely out of a feeling of friendship, and that then she would have made up her mind in accordance with the feelings she found that I entertained. She ended by saying that if she had gone wrong, her husband and her father-in-law were the cause of it. She called them monsters.

Entering Parma, I kept the name of Farussi; it was my mother's family name. Henriette herself wrote the name she took: "Anne d'Arci, Frenchwoman." Just as we were telling the customs officers that we had nothing new, a smart-looking young Frenchman offers me his services and says that instead of stopping at the post-house inn I would do better to let him show me the way to D'Andremont's,[2] where I would find everything French—apartment, cooking, and wines. Seeing that Henriette was pleased with the proposal I accept, and we go on to Andremont's, where we find that we are very well lodged. After engaging by the day the lackey who had taken us there, and concluded a detailed arrangement for everything with the proprietor, I went with him to put my carriage in a coach house.

After telling Henriette that we would meet again at dinnertime, and the hired lackey to wait for me in the anteroom, I went out by myself. Certain that in a city under a new government[3] spies must be everywhere, I wanted to go out alone, despite the fact that the city, my father's birthplace, was entirely unknown to me.

I did not feel that I was in Italy: everything seemed ultramontane. I heard passers-by speaking together in French or in Spanish, those who spoke neither talked in low tones. Going here and there at random, on the watch for a shop where linen was sold and not wanting to ask where I could find it, I see one in which I notice the fat proprietress sitting in a corner behind her counter.

"Madame, I want to buy all kinds of linen."

"Monsieur, I will send for someone who speaks French."

"There is no need, for I am Italian."

"God be praised! Nothing is so unusual nowadays."

"Why unusual?"

"Don't you know that Don Filippo has arrived? And that Madame de France,[4] his wife, is on the way?"

"I congratulate you. Money is bound to flow, and everything will be in good supply."

"True enough, but everything is expensive, and we can't get used to these new ways. It's a mixture of French freedom and Spanish jealousy, which makes us dizzy. What do you want in the way of linen?"

"I warn you to begin with that I don't haggle; so beware. If you overcharge me I will not come to your shop again. I need fine linen to make twenty-four chemises for a woman, dimity to make petticoats and corsets, muslin, handkerchiefs, and other things which I hope you have, for, being a foreigner, God knows into what hands I may fall."

"You will be in good hands if you trust to me."

"I think I may believe you; so I beg you to help me. I must also find seamstresses who will work in the lady's room, for she needs to have everything necessary made as quickly as possible."

"Dresses too?"

"Dresses, hats, mantles, in short everything, for as a woman you can imagine her stark naked."

"If she has money I promise you she shall lack nothing. I will see to it myself. Is she young?"

"She is four years younger than I am, and she is my wife."

"Ah! May God bless you! Have you children?"

"Not yet, my good woman."

"How fortunate I am! I will send out at once for the pearl of seamstresses. Meanwhile, you shall choose."

After having chosen the best she had among all the various things I asked her for, I paid the price and the seamstress arrived. I told the proprietress that I was staying at D'Andremont's, and that if she would send me a merchant with materials she would be doing me a favor.

"Are you dining at home?"

"Yes."

"That is all I need to know. Trust to me."

I told the seamstress, who was with her daughter, to follow me, carrying my linen. I stop only to buy both silk and cotton stockings, and as I enter my apartment I bring in the shoemaker, who was at the door. That was the moment of true pleasure! Henriette, to whom I had said nothing beforehand, watches everything being laid out on the table with a look of the most complete contentment, but with no other show of her satisfaction except in the praise she bestowed on the fine quality of the articles I had chosen. No heightened gaiety because of it, no base thanks or expressions of gratitude.

The hired valet had gone into my room in the apartment when I arrived with the seamstresses, and Henriette had quietly told him to go back to the anteroom in readiness to come when he was called. The linens are spread out, the seamstress begins cutting to make chemises, the shoemaker takes her measure, and I tell him to bring us up the slippers first, and he leaves. A quarter of an hour later he comes up with slippers for Henriette and for me, and the hired valet comes in with him unsummoned. The shoemaker, who spoke French, was telling Henriette comic stories. She interrupts him to ask the hired valet, who was standing there beside us, what he wanted.

"Nothing, Madame; I am here only to receive your orders."

"Didn't I tell you that when you were needed we would call you?"

"I want to know which of you is my master."

"Neither," I said, laughing; "here is your day's pay. Go."

Henriette went on laughing with the shoemaker, who, seeing that she spoke only French, proposes a language teacher. She asks him what his nationality is.

"Flemish. He is learned. His age is fifty. He is a wise man. He lodges at Bornisa's.[5] He charges three Parmesan lire[6] for a lesson if it lasts an hour and six for two hours; and he wants to be paid each time."

"Do you wish me to engage him?" she asked me.

"Please engage him; it will keep you occupied."

The shoemaker promised to send him to her the next morning at nine o'clock. While the elder seamstress was cutting, her daughter began to sew; but as only one could not do much sewing I told the woman that she would do us a favor if she would get another who could speak French. She promised to have her come the same day. At the same time she offered me her son as a hired valet, saying that he was already beginning to make himself understood in French and was neither a thief nor a gossip nor a spy. Henriette having told me that she thought I would do well to engage him, she immediately ordered her daughter to go and fetch him and also to fetch the seamstress who spoke French. So here was company to entertain my dear wife.

The woman's son was a lad of eighteen who had been to school; he was modest, and he looked honest. When I asked him his name I was much surprised to learn that it was Caudagna.

The reader knows that my father was a native of Parma, and he may remember that a sister of my father's had married a Caudagna.[7] "It would be odd," I said to myself, "if this seamstress were my aunt and if my valet were my cousin. Not a word!" Henriette asked me if I wanted the seamstress to dine with us; but I begged her not to mortify me in future by deferring to me in such trifling matters. She laughed and promised that she would not. I then put fifty zecchini in a small purse and gave it to her, saying that with it she could herself buy all the little things which I might have failed to divine that she needed. She accepted it, saying that the gift gave her the greatest pleasure.

A moment before we sat down at the table we saw the Hungarian Captain come in. Henriette ran and embraced him, calling him "Papa"; she begged him to come to dinner with us every day. The worthy man, seeing all the women at work, was delighted to find that he had placed his adventuress so well, and his joy knew no bounds when I embraced him and told him I owed him my happiness.

We dined most choicely. Andremont's cook was excellent. I discovered that Henriette was an epicure and the Hungarian a glutton; I was something of both. So, trying several of our host's wines, we ate a very enjoyable dinner. My young hired valet pleased me by serving his mother no less respectfully than he did the rest. Giannina, his sister, was sewing with the Frenchwoman. They had already dined.

At dessert I saw the proprietress of the linen shop arrive with two other women, one of whom, who was a milliner, spoke French. The other had samples for all kinds of dresses. I let Henriette choose whatever she wished in the way of caps, bonnets, and trimmings from the first; but I insisted on taking a hand in the choice of dresses, though adapting my taste to that of my beloved. I made her choose materials for four dresses, and it was I who was grateful for her willingness to accept them. The more I bound her heart to me, the more I felt that I was increasing my happiness. Thus we spent the first day, in which it was impossible to do more than we did. In the evening at supper, as she seemed to me not to be as gay as usual, I asked her why.

"My dear, you are spending a great deal of money for me, and if you are spending it to make me love you more, you are throwing it away, for I love you no more than I did day before yesterday. All that you do can please me only as I know more and more surely that you are worthy to be loved; but I have no need to be convinced of that."

"So I believe, dear Henriette; and I congratulate myself if you feel that your fondness cannot grow stronger; but know that I do as I do simply in order to love you the more; I want to see you shine in the finery of your sex, only regretting that I cannot make you shine still more. And if that pleases you, must it not delight me?"

"Certainly it pleases me; and in a way, since you have called me your wife, you are justified; but if you are not very rich you cannot but feel how I must reproach myself."

"Ah, dear Henriette! let me, I beg you, think that I am rich, and be sure that you cannot possibly be the cause of my ruin: you were born but to make me happy. Think only of never leaving me, and tell me if I may hope it."

"I wish it, my dearest; but who can be certain of the future? Are you free? Are you dependent?"

"I am free in the fullest sense of the word; and I am dependent on no one."

"I congratulate you and it rejoices my soul; no one can take you from me. But alas! you know that I cannot say as much. I am certain that I am being sought; and I know that if they catch up with me they can easily find means to gain possession of me. If they tear me from your arms I shall be wretched."

"And I will kill myself. You make me tremble. Have you reason to think this misfortune can befall you here?"

"I have reason to think it only if someone who knows me contrives to see me."

"Is it likely that the 'someone' is in Parma?"

"I think it scarcely possible."

"Then let us not frighten our love with fears, I beg you; and above all be gay, as you were at Cesena."

"Yet at Cesena I was unhappy, and I am happy now; but do not fear that you will find me gloomy, for gaiety is natural to me."

"I imagine that at Cesena you must have been constantly afraid that the French officer with whom you were living in Rome would catch up with you."

"Not in the least. He was my father-in-law, who, I am sure, did not make the slightest effort to find out where I had gone once he no longer saw me at the inn. He can only have felt very glad to be rid of me. What made me unhappy was being a burden to a man whom I did not love and with whom I could not converse. Add that I could not have the solace of thinking I was giving happiness to the man I was with, for I had only inspired a passing desire in him, which he had considered worth ten zecchini, and, when I had satisfied it, I could not but believe that I had become a burden to him, for it was obvious that he was not rich. I was unhappy for another and most painful reason. I thought it my duty to bestow caresses on him and since he had in all decency to return them, I was afraid that he was sacrificing his health to consideration: the idea distressed me, for, as we did not love each other, we were both doing violence to ourselves out of mere politeness. We lavished on courtesy what is due only to love. Another thought troubled me even more. I could not bear it that anyone should believe the good man was keeping me for his profit. That is why you cannot have been aware that you attracted me as soon as I saw you."

"What! Was it not rather because of your own self-respect?"

"No, truly; for you could have no opinion of me but the one I deserved. I made the misstep of which you know because my father-in-law was going to put me in a convent. But I beg you, do not be curious about my story."

"I will not press you, my angel. Let us love each other now, and let no fear of the future trouble our peace."

We went to bed in love, only to rise in the morning even more in love. I spent three months with her, always as much in love and constantly congratulating myself that I was so.

The next morning at nine o'clock I saw the language teacher. He was a respectable-looking man, well-mannered, modest, speaking little and well, guarded in his answers, and learned in an old-fashioned way. He began by setting me laughing when he said that the Copernican system[8] could be accepted by a Christian only as an ingenious hypothesis. I answered that it could not but be God's system since it was Nature's, and that Scripture was not the book from which Christians could learn physics. His laughter made me think him a Tartufe;[9] but if he could amuse Henriette and teach her Italian it was all I wanted. She told him at once that she would give him six lire every day, since she wanted a two-hour lesson. Six Parmesan lire are worth thirty French sous.[10] After her lesson she gave him two zecchini to buy her new novels which were already praised.

While she was taking her lesson I chatted with the dressmaker Caudagna to find out if we were relatives. I asked her what her husband's occupation was.

"My husband is major-domo to the Marchese Sissa."

"Is your father still living?"

"No, Signore. He is dead."

"What was his family name?"

"Scotti."

"And are your husband's father and mother alive?"

"His father is dead, and his mother is still living with Canon Casanova, his uncle."

That was all I needed to know. The woman was my first cousin once removed, and her children my third cousins. Since my cousin Giannina was not pretty I kept her mother chattering. I asked her if the Parmesans were pleased to have become the subjects of a Spaniard.

"Pleased? It has put us all in a perfect maze; everything is upside down, we don't know where we are. Happy days, when the house of Farnese[11] reigned, you are no more! Day before yesterday I went to the theater,[12] and Arlecchino[13] had everybody laughing fit to burst; but guess what—Don Filippo, who's our new Duke, tried so hard to keep from laughing that he made faces; and when he couldn't hold in any longer he put his hat in front of his face so no one could see him roaring. Somebody told me that laughing spoils the grave countenance of an Infante of Spain, and that if he let it be seen they'd write to his mother[14] in Madrid and she would think it dreadful and unworthy of a great prince. What do you think of that? Duke Antonio[15]—God rest his soul!—was a great prince too; but he laughed so heartily you could hear it in the street. We're brought to such confusion as nobody would believe. For the last three months there's not a soul in Parma who knows what time of day it is.[16]

"Since God made the world the sun has always set at half past twenty-three, and at twenty-four o'clock people have always said the Angelus; and all decent people knew that was the time to light their candles. The way things are now is unbelievable. The sun has gone mad—it sets every day at a different time. Our peasants no longer know at what hour to come to market. They call it a regulation—but do you know why? Because now everyone knows that dinner is at twelve o'clock. A fine regulation! In the days of the Farnese people ate when they were hungry, and that was much better."

Henriette had no watch; I went out to buy her one. I brought her gloves, a fan, earrings, and various knickknacks, all of which pleased her. Her teacher was still there; he praised her aptitude.

"I could," he said, "have taught Madame heraldry, geography, chronology, the sphere; but she knows all that. Madame received a superior education."

The man's name was Valentin de La Haye.[17] He told me that he was an engineer and a professor of mathematics. I shall have much to say of him in these memoirs, and my reader will learn his character better from his actions than from any portrait of him that I might draw.

We dined gaily with our Hungarian. I could not wait to see my dear Henriette in women's clothes. She was to be brought a simple dress the next day, and petticoats and a few chemises had already been made for her.

Henriette's intelligence was as sparkling as it was subtle. The milliner, who was from Lyons, enters our room the next morning saying:

"Madame et Monsieur, I am your servant."

"Why," Henriette asks her, "don't you say 'Monsieur et Madame'?"

"I have always," the woman answered, "seen the first honors paid to the ladies."

"But by whom do we hope such honors will be paid us?"

"By men."

"And don't you see that women become absurd if they do not pay men the same honors as men's politeness renders them?"

They who believe that a woman is incapable of making a man equally happy all the twenty-four hours of a day have never known an Henriette. The joy which flooded my soul was far greater when I conversed with her during the day than when I held her in my arms during the night. Having read a great deal and having natural taste, Henriette judged rightly of everything and, though not learned, she reasoned like a geometrician. Since she did not pretend to intellect, she never said anything important except with a laugh which, by giving it the color of frivolity, put it within the capacity of the entire company. In this way she bestowed intelligence on those who did not have it themselves, and who adored her for it. After all, a beautiful woman without a mind of her own leaves her lover with no resource after he has physically enjoyed her charms. An ugly woman of brilliant intelligence makes a man fall so much in love that she leaves him feeling no lack. So what must I have been with Henriette, who was beautiful, intelligent, and cultivated? It is impossible to conceive the extent of my happiness.

Ask a beautiful woman who is not very intelligent if she would give some small part of her beauty for a little more intelligence. If she is frank she will say that she is satisfied with what she has. Why is she satisfied? Because, having only a little, she can have no notion of the intelligence she lacks. Ask an ugly but intelligent woman if she would change places with the other. She will answer no. Why? Because, having a great deal of intelligence, she knows that it serves her for everything.

The intelligent woman who cannot make a lover happy is the bluestocking. In a woman learning is out of place; it compromises the essential qualities of her sex; then, too, it never goes beyond the limits of what is already known. No scientific discoveries have been made by women. To go plus ultra (''farther'') requires a vigor which the female sex cannot have. But in simple reasoning and in delicacy of feeling we must yield to women. Hurl a sophism at an intelligent woman: she cannot unravel it; but she is not the dupe of it; she tells you she is not taken in by it, and she rejects it. The man who finds it insoluble accepts it at face value, as does the bluestocking. What an intolerable burden for a man is a woman with the mind of Madame Dacier[18] for example! God preserve you from it, my dear reader!

When the seamstress arrived with the dress Henriette said that I must not be present at her metamorphosis. She told me to go out for a walk until I could come back to the house and find her no longer in disguise.

It is a great pleasure to do whatever the object of one's love commands. I went to the French bookseller's shop, where I found an intelligent hunchback. Nothing, by the way, is more uncommon than a stupid hunchback. Since all intelligent men are not hunchbacks, and all hunchbacks are intelligent, I long ago concluded that it is not intelligence which produces rickets but rickets which produces intelligence. The hunchback, with whom I at once struck up an acquaintance, was named Dubois-Chatellerault.[19] He was an engraver by profession, and director of the Duke-Infante's mint, for it was planned at the time to strike coins; but it was never done.

After spending an hour with this intelligent man, who showed me several of his engravings, I went back to my lodging, where I found the Hungarian Captain waiting for the door of Henriette's room to be opened. He did not know that she was to receive us undisguised. The door opened at last, and there she was. She receives us with perfect composure, dropping us a graceful curtsy in which there was no trace of either the overbearingness or the freedom of the soldier. It was we whom surprise and her new appearance had put out of countenance. She makes us sit down on either side of her; she looks at the Captain in a friendly way; her manner to me expresses tenderness and love, but with none of the show of familiarity which a young officer can make without dishonoring love but which is unsuitable in a well-bred woman. Her new bearing forces me to conform to it with complete good grace, for Henriette was not playing a part. She was actually the character she was representing.

In an ecstasy of admiration I take her hand to kiss it; but she draws it away, and offers me her lips, saying:

"Am I not the same?"

"No. And so little the same that I can no longer say tu to you. You are no longer the officer who answered Signora Querini that you played faro 'keeping the bank and the stakes are so small that it's not worth counting up.' "

"It is certain that, dressed as I am, I should not have dared say such a thing. But I am none the less Henriette, who has made three missteps in her life, the last of which, but for you, would have ruined me. Delightful misstep, the cause of my knowing you!"

These sentiments affected me so profoundly that I was on the point of throwing myself at her feet to ask her to forgive me if I had not shown her more respect, if I had taken it all too lightly, if I had conquered her too cavalierly.

Henriette, charming as ever, put an end to this too emotional scene by shaking the Captain, who seemed turned to stone. His obvious air of mortification arose from the shame he felt at having treated such a woman as an adventuress, for he could not believe that she was not what she appeared to be. He looked at her in amazement, he made her bow after bow; he seemed to be assuring her of his respect and his repentance; he was confounded. For her part, she seemed to be telling him, without a trace of reproach: "I am very glad that you know me now."

She began that same day to do the honors of the table like a woman who was accustomed to it. She treated the Captain as her friend and me as her favorite. At one moment she seemed my mistress, at another my wife.

The Captain asked me to tell her that if he had seen her disembark from the tartan dressed as she now was he would not have dared to send his guide to her.

"Oh, I am sure of that," she answered him; "but it is strange that a uniform is less worthy of respect than a simple dress."

I begged her not to think ill of her uniform, for I owed it my happiness.

"As I owe mine," she answered, "to the sbirri of Cesena."

It is a fact that I spent that whole day in Arcadian courtship; and that when we went to bed together it seemed as if it were for the first time.

CHAPTER IV

I take a box at the opera despite Henriette's reluctance. Monsieur Dubois comes to call, he dines with us; trick which my mistress plays on him. Henriette reasons on happiness. We call on Dubois; extraordinary talent which my wife displays there. Monsieur Dutillot. The court gives a magnificent entertainment in the palace gardens; our disastrous encounter there. I have an interview with Monsieur d'Antoine, the Infante's favorite.

MADAME DE FRANCE, the Infante's wife, having arrived, I told Henriette that I would engage a box for every day. She had said several times that her ruling passion was music. As she had never seen an Italian opera I was surprised to hear her answer me coldly:

"You mean you want us to go to the opera every day?"

"I even think we should get ourselves talked about if we did not go; but if you will not enjoy going, my dear, you know that you are under no obligation to put yourself out. I prefer our conversations in this room to all the music in the universe."

"I am mad about music, my dear; but I cannot help trembling at the very thought of going out."

"He is going to Padua," she says, "but everything is arranged for us to sup at his casino if we wish."

"Why not in Venice?"

"No, not in Venice, until he is back. He asked me not to. He has great judgment."

"Very well. When shall we sup at the casino?"

"Sunday, if you like."

"Let it be Sunday; I will go to the casino at dusk and will read while I wait for you. Did you tell your friend that you were not uncomfortable in my casino?"

"My dear, I told him everything; but one thing greatly troubles him. He wants me to beg you not to expose me to the danger of a big belly."

"May I die if it ever entered my mind. But don't you run the same risk with him?"

"Never."

"Then we must be very careful in future. I think, since there is no masking[1] during the nine days before Christmas, I shall have to go to your casino by water, for if I go by land I could easily be recognized as the same man who went to your church."

"That is very prudent. I can easily point out the quay to you. I think you can come during Lent too, when God wants us to mortify our senses. Isn't it odd that there is a time when God approves of our amusing ourselves and another when we can only please him by abstinence! What can an anniversary have in common with the divinity? I do not understand how the action of the creature can influence the creator, whom my reason can only conceive as independent. It seems to me that if God had created man with the power to offend him, man would be justified in doing everything he forbade him to do, if only to teach him how to create. Can one imagine God being sad during Lent?"

"My divine one, you reason perfectly; but may I ask you where you learned to reason, and how you managed to break away?"

the liberty of introducing him to his beautiful pupil, who then treated him to the polite remarks which it is customary to make to all new acquaintances. After thanking him for the spartito she asked him to procure several other arias for her. He said that he had taken the liberty to call on me to bring me the medallions in which I had shown an interest; and so saying he took from his portfolio the two which he had made. On one of them was the Infante with the Infanta, on the other the Infante. As everything about the medallions was beautiful, we praised them.

"The workmanship is priceless," said Henriette, "but the gold can be reimbursed."

He answered modestly that they weighed sixteen zecchini, and she paid him for them, thanking him and asking him to come some other day at suppertime. Coffee was brought.

As Henriette was about to put sugar into Dubois's cup, she asked him if he liked it very sweet.

"Madame, your taste is mine."

"Then you must know that I like it without sugar; and I am very glad that my taste is the same as yours."

So saying, she puts no sugar in his cup and after putting some in De La Haye's cup and in mine she puts none at all in hers. I wanted to burst out laughing, for the minx, who usually liked it very sweet, drank it bitter that day to punish Dubois for the insipid compliment he had paid her by saying that his taste was the same as hers. However, the clever hunchback would not retract. Drinking it with every appearance of pleasure, he maintained that it should always be drunk bitter.

After they left, and after laughing for a long time with Henriette over the trick she had played, I told her that she would be the victim of it, for in future she would always have to take her coffee bitter whenever Dubois was present. She said she would pretend that her doctor had ordered her to drink it sweet.

At the end of a month Henriette was speaking Italian. It was the result of practicing with Giannina, who served her as chambermaid, more than of the lessons she received from De La Haye. Lessons serve only to teach the rules of languages; to speak them, practice is necessary. We had been to the opera a score of times without making any acquaintances. We were happy in the fullest sense of the word. I never went out except with her in a carriage, and neither of us would receive callers. I knew no one, and no one knew me. After the Hungarian left, the only person who came to dine with us, when we invited him, was Dubois, for De La Haye dined with us every day.

Dubois was very curious about us; but he was intelligent enough to conceal it. One day he talked to us of how brilliant Don Filippo's court had become since Madame's arrival and of the great number of foreigners of both sexes who had attended it that day.

"Most of the foreign ladies we have seen there," he said, addressing Henriette, "are unknown."

"Perhaps if they were known they would not have put in an appearance."

"Perhaps; but I can assure you, Madame, that even if their attire or their beauty made them conspicuous, the wish of the Sovereign is entirely in favor of freedom. I still hope, Madame, to have the honor of seeing you there."

"It is very unlikely, for you cannot imagine what a ridiculous figure I think a woman cuts who goes to court without being presented, especially if she is of a station which gives her the right."

The hunchback was at a loss for an answer, and Henriette nonchalantly changed the subject. After he left she laughed with me over his thinking that he had concealed his curiosity. I told her that in all conscience she should forgive any man whose curiosity she aroused, whereupon she came to me all smiles and caressed me. Living together in this fashion, and tasting the delights of true happiness, we scoffed at the philosophy which denies that happiness can be perfect, because, it maintains, it is not enduring.

"What do they mean," Henriette said one day, "by that word 'enduring'? If they mean 'perpetual,' 'immortal,' they are right. But since man is not so, happiness cannot be so; apart from that, all happiness is enduring, for to be so it needs only to exist. But if by perfect happiness they mean a series of varied and uninterrupted pleasures, they are wrong too; for by putting between our pleasures the calm which must follow each of them after we enjoy it, we gain the time to recognize the reality of our happiness. Man can be happy only when he recognizes that he is so, and he can recognize what he is only in a state of calm. Hence, without periods of calm, he would never be happy. Hence pleasure, to be such, has to end. So what do they mean by the word 'enduring'? Every day we reach the point when, desiring sleep, we set it above all other pleasures; and sleep is the true image of death. We can only be grateful to it after it has left us.

"Those who say that no one can be happy all his life talk to no purpose too. Philosophy teaches the means to compound such happiness, if he who wishes to achieve it remains free from disease. Lifelong happiness could be compared to a bouquet composed of various flowers which would make a combination so beautiful and so harmonious that one would take it for a single flower. Is it impossible that we should spend all our lives here as we have spent a month, always in good health and lacking nothing? To crown our happiness we could, when we are very old, die together, and then our happiness would have been perfectly enduring. Death would not interrupt it but would only end it. We could be unhappy only if we assumed that we should continue to exist after our existence ended, which I think implies a contradiction. Do you agree with me?"

It was thus that my divine Henriette gave me lessons in philosophy, reasoning better than Cicero in his Tusculans;[4] but she admitted that such enduring happiness could be realized only in the case of two people who, living together, were in love with each other, healthy, intelligent, sufficiently wealthy, with no duties except to themselves, and having the same tastes, more or less the same character, and the same temperament. Happy the lovers whose minds can take the place of their senses when their senses need rest! Sweet sleep follows, not to end until it has restored all their faculties to equal vigor. On waking, the first to revive are the senses, eager to set the mind to work again. Man and the universe share the same condition. We could say that there is no difference between them, for if we discount the universe there is no more man, and if we discount man there is no more universe, for who could have an idea of it? Thus if we take away space we cannot imagine the existence of matter, nor, taking away the latter, can we imagine the former.

I was very happy with Henriette, and she was no less happy with me: never a moment of ill-humor, never a yawn, never did a folded rose petal come to trouble our content.

The day after the closing of the opera,[5] Dubois, after dining with us, told us that he was having the two leading singers, male and female, to dinner the next day, and that we had only to wish it and we could hear the finest pieces they had sung at the theater in the vaulted drawing room of his country house, where music lost nothing. Henriette, first thanking him heartily, answered that her health was so poor that she could make no engagements from one day to the next; and she at once turned the conversation to other subjects.

As soon as we were alone I asked her why she did not wish to allow herself the diversion of going to Dubois's house.

"I would go, my dear, and with great pleasure; but I am afraid that I may find someone at his dinner who would recognize me and so put an end to our happiness."

"If you have some new reason for being afraid, you are right; but if it is only a groundless fear, my angel, why do you take it upon yourself to give up a real pleasure? If you knew what joy I feel when I see you ravished and as if in ecstasy when you hear some beautiful piece of music!"

"Very well. I do not want you to think I have less courage than you. We will go to Dubois's directly after dinner. The singers will not sing before then. Besides, it is likely that, since he will not be counting on us, he will not have invited anyone who is curious to speak with me. We will go without telling him and without his expecting us. He said that he is at his country house, and Caudagna knows where it is."

In accordance with her reasoning, to which she had been inspired by prudence and love, which so seldom agree, the next day at four in the afternoon we went to his house. We were surprised to find him alone with a pretty girl, whom he introduced to us, saying that she was his niece, whom private reasons prevented him from letting everyone see.

Professing to be delighted to see us, he said that as he did not expect us he had changed his dinner to a small supper party, which he hoped we would honor him by attending, and that the virtuosi[6] would soon arrive. So it was that we were obliged to stay for supper. I ask him if he has invited many people, and he answers triumphantly that we shall be in company worthy of us, and that he only regretted that he had not invited any ladies. Henriette made him a little curtsy and smiled. I saw her looking carefree and content; but she was forcing herself. Her noble soul refused to show uneasiness; but in any case I did not believe she had any real cause for fear. I would have believed it if she had told me her whole story; and I would certainly have taken her to England, and she would have been very glad to go.

A quarter of an hour later the two singers arrived: they were Laschi[7] and La Baglioni,[8] who in those days was very pretty. Then all the people whom Dubois had invited arrived. They were all Spaniards or Frenchmen, and all at least middle-aged. There was no question of introductions, in which I admired the hunchback's tact; but since all the guests were seasoned courtiers, the breach of etiquette did not prevent them from paying Henriette all the honors of the gathering, which she received with an ease unknown anywhere but in France, and indeed only in the most exalted circles, except for certain provinces where haughtiness is too often displayed.

The concert began with a magnificent symphony;[9] then the singers performed a duet, then a pupil of Vandini's[10] played a concerto for violoncello, which was much applauded. But now for what caused me the greatest surprise. Henriette rises and, praising the young man who had played the a solo, she takes his violoncello from him, telling him modestly and calmly that she would do it even better justice. She sits down in his place, takes the instrument between her knees, and asks the orchestra to begin the concerto over again. Most profound silence descends on the company, and deathly fear on me; but—thank God!—no one was looking at me. For her part, she did not dare. If she had raised her beautiful eyes to mine she would have lost courage. But seeing her merely strike the pose of being ready to play, I thought it was only a joke which would end with this really charming tableau; but when I saw her make the first stroke of the bow, I thought the excessive palpitation of my heart would strike me dead. Knowing me well, Henriette had no resource but never to look at me.

But what was not my state when I heard her play the a solo, and when after the first movement the applause almost deafened the orchestra? The transition from fear to a satisfaction as excessive as it was unexpected produced such a paroxysm in me as the most violent fever could not do at its height. The applause had not the slightest effect on Henriette, at least visibly. Without raising her eyes from the notes, which she knew only from having followed the entire concerto while the professor was playing, she did not rise until after she had played alone six times. She did not thank the company for having applauded her; but turning to the professor she told him, with an air of gracious and noble courtesy, that she had never played a better instrument. After thus complimenting him, she smilingly told the audience that they must forgive the vanity which had induced her to increase the length of the concert by half an hour.

This compliment having put the finishing touch to my astonishment, I vanished to go and weep in the garden, where no one could see me. Who can this Henriette be? What is this treasure whose master I have become? I thought it impossible that I should be the fortunate mortal who possessed her.

Lost in these reflections, which increased the pleasure of my tears, I should have stayed there for a long time if Dubois himself had not come to look for me and had not found me despite the darkness of the night. He summoned me to supper. I relieved his anxiety by telling him that a momentary dizziness had obliged me to come out to cure it by taking the air.

On the way I had time to dry my tears, but not to restore their normal color to the whites of my eyes.

However, no one noticed me. Only Henriette, seeing me reappear, told me by a sweet smile that she knew what I had gone to do in the garden. At table my place was opposite her.

The hunchbacked Dubois-Chatellerault, director of the Infante's mint, had assembled the most agreeable noblemen of the court at his house, and the supper which he gave them, of few but well-chosen dishes, was exquisite. Henriette being the only woman present, it was natural that all attention should be paid to her; but even if there had been others she was such as to eclipse them all. If she had astonished the entire company by her beauty and talent, she conquered them completely by her wit at table. Monsieur Dubois never said a word; considering himself the author of the play, he was proud of it and thought it his part to remain modestly silent. Henriette had the tact to be equally gracious to everyone and the intelligence never to say anything witty without including me. On my side, it was in vain that I pretended submission and the most profound respect for the goddess; she wanted everyone to understand that I was her oracle. The company might well think that she was my wife; but none of them could be sure of it from the manner in which I behaved toward her. The conversation having turned to the merits of the Spanish and French nations, Dubois was stupid enough to ask her which she preferred. The question could not have been more tactless, for half of the guests were Spanish and the other half French; for all that, she talked so well that the Spaniards wished they were French and the Frenchmen wished they were Spanish. Dubois, unquelled, asked her what she thought of the Italians, and at that I felt alarmed. A Monsieur de La Combe,[11] who was at my right, shook his head in disapproval of the question; but Henriette did not let it go unanswered.

"Concerning the Italians," she said uncertainly, "I can say nothing, for I know only one Italian, and a single example is not enough to put one nation above all others.''

I should have been the stupidest of men if I had shown the least sign that I had heard Henriette's magnificent answer, and even more stupid if I had not at once dismissed the odious subject by asking Monsieur de La Combe some banal question about the wine with which our glasses were filled.

The talk turned to music. A Spaniard asked Henriette if, besides the violoncello, she played any other instrument, and she answered that it was the only one for which she had ever felt any inclination.

''I learned in the convent,'' she said, ''in the hope of pleasing my mother, who plays it quite well; however, without a downright order from my father, supported by the Bishop, the Mother Abbess would never have allowed me to study.''

''And what reasons could the Abbess allege for refusing?''

''Pious bride of Our Lord that she was, she insisted that I could not hold the instrument except by assuming an indecent posture.''

At this dictum of the Abbess I saw the Spaniards bite their lips, but the Frenchmen roared with laughter. After a silence of a few minutes, Henriette having made a gesture which seemed to ask permission to rise, everyone rose, and a quarter of an hour later we left. Dubois attended her to the step of our carriage, thanking her endlessly.

I could not wait to clasp the idol of my soul in my arms. I did not give her time to answer all the questions I asked her.

''You were right,'' I said, ''not to want to go, for you were certain to make me enemies. At this moment I must be mortally hated; but you are my universe. Cruel Henriette! You very nearly killed me with your violoncello! As I could not believe that you would have kept it a secret, I thought you had gone mad, and as soon as I heard you I had to go out to dry the tears which you forced from my heart. Tell me now, I beg you, what other accomplishments you have which you are hiding from me and in which you excel, so that when they are manifested to me for the first time they will not make me die of terror or surprise.''

''No, my dear love, I have no others, I have emptied my sack, and now you know your Henriette completely. If you had not told me a month ago that you had no liking for music, I would have told you that I can play the instrument. If I had told you so, you could have got me one, and I do not wish to amuse myself with something which may bore you.''

No later than the next day I went and found her a violoncello; and she was very far from boring me with it. It is impossible for a man who has no marked passion for music not to become a passionate devotee of it when the person who performs it to perfection is the object of his love. The human voice of the violoncello, which is superior to that of any other instrument, went to my heart when Henriette played it, and she was convinced of it. She offered me the pleasure every day, and I suggested to her that she should give concerts; but she was prudent enough never to consent. Despite that, the course of destiny was not to be halted. Fata viam inveniunt (''Fate will find the way'').[12]

The day after his charming supper the ill-omened Dubois came to thank us, and at the same time to receive the praises which we bestowed on his concert, his supper, and the persons he had invited.

''I foresee, Madame, the difficulty I shall have in resisting the importunity with which I shall be asked for introductions to you.''

''You will not find it very difficult, Monsieur, since your answer can be put in a very few words. You know that I receive no one.''

He no longer dared speak of introductions. About this time I received a letter from the younger Capitani in which he told me that, being in possession of St. Peter's knife in its sheath, he had gone to Francia's with two learned men who were certain that they could bring up the treasure and had been surprised to find that he would not receive him. He asked me to write to him, and to go there myself, if I wanted to have my share. I did not answer him. I rejoiced that the good peasant, mindful of my instructions, was safe from the fools and the impostors who would have ruined him.

After Dubois's supper we spent three or four weeks lost in happiness. In the sweet union of our hearts and our souls not one empty moment ever came to show us that dreary specimen of misery known as a yawn. Our only outside diversion was a drive out of the city when the weather was fine. As we never left the carriage and never went anywhere, no one, either of the court or the city, had been able to make our acquaintance, despite the general curiosity about us and the desires which Henriette had inspired in all the men who had been present at Dubois's supper. She had become more courageous, and I more confident, after we found that no one had recognized her either at the theater or at the supper. She had no fear of finding the person who could reveal her identity except among the nobility.

One day when we were driving outside the Porta di Colorno,[13] we met the Infante and the Duchess on their way back to Parma. Fifty paces farther on we met a carriage in which we saw a nobleman with Dubois. Just as we would have drawn beyond them one of our horses fell. The nobleman who was with Dubois cried "Stop!" to send help to our coachman, who might need assistance. With dignified politeness he at once addressed the appropriate compliment under the circumstances to Henriette, and Dubois did not lose a moment in saying to her, "Madame, this is Monsieur Dutillot."[14] The usual bow was her answer. The horse got up, and in a minute we were on our way again. This perfectly simple meeting should have had no consequences; but it had one.

The next morning Dubois came to breakfast with us. He began by saying at once that Monsieur Dutillot, delighted with the fortunate chance which had given him the pleasure of making our acquaintance, had commissioned him to ask our permission to call on us.

"On Madame, or on me?" I answered instantly.

"On both."

"Very well," I replied; "but one at a time; for Madame, as you see, has her room, as I have mine. So far as I am concerned, it will be I who will hasten to wait on His Excellency if he has any order to give me or anything to communicate to me, and I beg you to tell him so. As for Madame, there she is, speak with her. I am only, my dear Monsieur Dubois, her most humble servant."

Thereupon Henriette calmly and with the utmost politeness told Monsieur Dubois to thank Monsieur Dutillot and at the same time to ask him if he knew her.

"I am certain, Madame, that he does not know you."

"You see? He does not know me, and he wants to call on me. You must admit that if I received him I should stamp myself an adventuress. Tell him that though no one knows me, I am not an adventuress; and that hence I cannot have the pleasure of receiving him."

Dubois, realizing the mistake he had made, said nothing more; and during the following days we did not ask him how the Minister had received our answer.

Another three or four weeks later, the court being at Colorno, a magnificent entertainment[15] was given—I forget on what occasion—during which everyone was allowed to walk about the gardens, which were to be illuminated all night. Dubois having frequently spoken of the entertainment, which was public, we were tempted to go to it, and Dubois himself accompanied us in our carriage. We went there the day before and put up at the inn.

Toward evening we went to walk in the gardens, where, as it happened, the sovereigns were present with a considerable suite. According to French court custom, the Infanta curtsied first to Henriette as soon as she saw her, but without stopping. I then noticed that a Chevalier of the Order of St. Louis[16] who was beside Don Filippo looked at Henriette with great attention. Retracing our steps, we met the same Chevalier halfway down the walk, whereupon, after excusing himself by a bow to us, he asked Dubois to hear something he had to say to him. They talked together for a quarter of an hour, walking behind us. We were about to leave the gardens when the same Chevalier, hurrying to overtake us, after politely begging my pardon, asked Henriette if he had the honor to be known to her.

"Monsieur, I have not the honor of knowing you."

"Madame, I am D'Antoine."[17]

"I do not remember, Monsieur, that I have ever had the honor of seeing you."

"That is enough, Madame—I beg you to forgive me."

Dubois told us that the gentleman, who had no post at court, being only the Infante's intimate friend, had asked him to present him to Madame, believing that he knew her. He had replied that her name was D'Arci and that if he knew her he had no need of his intervention in order to pay her a visit. Monsieur d'Antoine had replied that since the name D'Arci was unknown to him he had hoped that he was not making a mistake but that, wishing to resolve his uncertainty, he had taken it upon himself to approach her without being presented.

"And so," said Dubois, "now that he knows that Madame is not acquainted with him, he must be convinced that he was mistaken."

After supper I thought Henriette seemed uneasy, and

I asked her if she had pretended not to know Monsieur d'Antoine.

"It was not a pretense. I know his name. It is a family well known in Provence; but I do not know him."

"Is it possible that he knows you?"

"He may possibly have seen me; but he has certainly never talked with me, for I should have recognized him."

"The meeting makes me uneasy, and it seems to me that you are not unconcerned over it. Let us leave Parma, if you will, and go to Genoa; and when my business is settled we will go to Venice."

"Yes, my dear, we shall be more at ease then. But I think we have no need to hurry."

The next day we saw the masquerades, and on the day after that we went back to Parma. Two or three days later my young valet Caudagna handed me a letter, saying that the messenger who had brought it was waiting outside for the answer.

"This letter," I say to Henriette, "makes me uneasy."

She takes it from me and, after reading it, hands it back, saying that she believes that Monsieur d'Antoine is a man of honor and that hence we have nothing to fear. Here is the letter:

"Either at your lodging, Monsieur, or at my house, or wherever you please, at whatever hour you appoint, I ask you to enable me to tell you something which should be of great interest to you. I have the honor to be your very humble and obedient etc. D'Antoine. To Monsieur de Farussi."

"I think," I said, "that I should hear what he has to say. But where?"

"Neither here nor at his house, but in the palace garden. Your answer should contain nothing but the hour at which you wish to meet him."

In accordance with her advice I wrote him that I would be in the first walk of the ducal garden at half seraglio. After imperiously putting my sultana in the state of nature and doing the same to myself, I laid her down and subjugated her in the classic manner, delighting in her swoons. A pillow which I had fitted under her buttocks and one of her knees bent away from the back of the sofa must have afforded a most voluptuous vision for our hidden friend. After the frolic, which lasted an hour, she took off the sheath and rejoiced to see my quintessence in it; but finding, even so, that she was wet with her own distillations, we agreed that a brief ablution would restore us in statu quo. After that we stood side by side in front of a large upright mirror, each putting one arm around the other's back. Admiring the beauty of our images and becoming eager to enjoy them, we engaged in every kind of combat, still standing. After the last bout she fell onto the Persian carpet which covered the floor. With her eyes closed, her head to one side, lying on her back, her arms and legs as if she had just been taken down from a St. Andrew's cross,[21] she would have looked like a corpse if the beating of her heart had not been visible. The last bout had exhausted her. I made her do the "straight tree,"[22] and in that position I lifted her up to devour her chamber of love, which I could not reach otherwise since I wanted to make it possible for her, in turn, to devour the weapon which wounded her to death without taking her life.

Reduced after this exploit to asking her to grant me a truce, I set her on her feet again; but a moment later she challenged me to give her her revenge. It was my turn to do the "straight tree" and hers to grasp me by the hips and lift me up. In this position, steadying herself on her two diverging pillars, she was horrified to see her breasts splattered with my soul distilled in drops of blood.

"What do I see?" she cried, letting me fall and herself falling with me. Just then the alarm chimed.

I called her back to life by making her laugh.

CHAPTER V

Henriètte receives Monsieur d'Antoine. I lose that charming woman, whom I accompany as far as Geneva. I cross the Saint Bernard Pass and return to Parma. Letter from Henriette. My despair. De La Haye pursues my acquaintance. Unpleasant adventure with an actress; its consequences. I become a bigot. Bavois. I hoax a bragging officer.

AFTER HAVING repeated to Henriette, word for word, what Monsieur d'Antoine had said to me, I handed her the letter, which filled four pages. After she had read it she said that the honor of two families did not permit her to let me read it, and that she was now obliged to receive Monsieur d'Antoine, who, as she had just learned, was related to her.

"So now," I said, "the last act begins. Miserable wretch that I am! What a final scene! Our happiness is coming to its end. Why did we have to stay so long in Parma? What blindness on my part! Under the present circumstances there was not a place in all Italy more to be feared than this, and I chose it above all the rest of the earth, for, except in France, I believe, no one would have been likely to recognize you anywhere. And I am all the more a wretch because it is entirely my fault!—for you had no other will than mine; and you never concealed your fears. Could I have made a more stupid mistake than to permit Dubois to visit us? I should have foreseen that the man would manage to satisfy his curiosity in the end, a curiosity which is too natural for me to blame him for it and which in any case would not have existed if I had not first aroused it and then increased it by letting him visit us freely. But what use is it to think of all this now that it is too late? I foresee the most painful outcome that I can imagine."

"Alas, my dear! I beg you to foresee nothing. Let us only prepare ourselves to be superior to whatever may happen. I will not answer this letter. It is you who must write him to come here tomorrow at three o'clock in his carriage and to send in his name. You shall be with me when I receive him; but a quarter of an hour later you shall retire to your room on some excuse. Monsieur d'Antoine knows my whole story and in what I have done wrong, but he knows, too, in what I have done right, which obliges him, as a man of honor, to protect me from any affront, and he will do nothing except with my consent, and if he sees fit to depart from the conditions I will lay down I will not go to France: we will go and spend the rest of our days together wherever you choose. Yes, my dear. But remember that inevitable circumstances may compel us to consider our separation our best course, and that then we must adopt that course in such a way that we may hope not to be unhappy. Trust in me. Be sure that I shall find a way to assure myself of all the happiness that can be supposed possible if I am reduced to accepting the idea of living without you. You must take the same precaution for your future, and I am sure you will succeed; but meanwhile let us banish sadness so far as we can. If we had left here three days ago we might have made a mistake, for Monsieur d'Antoine might have decided to give my family a proof of his zeal by making inquiries into my whereabouts which would have exposed me to violent proceedings which your love could not have tolerated; and then God knows what would have happened."

I did all that she asked; but from that moment our love began to grow sad, and sadness is a disease which in the end kills love. We often spent an hour looking at each other and not saying a word.

The next day when Monsieur d'Antoine arrived I followed her instructions to the letter. I spent six very boring hours alone, pretending that I was writing. Since my door was open the same mirror by means of which I saw them might also enable them to see me. They spent the six hours writing, often interrupting what one or the other of them was setting down by remarks which must have been crucial. I could foresee nothing but the saddest of outcomes.

After Monsieur d'Antoine left, Henriette came to my table, and she smiled when she saw that I was looking at her eyes, which were swollen.

"Tell me," she asked, "shall we go away tomorrow?"

"Yes indeed. Where shall we go?"

"Wherever you please; but we must be back here in two weeks."

"Here?"

"Alas, yes. I gave my word that I would be here when the answer comes to the letter I wrote. I can assure you that we need fear no violence. But, my dear, I can no longer bear this city."

"Alas, I loathe it! Shall we go to Milan?"

"Excellent! To Milan, then."

"And since we have to return here, Caudagna and his sister can come with us."

"Excellent."

"Leave it to me. They shall have a carriage to themselves, in which they will take your violoncello; but it seems to me you must let Monsieur d'Antoine know where you are going."

"On the contrary, it seems to me that I should tell him nothing about it. So much the worse for him if he can doubt that I will return. It is quite enough that I promised him I would be here."

The next morning I bought a trunk, into which she put whatever she thought she needed, and we set off, followed by our servants, after telling Andremont to lock up our apartment.

At Milan we spent two weeks, concerned with nothing but ourselves, never going out, and seen only by a tailor, who made me a coat, and a seamstress, who made her two winter dresses. I also gave her a lynx pelisse, of which she was very fond. An instance of Henriette's delicacy which greatly pleased me was that she never asked me the slightest question concerning the state of my purse. My own delicacy prompted me never to give her reason to believe that my purse was exhausted. When we returned to Parma I still had three or four hundred zecchini.

The day after our return Monsieur d'Antoine came to dine with us uninvited, and after coffee I retired as I had the first time. Their conference continued as long as the one in which Henriette had made her decision, and after the Chevalier's departure she came and told me that it was over, that her destiny decreed that we must part.

"When?" I asked her, clasping her in my arms and mingling my tears with hers.

"As soon as we reach Geneva, to which you will take me. You must set about tomorrow finding a respectable-looking woman with whom I will travel to France and the city to which I must go."

"Then we shall be together for a few days more? But I know no one except Dubois who can find you a woman of decent appearance, and I am troubled by the thought that the same woman may satisfy his curiosity concerning what you would not have him know."

"He will know nothing, for in France I will find another."

Dubois accepted the commission as a great honor, and three or four days later himself brought Henriette a middle-aged woman, passably well dressed, who considered herself fortunate to have found an opportunity to return to France. She was the widow of an officer who had recently died. Henriette told her to be in readiness to leave as soon as Monsieur Dubois sent her word. On the day before our departure Monsieur d'Antoine, after dining with us, gave Henriette a letter to read, addressed to Geneva, which he afterwards sealed and which she put in her pocket.

We set out from Parma at nightfall, and we stopped at Turin for only two hours to engage a manservant to wait on us as far as Geneva. The next day we ascended Mont Cenis[1] in sedan chairs, then descended to La Novalaise by sledge.[2] On the fifth day we reached Geneva and put up at the "Scales."[3] The next day Henriette gave me a letter addressed to the banker Tronchin,[4] who had no sooner read it than he told me he would come to the "Scales" in person to bring me a thousand louis.[5]

We were still at table when he appeared to discharge the obligation and at the same time to tell Henriette that he would give her two men for whom he would vouch. She told him that she would leave as soon as he should bring them to her and she should have the carriage she needed, as he must have learned from the letter I had delivered to him. After assuring her that she would have everything the next day, he left and we remained alone together, gloomy and pensive, as one is when the most profound sorrow weighs on the mind.

I broke the silence to say that the carriage which Tronchin would furnish her could not possibly be more comfortable than mine, and, that being so, she would be doing me a favor by keeping it for herself and letting me have the one the banker would give her; and she assented. At the same time she gave me five rolls of a hundred louis each, herself putting them in my pocket. A poor consolation for my heart, only too oppressed by so cruel a parting. During the last twenty-four hours the only eloquence we could muster was that which sighs, tears, and the tenderest embraces bestow on two happy lovers who have come to the end of their happiness and are forced by stern reason to accept the fact.

Henriette held out no illusory hopes to assuage my grief. She asked me not to make any inquiries about her and to pretend that I did not know her if, traveling in France, I should ever meet her anywhere. She gave me a letter to deliver to Monsieur d'Antoine in Parma, forgetting to ask me if I intended to return there; but I instantly resolved to do so. She asked me not to leave Geneva until after I had received a letter from her which she would write me from the first place at which she stopped to change horses. She left at daybreak, with her waiting-woman beside her and a footman on the coachman's seat and another ahead on horseback. I did not go back upstairs to our room until after I had followed the carriage with my eyes and long after I lost it from sight. After ordering the waiter not to enter my room until the horses with which Henriette was traveling should have returned, I went to bed, hoping that sleep would come to the aid of my grief-stricken soul, which my tears could not relieve.

The postilion returning from Châtillon[6] did not arrive until the following day. He gave me a letter from Henriette, in which I found only one word: "Farewell." He told me that no accident had befallen her and that she had continued her journey, taking the road to Lyons. Since I could not leave until the next morning, I spent one of the saddest days of my life alone in my room. On one of its two windows I saw written: "You will forget Henriette too." She had written the words with the point of a small diamond, set in a ring, which I had given her.

The prophecy was not of a nature to console me; but in how absolute a sense had she used the word "forget"? She could really mean no more than that the wound would heal, and since that was only natural she need not have gone to the trouble of making me a distressing prophecy. No. I have not forgotten her, and it is balm to my soul every time I remember her. When I consider that what makes me happy in my present old age is the presence of my memory, I conclude that my long life must have been more happy than unhappy, and after thanking God, cause of all causes and sovereign contriver—we know not how—of all combinations, I congratulate myself.

The next day I set out for Italy with a servant whom Monsieur Tronchin gave me. Despite the unfavorable season, I took the route through the Saint Bernard, which I crossed in three days on the seven mules required for ourselves, my trunk, and the carriage intended for my beloved. A man overwhelmed by a great sorrow has the advantage that nothing seems painful to him. It is a kind of despair which also has a certain sweetness. I felt neither hunger nor thirst nor the cold which froze all nature in that terrible part of the Alps. I reached Parma in reasonably good health, purposely going to lodge in a bad inn at the end of the bridge, where I was not at all pleased to find Monsieur de La Haye lodged in a small room next to the one which the innkeeper gave me. Surprised to see me there, he addressed me a long compliment intended to make me talk; but I answered only that I was tired and that we would see each other.

The next day I did not go out except to deliver Henriette's letter to Monsieur d'Antoine. Finding, when he unsealed it, that it contained a letter addressed to me, he gave it to me without reading it. But as it was not sealed he thought that Henriette must have intended that he should read it, and he asked me for permission to do so after I had read it to myself in a murmur. Handing it back to me, he said that he and all his credit were at my disposal on any occasion. Here is a copy of the letter Henriette wrote me:

"It is I, my only love, who had to forsake you. Do not add to your grief by thinking of mine. Let us imagine that we have had a pleasant dream, and let us not complain of our destiny, for never was an agreeable dream so long. Let us boast of having succeeded in being happy for three months on end; there are few mortals who can say as much. So let us never forget each other, and let us often recall our love to renew it in our souls, which, though parted, will enjoy it even more intensely. Do not inquire for me, and if chance brings you to know who I am, be as if you did not know it. Rest assured, my dear, that I have so ordered my affairs that for the rest of my life I shall be as happy as I can be without you. I do not know who you are; but I know that no one in the world knows you better than I do. I will have no more lovers in all my life to come; but I hope that you will not think of doing likewise. I wish you to love again, and even to find another Henriette. Farewell."

The reader will see where, and under what circumstances, I met Henriette again fifteen years later.[7]

As soon as I was alone in my room all I could do was go to bed after locking my door, without even bothering to order something to eat. Such is the effect of a great sorrow. It stupefies; it does not make its victim want to kill himself, for it stops thought; but it does not leave him the slightest ability to do anything toward living. I found myself in a like state six years later—but not on account of love—when I was put under the Leads,[8] and again twenty years later, in 1786 at Madrid, when I was imprisoned at Buen Retiro.[9]

At the end of twenty-four hours I found my state of inanition not unpleasant; even the thought that, by increasing, it might cost me my life did not strike me as consoling, but it did not frighten me. I was glad to see that no one came to my room to disturb me by asking if I did not want to eat something. I was glad that, immediately after I arrived, I had dismissed the servant who had attended me when I crossed the Alps. After twenty-four hours of fasting my prostration was marked.

In these straits it was De La Haye who came and knocked at my door. I would not have answered him had he not said as he knocked that someone had the most urgent reasons for talking with me. I get up and open my door for him, then go back to bed.

"A foreigner," he says, "who needs a carriage wishes to buy yours."

"I do not want to sell it."

"Then please excuse me; but you seem very ill."

"Yes; I need to be left in peace."

"From what illness are you suffering?"

He approaches, he has difficulty in finding my pulse, he is disturbed, he asks me what I had eaten the day before; and upon learning that nothing had entered my stomach for two days, he guesses the truth and becomes alarmed. He entreats me to take some broth, with such solicitude that he persuades me. Then, never mentioning Henriette, he preaches me a sermon on the life to come and on the vanity of this mortal life, though it is our duty to preserve it since we have not the right to deprive ourselves of it. I answer nothing; but determined not to leave me, he orders a light dinner three or four hours later and, when he saw me eat it, he was exultant and he entertained me all the rest of the day with the latest news.

The next day I asked him to keep me company at dinner; and considering that I owed him my life I gave him my friendship; but in a very short time my fondness for him became unbounded because of the event which I will now recount to my reader in detail.

Two or three days later Dubois, to whom De La Haye had told the whole story, came to see me, and I began going out. I went to the theater, where I made the acquaintance of some Corsican officers who had served in the Royal Italian Regiment in the service of France,[10] and of a young Sicilian named Paterno, who was the pattern of recklessness. Being in love with an actress who scorned him, the young man kept me entertained with his description of her adorable qualities and at the same time of her cruelty toward him, whom she received in her house but whom she repulsed whenever he tried to give her evidence of his love. She was ruining him by making him spend a great deal on dinners and suppers which were shared by her numerous family but for which she gave him no credit.

After attentively examining the woman on the stage and finding that she had some merit, I became curious about her, and Paterno was glad to take me to her house. Finding her decidedy approachable and knowing that she was poor, I had no doubt that I could obtain her favors at the cost of fifteen or twenty zecchini. I imparted my plan to Paterno, who laughed and said that she would no longer receive me if I dared make her such a proposal. He gave me the names of several officers whom she had declined to see again after they had made her proposals of the same sort; but he said he would be delighted if I made the attempt and afterwards would tell him frankly what had happened. I promised that I would tell him everything.

It was in her dressing room at the theater that, being alone with her and hearing her admire my watch, I offered it to her as the price of her favors. Handing it back to me, she replied in accordance with the catechism of her trade:

"A man of honor," she said, "can make such proposals only to whores."

When I told the story to Paterno I saw that he was triumphant; but his urgings were of no avail; I refused to attend any more of his suppers—utterly boring suppers at which, even as they were eating them, the actress's whole family laughed at the stupidity of the dupe who was paying for them.

A week or so later Paterno told me that the actress had related the incident to him exactly as I had reported it and had added that I no longer went to call on her for fear she would take me at my word if I made her the same proposal again. I asked the young scapegrace to tell her that I would call on her again, being certain not only that I would not make her the same proposal but also that I would not want her even if she were ready to give herself to me for nothing.

My young friend repeated my words so well that the actress, cut to the quick, charged him to tell me that she challenged me to visit her. Thoroughly determined to convince her that I despised her, I went to her dressing room again at the end of the second act of a play in which she had finished her role. After dismissing someone who was with her, she said she had something to say to me.

She locked her door; then, sitting on my knees, she asked me if it was true that I despised her so greatly. My answer was brief. I went to the point and, without a thought of bargaining, she surrendered at discretion. Yet duped, as I always am, by compassion, which is forever out of place when an intelligent man has to do with women of this sort, I gave her twenty zecchini, which she much preferred to my watch. Afterwards we laughed together at the stupidity of Paterno, who did not know how such challenges were bound to end.

I told him the next day that I had been bored and that I would not call on her again; and, as I was no longer curious about her, this was my intention; but the reason which compelled me to keep my promise to him was that three days later I found that the wretched woman had made me the same sort of present that I had been treated to by the prostitute at O'Neilan's. Far from feeling that I had cause to complain, I considered myself justly punished for having so basely abandoned myself after having belonged to an Henriette.

I thought it best to confide in Monsieur de La Haye, who dined with me every day, making no secret of his poverty. The worthy man, who deserved respect both for his age and his appearance, put me into the hands of a surgeon named Frémont,[11] who was also a dentist. Certain symptoms which he recognized decided him to put me through the great cure.[12] Because of the season the cure compelled me to spend six weeks in my room.

But during those six weeks De La Haye's company infected me with a disease far worse than the pox,[14] and one to which I thought I was immune. De La Haye, who only left me for an hour in the morning to say his prayers in church, turned me into a bigot, and to such an extent that I agreed with him that I should consider myself fortunate to have caught a disease which had brought salvation to my soul. I sincerely thanked God for having made use of Mercury[15] to lead my mind, until then wrapped in darkness, to the light of truth. There is no doubt that this change in my method of reasoning proceeded from the mercury. That impure and always very dangerous metal so weakened my mind that I thought I had reasoned most erroneously until then. I came to the point of deciding to lead an entirely different life after I was cured. De La Haye often wept with me in his satisfaction at seeing me weep as a result of the genuine contrition which, with incredible skill, he had implanted in my poor, sick soul. He talked to me of Paradise and of the things of the next world as if he had been there in person, and I did not laugh at him. He had accustomed me to renounce my reason, where to renounce it one had to be a fool. No one knew, he said to me one day, whether God created the world at the spring or at the autumn equinox.

"Granted creation," I answered, despite the mercury, "the question becomes puerile, for the season cannot be determined except in relation to some part of the earth."

De La Haye persuaded me that I must stop reasoning in this fashion, and I surrendered. He had been a Jesuit; but not only would he not admit it, he would not allow the subject to be raised with him. Here is the discourse with which he one day put the finishing touch to his seduction of me:

"After being educated at school, cultivating the sciences and the arts with some success, and spending twenty years at the University of Paris, I served in the army in the corps of engineers, and I published books, though without putting my name to them, which are still used in every school for the instruction of youth. Not being rich, I undertook the education of several youths who now shine in the world even more by their conduct than by their abilities. My last pupil was the Marchese Botta.[16] Being now without employment, I live, as you see, trusting in God. Four years ago I met the Baron de Bavois,[17] a young Swiss, a native of Lausanne, son of the general of the same name, who had a regiment in the service of the Duke of Modena,[18] and who later had the misfortune to give occasion to too much talk.[19] The young Baron, a Calvinist like his father, having no liking for the idle life he could have led at home, asked me to teach him what I had taught the Marchese Botta so that he could pursue a military career. Delighted that I could foster his honorable predilection, I left every other occupation to devote myself to him. In the conversations I had with the young man I discovered that he knew that in the matter of religion he lived in error. He remained in it only because of the consideration which he owed his family. After wringing his secret from him I easily brought him to see that it was a matter of paramount concern, since his eternal salvation depended on it. Impressed by this truth, he abandoned himself to my affection. I took him to Rome and presented him to Benedict XIV, who, after his abjuration, procured him a post in the Duke of Modena's forces, in which he is now serving with the rank of lieutenant. But since my dear proselyte, who is now only twenty-five, receives only seven zecchini a month, he has not enough to live on. His change of religion results in his receiving nothing from his parents, who are horrified by his apostasy. He would have no choice but to go back to Lausanne if I did not assist him. But alas! being myself poor and without employment, I can only assist him by the pittance I obtain for him from the purses of the charitable souls whom I know. Having a grateful heart, my pupil would like to know his benefactors; but they do not wish to be known, and they are right, for charity ceases to be a meritorious action if he who distributes it cannot keep it free from all vanity. For my part—thank God!—I have no cause for vanity. I am only too happy to be able to serve as father to a young predestinate, and to have had a share, as a weak instrument, in the salvation of his soul. This good, handsome youth trusts only in me. He writes to me twice a week. Discretion forbids me to give you his letters to read, but you would weep if you read them. It was to him that I yesterday sent the three louis which I had from you."

At the end of this speech De La Haye rose and went to the window to blow his nose and hurriedly dry his tears. Feeling moved and admiring so much virtue in De La Haye and in his pupil the Baron, who, to save his soul, had reduced himself to living on charity, I wept too. In my budding piety I told the apostle that not only did I not want the Baron to know that it was I who was helping him but I did not even want to know how much I was giving him, and that I therefore begged him to take from my purse whatever he might need, without rendering any account to me. At that, De La Haye came to my bedside with open arms and said as he embraced me that by thus obeying the Gospels to the letter, I was following the one sure road to the Kingdom of Heaven.

The mind obeys the body. With my stomach empty, I became a fanatic; the mercury must have made a hollow in the region of my brain, in which enthusiasm had taken its seat. Unknown to De La Haye, I began writing Signor Bragadin[20] and my two other friends letters about the man and his pupil which communicated all my fanaticism to them. My reader knows that this disease of the mind is infectious. I urged it upon them that the greatest good of our little society depended upon our adding these two persons to it. "It is God's will," I said, "that you should employ all your resources to find some honorable employment in Venice for Monsieur de La Haye and in the army for young Bavois."

Signor Bragadin wrote me that De La Haye could stay with us in his palace, and that Bavois could write to his patron the Pope asking him to recommend him to the Venetian Ambassador,[21] a letter from whom to the Senate conveying the Holy Father's wish would, as things now stood, assure him of a post. The affair of the Patriarchate of Aquileia[22] was then being negotiated, and the Republic, which was in possession of it, as well as the House of Austria, which claimed the jus eligendi,[23] had appointed Benedict XIV to arbitrate it. It was clear that the Senate would accord the greatest attention to the wish of the Pontiff, who had not yet handed down his decision.

When I received this crucial answer I informed De La Haye of all that I had done in the matter; and I saw that he was astonished. He instantly grasped all the force and the truth of old Senator Bragadin's reasoning, and he sent his dear Bavois a magnificent letter in Latin to copy and send at once to His Holiness, in the certainty that he would be granted the favor he asked. After all, it was only a recommendation.

While this matter was being pursued and we were waiting for a letter from Venice which would tell us the effect of the Pontiff's recommendation, a comic adventure which befell me will perhaps be not unentertaining to my reader.

At the beginning of April, completely cured of the wounds of Venus and restored to my original vigor, going all day to churches and sermons with my converter, I also went with him to spend the evenings at a coffeehouse, where we found good company in the persons of several officers. The one who kept everyone amused by his boasting was a Provençal in uniform who narrated the military exploits which had distinguished him in the service of several powers and chiefly of Spain. To keep him talking, everyone pretended to believe him. Once as I was looking at him closely he asked me if I knew him.

"By Heaven," I said, "how could I fail to know you, since we were together at the Battle of Arbela?"[24]

Hearing this, the whole company burst out laughing; but the braggart said petulantly that there was nothing to laugh at, for he had been there and was beginning to think he recognized me. He then told me the name of the regiment in which we served, and after embracing we ended by mutual congratulations on the good fortune we had had to meet again in Parma. Having had my fun, I went back to my inn with De La Haye.

The next morning I was still at table with him in my room when I saw the braggart come in and address me without taking off his hat:

"Monsieur d'Arbela, I have something important to say to you, so hurry and let us go out together; and if you are afraid, bring anyone you please along with you—I am good for a dozen."

I quickly rise, and snatching up a pistol I tell him that no one has the right to come and disturb me in my room, so I order him to leave.

My man then draws his sword, daring me to murder him; but De La Haye, by stamping on the floor, brought up the innkeeper, who warned the officer that he would send for the guard if he did not leave. He left, saying that I had insulted him in public and that he would see to it that the satisfaction I owed him would be public. After he left, seeing that the joke could have tragic consequences, I discussed with De La Haye how best to set things right, but we did not need to talk long. A half hour later an officer of Don Filippo's came to order me to go at once to the main guardpost, where Signor Bartoloni,[25] the Town Major, had something to say to me. I asked De La Haye to come with me, as a witness both to what I had said in the coffeehouse and to the way the man had come to attack me in my own room.

I found the Town Major with four or five officers, among whom I saw the one in question. Signor Bartoloni, who was a wit, smiled slightly when he saw me, then with the utmost seriousness told me that since I had publicly made fun of the officer whom I saw present, he was justified in demanding public satisfaction, and that he, as Town Major, was in duty bound to oblige me to give it to him so that the whole affair would be amicably settled.

"There is no question of satisfaction, Major, since it is not true that I insulted him by ridiculing him. I told him that I thought I had seen him at the Battle of Arbela, and I no longer doubted it when he told me not only that he had been present at it but that he recognized me."

"Yes," said the officer, interrupting me, "but I heard Rodela,[26] not Arbela, and everyone knows I was there. But you said Arbela, and you can only have said it to ridicule me, for it is more than two thousand years since that battle was fought, whereas the Battle of Rodela, in Africa, is of our own time—I served in it under the Duke of Montemar."[27]

"If you tell me so, I believe you; and it is I who demand satisfaction from you if you dare to deny that I was at the Battle of Arbela. I was aide-de-camp to Parmenio,[28] and I was wounded at it. I cannot show you the scar for, as you can imagine, I had a different body. As I stand before you, I am only twenty-three years old."[29]

"All this strikes me as madness; but in any case I have witnesses that you ridiculed me, for you said that you saw me and, by God! you cannot have seen me because I was not there. I demand satisfaction."

"I also have witnesses that you told me you had seen me at Rodela, though I was not there either."

"I may have been mistaken."

"And so may I; hence we have no claims on each other."

The Major, who could no longer contain his laughter, seeing the serious air with which I had been trying to convince the officer that he was wrong, told him that he could not demand the least satisfaction, since I admitted that I might have been mistaken.

"But," he answered, "is it credible that he was at Arbela?"

"He leaves you at liberty to believe it or not to believe it, just as he is at liberty to say that he was present at it. Will you maintain against him, sword in hand, that he is lying?"

"God forbid! I prefer to consider the matter settled."

The Major thereupon invited us to embrace each other, which we did with the best of grace, and the next day the Rodomonte[30] came and asked me to dinner. Signor Bartoloni invited us to dinner too; but as I did not feel like laughing I declined.

CHAPTER VI

I receive good news from Venice, to which I return, taking De La Haye and Bavois with me. Excellent reception from my three friends, and their surprise at finding me a model of devotion. Bavois leads me back to my former life. De La Haye a true hypocrite. Adventure with the Marchetti girl. I win in the lottery. I meet Balletti again. De La Haye leaves the Palazzo Bragadin. I set off for Paris.

DURING THESE days I received word from Venice that the cases against me[1] had been forgotten, and at the same time a letter from Signor Bragadin in which he told me that the Savio di Settimana[2] had written the Ambassador that he could assure the Holy Father that when the Baron de Bavois presented himself steps would be taken to give him a post in the troops of the Republic, which would enable him to live honorably and to entertain the highest hopes from his own merit.

With this letter in my hand, I rejoiced the heart of De La Haye, who, seeing at the same time that since my difficulties had been resolved I would return to my native country, determined to go to Modena to have a talk with Bavois and decide on the new course of action which he should adopt in Venice in order to enter upon the road to fortune. He could have no doubt either of my sincerity or my friendship or my loyalty; he saw that

I had become a fanatic and he knew that it is usually an incurable disease when the causes which have produced it remain in operation, and, by himself coming to Venice, he hoped to keep them active. So he wrote to Bavois that he was coming to see him; and two days later he took leave of me, melting into tears, praising my soul and my virtues, calling me his son, and assuring me that he had not become attached to me until after he had seen the divine mark of predestination stamped on my physiognomy. Such was his language.

Two or three days later I went to Ferrara and from there to Venice by way of Rovigo, Padua, and Fusina,[3] where I left my carriage. After a year's absence my friends received me as if I were an angel come from Heaven to make them happy. They showed the greatest impatience to witness the arrival of the two sainted souls whom I had promised them in my letters. A lodging for De La Haye was already prepared, and two furnished rooms for Bavois had also been found in the neighborhood, for political considerations did not permit Signor Bragadin to give lodging in his palace to a foreigner[4] who was not yet admitted into the service of the Republic.

But their surprise was extreme when they could not but observe the wonderful change in the life I led. To mass every day, often to sermons, my assiduity in attending the "forty hours,"[5] no casinos, a coffeehouse where the company consisted only in men of known prudence, and continual study in my room when their duties kept them out of the house. My new behavior compared with my old habits made them adore Divine Providence and its incomprehensible ways. They blessed the crimes which had obliged me to spend a year far from my country. What further astonished them was that I began by paying all my debts, without asking a soldo from Signor Bragadin, who, not having sent me anything for a year, had taken care of all my money.

They were delighted to see that I had become averse to any kind of gaming.

At the beginning of May I received a letter from De La Haye in which he told me that he was about to embark with the dear son of his soul to put himself under the orders of the respectable persons to whom I had announced him.

Making sure of the hour at which the barca corriere[6] from Modena would arrive, we all went to meet him, except Signor Bragadin, who was at the Senate that day. He found all five of us at his palace and welcomed the two strangers as warmly as they could wish. De La Haye at once told me countless things; but I listened to him only with my ears, for Bavois engrossed my entire attention; I saw in him an entirely different person from the one I expected from the description of him which he had given me. I spent three days studying him before I could resolve upon a genuine attachment, for this is a portrait of the youth, who was twenty-five years of age:

Of middle height, handsome, very well built, blond, gay, always equable, speaking well and wittily, and expressing himself modestly and respectfully. His features were agreeable and regular, he had fine teeth, a good head of hair, elegantly curled and exhaling the scent of the excellent pomade with which he dressed it. This individual, who in neither substance nor form resembled the one De La Haye had portrayed for me, also surprised my friends. However, they were no less cordial to him on that account, nor did they form any judgment prejudicial to the good opinion they were bound to have of his morals.

As soon as I saw Monsieur de La Haye well settled in his room it fell to me to conduct the Baron de Bavois to his apartment, not very far from the Palazzo Bragadin, whither I had already had his few pieces of baggage carried. As soon as he found that he was excellently lodged in the house of a worthy citizen and his wife, who, having been well schooled beforehand, began by showing him a thousand attentions, he embraced me affectionately, assuring me of his entire friendship and of the profound gratitude he felt for all that I had done for him without knowing him and of which Monsieur de La Haye had informed him in full. I replied that I did not know to what he was referring; and I turned the conversation to the kind of life he wished to lead in Venice until the time when a post would give him an obligatory occupation. He answered that he hoped we would amuse ourselves very pleasantly, since he believed that his tastes were not different from mine. What I noticed at once was that he immediately attracted the hostess's two daughters, who were neither pretty nor ugly, but whom he at once flattered with an affability which could not but make them believe they had attracted him. I thought it common politeness. For the first day I only took him to the Piazza San Marco and to a coffeehouse until suppertime. It went without saying that he would dine and sup every day at Signor Bragadin's. At table he made an impression with apt remarks; and Signor Dandolo[7] appointed the hour on the following morning at which he would call for him to present him to the Savio for War.[8] After supper I took him to his lodging, where I left him in the hands of the two daughters of the household, who said they were delighted that the young Swiss nobleman whose arrival we had announced to them had no servant, as they had feared he might, for they undertook to convince him that he could do without.

The next morning I went to call for him with Signor Dandolo and Signor Barbaro, who were to introduce him to the Savio. We found the young Baron at his toilet under the delicate hands of the elder daughter of the house, who was dressing his hair and whose skill he praised. His room was fragrant with pomade and scented waters. My friends were in no way scandalized; but I observed their surprise, for they did not expect to see so great a show of worldliness in the convert. What almost made me burst out laughing was that, upon Signor Dandolo's remarking that if we did not hurry we should not have time to go to mass, the Baron asked him if it was a feast day. He answered that it was not, without adding any comment; but in the days that followed there was no longer any question of mass. I let them go, and we met again at dinner, where the talk was of the reception the Savio had given him; and in the afternoon my friends took him to visit their patrician relatives of the female sex, who were all pleased to see the charming young man. Thus in less than a week he had edged into society and was in no danger of being bored; but during the same week I became thoroughly acquainted with his character and his way of thinking. It would not have taken me so long if I had not entertained contrary preconceptions: Bavois loved women, gambling, and spending money, and, since he was poor, women were his chief resources. As for religion, he had none; and since he had the shining virtue of not being a hypocrite, he did not hide it from me.

"How," I asked him one day, "did you manage, being what you are, to deceive De La Haye?"

"Heaven preserve me from deceit! De La Haye knows the system I follow and my way of thinking, he knows me funditus ('thoroughly'). Pious as he is, he fell in love with my soul, and I let him. He has done me good; I am grateful to him, and I love him, and the more so because he never bores me by talking dogma and eternal salvation to me. It is all settled between us."

The amusing part of the business is that in the same week Bavois not only restored my mind to the state it was in when I parted from Henriette but made me blush to have been duped by De La Haye, who, though he played the role of thorough Christian to perfection, could nevertheless be nothing but a thorough hypocrite. Bavois opened my eyes, and I quickly resumed all my old ways. But let us return to De La Haye.

A man who at bottom cared for nothing but his own well-being, well on in years, and with no inclination for the sex, he was precisely the person to enchant my friends. Talking to them of nothing but God, angels, and eternal glory, always going to one church or another with them, they adored him, and they could not wait for the moment when he would reveal himself, for they imagined he was a Rosicrucian,[9] or at least the hermit of Carpegna[10] who, teaching me the cabala, had made me a present of the immortal Paralis.[11] They were distressed that, by the very words of the oracle, I had forbidden them ever to speak of my science in De La Haye's presence. This left me free to enjoy all the time I should have had to devote to their pious curiosity; and in any case I could not but fear De La Haye, for, such as I saw him to be, he would never have lent himself to my nonsense and he would probably even have tried to disabuse my friends in order to supplant me.

In the short space of three weeks I saw him obtain such an ascendancy over their minds that he was foolish enough to think not only that he had no further need of me to maintain his standing but that he had standing enough to knock me head over heels if he felt so inclined. I saw this from the different tone in which he talked to me and from the difference in his behavior. He began having private secrets with the three of them, and he had persuaded them to introduce him in houses which I did not frequent. He began giving himself airs, though always with a smile, and complaining, though in honeyed words, when I spent the night no one knew where. It began to annoy me that, when he preached me his gentle sermons at table in the presence of my friends and his proselyte, he appeared to regard me as one who was leading him astray. He did it as if in jest; but I was not taken in. I put an end to his game by going to call on him in his room and telling him frankly that, as a votary of the Gospels, I would now tell him in private what on another occasion I would say to him in public.

"What is it, my dear friend?"

"Take care in future not to treat me to any more of your jibes about the life I lead with Bavois, in the presence of my three friends. Privately, I will always listen to you gladly."

"You are wrong to take a certain jesting seriously."

"Why do you never aim at the Baron? Be prudent in future, or fear that, no less in jest, I may treat you to a reply which I spared you yesterday but which I will not spare you at the first opportunity."

During these same days I spent an hour with my three friends giving them instructions from the oracle never to do anything which Valentin (it was by his baptismal name that the oracle named him) might suggest to them without first consulting me. I had no doubt that they would obey the order. De La Haye, who did not fail to see a certain change, began to behave more sensibly. Bavois, whom I informed of my action, praised it. I was already thoroughly convinced that De La Haye had been of service to him only out of weakness—in other words, that he would have done nothing for him if he had not had a pretty face, though Bavois would never admit it. He did not have experience enough to admit it. The young man, seeing that giving him a post was constantly put off, entered the service of the French Ambassador;[12] which compelled him not only to cease visiting Signor Bragadin but also to stop seeing De La Haye because he was lodging in that nobleman's house. This is one of the most inviolable laws of the sovereign guardians of the Republic. Neither patricians nor their households may have the slightest connection with the households of foreign envoys.[13] But the step which Bavois took did not prevent my friends from soliciting a post for him; and they succeeded, as will be seen later in these memoirs.

Carlo,[14] the husband of Cristina, whom I never went to see, urged me to go to the casino to which his aunt went with his wife after her confinement. I found her charming and speaking Venetian like her husband. At the casino I met a chemist who made me wish to take a course in chemistry. Going to spend the evening at his house with him, I became curious about a girl who, living in a house next to his, came in to keep his old wife company. At the first hour of night[15] a servingwoman would come to fetch her and she would leave. I had spoken to her of the inclination she had inspired in me only once, and that in the presence of the chemist's old wife, when I was surprised to see no more of her and said so. She answered that apparently her cousin the Abate, with whom she lived, having learned that I visited her house, had become jealous and would no longer allow her to come.

"A cousin who is an abate, and jealous?"

"Why not? He lets her out only on feast days to go to the first mass at Santa Maria Mater Domini,[16] which is only twenty paces from his house. He let her come to my house because he knew that no one visited here; and apparently it was the servingwoman who told him she had seen you."

Jealous men being my abhorrence even as my own amorous vagaries are my delight, I write the girl that if she would leave her cousin for me I would set her up a house in which she would be mistress and in which, living with her as her lover, I would provide her with an enjoyable circle of acquaintances and see that she had all the pleasures which a girl like herself should enjoy in a city like Venice. In the same letter, which I gave her in the church to which she went to mass, I said that she would see me on the next feast day to give me an answer.

She answered that since the Abate was her tyrant, she would think herself happy if she could escape from his hands; but that she could not resolve to do so unless I was willing to marry her. She ended her letter by saying that if I had that honorable intention I had only to speak to Giovanna Marchetti, her mother, who lived at Lusia. This town is thirty miles from Venice.

Her letter annoyed me because I thought she had written it in concert with the Abate. Convinced that they meant to trap me, and in any case considering the proposal that I should marry her both absurd and impudent, I decided to avenge myself; but as I needed to know everything I went to Lusia to call on the widow Giovanna Marchetti, the girl's mother.

The woman was greatly flattered, after reading the letter her daughter had written me, to hear me say that I felt inclined to marry her, but that I could never bring myself to do so as long as she continued to live with the Abate.

"The Abate," she replied, "who is distantly related to me, owned and lived alone in the same house in Venice in which he is now living with my daughter. Two years ago he told me that he urgently needed a housekeeper and that he was inclined to take my daughter, who could easily find a good opportunity to marry, once she was in Venice. He offered me an engagement in writing in which he undertook to give her, when she married, his furniture, valued at a thousand ducati correnti,[18] and to make her his heir to an estate he owns here which brings him in a hundred ducati a year. As I thought the bargain a good one, and my daughter was satisfied with it, he gave me the stipulated deed in the presence of a notary; and my daughter went with him. I know that he keeps her like a slave; but it was her own wish. You can well imagine that all I want in the world is to see her married."

"Then come with me to Venice; remove her from the Abate's keeping, and, receiving her from you, I will marry her; never otherwise. If I received her from him, marrying her would dishonor me."

"Not at all, for he is her cousin, though in the fourth degree; what is more, he is a priest and says mass every day."

"You make me laugh. Take her back with you; otherwise you will never see her married."

"If I take her back he will never give her his furniture and he may sell his estate."

"Leave it to me. I will have her out of his custody and restored to your arms with all the furniture, and when she is my wife I will have her landed property. If you knew me you would have no doubt of it. Come to Venice, and I assure you that in four or five days you will be back here with her."

She read the letter her daughter had written me through again, she thought for a little, then said that she was a poor widow and had no money either for the journey to Venice or to stay there.

"At Venice you will have whatever you need; but in any case here are ten zecchini."

"Ten zecchini? I can come with my sister-in-law."

"Come with anyone you please. Let us go at once to spend the night at Chioggia, and we will dine tomorrow in Venice."

We slept in Chioggia, and the next day at seventeen o'clock[19] we reached Venice. I lodged the two women in Castello[20] in a house in which the second story was completely unfurnished. I left them there, taking the priest's deed with me, and after dining with my friends, to whom I explained that I had spent the night in Chioggia to settle an important matter, I called on the advocate Marco da Lezze,[21] who, after hearing the whole story, told me that if the mother would present a petition in person to the heads of the Council of Ten,[22] she would at once be given the authority and the necessary assistance to remove her daughter from the priest's custody together with all the furniture in his house, which she could have carried wherever she might please. I told him to draw up the petition, which I would come to fetch the following morning, accompanied by the mother, who would sign it.

So she came with me to the advocate's, and from there we went to the Bussola,[23] where she presented the petition to the heads of the Ten. A quarter of an hour later a fante[24] of the tribunal was ordered to accompany the woman to the priest's house and put her in possession of her daughter, who was to leave the house with all the furniture she wished to take.

The order was carried out to the letter. I was present with the mother in a gondola at the quay of the piazza near the house and with a large boat into which I saw the sbirri load all the furniture in the house, and finally I saw the girl get into the gondola, very much surprised to see me there. Her mother embraced her and told her that I was to become her husband the next day. She answered that she was sure of it and that she had left her tyrant only a bed and his clothes.

We reached Castello, where I had all her furniture unloaded and where I dined with the three women, persuading them to go and wait for me in Lusia, where they would see me again as soon as I had put my affairs in order. I spent the whole afternoon with my intended in most amusing talk. She told us that her cousin the Abate was dressing when the fante entered. He showed him the deed, and as soon as he had admitted it was his, he was ordered on pain of death to do nothing to oppose the girl's going or the removal of all the furniture. The Abate went off to say his mass, and everything was carried out to the letter. The same fante had told her that her mother was waiting for her in a gondola which was at the quay, in which she was very much surprised to see me because she could not believe that the thing was my doing. I told her that it was the first sample I was giving her of my affection.

I ordered a choice supper for four, with exquisite wines, and after spending two hours at table in joy and peace, I spent four more laughing with my intended.

The next morning after breakfast I sent for a peota,[25] into which I had all the furniture loaded to be transported to Lusia, and after giving the mother ten more zecchini I wished them a good journey. Victorious, proud, and triumphant, I went home.

The business had made such a stir that it could not remain unknown to my good friends, who when they saw me showed that they were saddened and surprised. Monsieur de La Haye embraced me with an air of the greatest grief; it was a role which he played to perfection. Only Signor Bragadin laughed heartily and told the three others that they did not understand it at all and that the whole thing had been done only to bring about a greater piece of work which was known only to the higher intelligences. For my part, not knowing through which of its particulars they believed they were acquainted with the whole story, which they could not really know, I laughed with Signor Bragadin, but said nothing. With nothing to fear, I resolved to amuse myself by listening to whatever was said. We sat down at table. Signor Barbaro was the first to say to me in a friendly tone that he had not expected to see me the day after my marriage.

"Are people saying that I am married?"

"Everyone says so, and everywhere. Even the heads of the Council of Ten believe it and have reason to believe it."

"They are all mistaken. I like to do good at the expense of my money, but not at the expense of my freedom. When you want to know my business it is from me that you should learn it. The public voice is fit only to amuse fools.''

''But,'' said Signor Dandolo, ''you spent the night with the girl who is said to be your wife.''

''No doubt, but I am not obliged to account to anyone for what I did last night. Do you not agree with me, Monsieur de La Haye?''

''I beg you not to ask my opinion, for I know nothing about it. However, I will say to you that you should not hold the public voice in so little esteem. The tender affection which I feel for you is the reason why what is being said pains me.''

''How is it that what is being said pains neither Signor Bragadin nor me?''

''I respect you, but I have learned at my own expense to fear slander. It is said that to obtain possession of a girl who was living with her uncle, a worthy priest, you paid a woman to say she was her mother and to go as such to demand the use of force from the heads of the Council of Ten to get her for you. The fante of the Council of Ten himself swears that you were in the gondola with the pretended mother when the girl got into it. It is said that the deed of gift by virtue of which you carried off the good priest's furniture is forged; and you are accused of having made the tribunal the instrument of these crimes. It is said, finally, that even if you have married the girl, which must be the case, the heads of the Ten will have much to say concerning the means you had the effrontery to employ to gain your end.''

I answered him coldly that a wise man who has heard a story told in which there are criminal circumstances ceases to be wise if he repeats it to others, for if it is slanderous he thus becomes an accomplice of the slanderer.

After this maxim, which made him blush and whose wisdom my friends admired, I asked him never to worry about me, to believe that I knew honor only to follow its commands, and to let people talk, just as I myself did when I heard evil tongues speaking evil of him.

The incident furnished the story which kept the city amused for five or six days; then it was forgotten.

Three months later, however, as I had never gone to Lusia and never answered the letters which the Signorina Marchetti wrote me or paid their bearers the money she demanded of me, she determined on a course which might have had consequences, but which had none.

Ignazio,[26] fante of the redoubtable tribunal of the State Inquisitors, appeared before me at a moment when I was still at table with Signor Bragadin, my two other friends, De La Haye, and two strangers. He told me politely that the Cavaliere Contarini dal Zoffo[27] wished to speak to me and that he would be at his house in Santa Maria dell'Orto[28] the next day at such-and-such an hour. I answered, rising, that I would not fail to obey His Excellency's[29] order. He left at once; I could not imagine what such a great personage could want of my small person. However, the message could not but put us all in a kind of consternation, for the man who was summoning me was a State Inquisitor. Signor Bragadin, who had been one himself in the days when he was a Councilor,[30] and knew their procedures, told me calmly that I had nothing to fear.

"Ignazio," he said, "being dressed in country clothes, did not come as a messenger of the tribunal, and Signor Contarini himself wishes to speak to you only as a private citizen, since he sends you word to wait on him at his palace and not in the sanctuary.[31] He is a severe old man, but just, and one to whom you must speak clearly and above all admit the truth if, by denying it, you run the risk of making matters worse."

His advice pleased me, and I needed it. I presented myself in the nobleman's antechamber at the appointed hour.

I am announced and am not kept waiting. I enter, and His Excellency, who was seated, spends a minute looking me up and down without saying a word. He rings and tells the footman who enters to show in the two persons who were in the next room. I was not at all surprised to see the Marchetti woman and her daughter come in. The nobleman asks me if I know them.

"I cannot but know them, Monsignore, since the Signorina is to be my wife as soon as she has proved to me by her conduct that she is worthy to be."

"Her conduct is good; she lives with her mother at Lusia; you have deceived her; why do you put off marrying her; why do you not go to see her; you do not answer her letters, and you leave her in want."

"I cannot marry her without having something to live on, and that will come three or four years hence from a post which I shall obtain through the patronage of Signor Bragadin, my only support. In the meanwhile she will live in God's grace. I will not marry her until I am convinced of it and, above all, that she does not see the Abate her cousin in the fourth degree. I do not go to see her because my confessor and my conscience forbid me to."

"She wishes you to make her a formal promise of marriage and to give her enough to live on."

"Nothing obliges me to make her such a promise, and as I have nothing to live on myself it is impossible for me to give her anything. In her mother's house she cannot die of starvation."

"When she was with my cousin," her mother interrupted, "she lacked nothing. She shall go back there."

"If she goes back there," I said, "I will not again take the trouble to deliver her; and then His Excellency will see that I am right in putting off marrying her until I am sure that her behavior has become what it should be."

His Excellency told me that I might leave, and it was all over. I heard nothing more of the matter, and my account of the dialogue amused Signor Bragadin's dinner table.

At the beginning of the Carnival I won a terno[32] which brought me three thousand ducati correnti. Fortune made me the present at a moment when I did not need it. I had spent the autumn at cards every day, but making the bank. It was at a small casino for members, to which no Venetian nobleman dared to come because one of the members was an officer of the Duke of Montealegre, the Spanish Ambassador.[33] The presence of noblemen is embarrassing to private citizens in an aristocratic government, where equality exists only among members of the government. I put a thousand zecchini in Signor Bragadin's hands, intending to make a journey to France after the Ascension Day fair. With this idea in mind I had the firmness to spend the Carnival without ever risking my money punting. A very obliging patrician had accorded me a quarter share in his bank, and on the first day of Lent we found ourselves the winners by a sufficient sum.

In the middle of the Carnival my friend Balletti, who had produced the ballets at Mantua for the second time, came to Venice under contract to produce them at the Teatro San Moisè[34] during the fair. I was delighted to see him with Marina, who, however, did not lodge with him. She immediately found an English Jew named Mendex,[35] who spent a great deal of money on her. This Jew, with whom she invited me to dine, gave me news of my dear Teresa-Bellino, telling me that he had been in love with her and had left her pleasant recollections. The news pleased me. I congratulated myself that Henriette had prevented me from going to see her when I had intended to, for I could easily have fallen in love with her again, and God knows what would have happened.

At this same time the Baron de Bavois was appointed a captain in the service of the Republic; he had a most successful career, as I will narrate in its proper place.

De La Haye undertook the education of a young man named Felice Calvi and a year later took him to Poland with him. I will narrate in its proper place how I met him in Vienna three years later.

At the same time that I was arranging to go to the fair at Reggio,[36] then to Turin, where, on the occasion of the marriage of the Duke of Savoy[37] to an Infanta of Spain, daughter of Philip V, all Italy was present, then to Paris, where, Madame la Dauphine[38] being pregnant, magnificent festivals were in preparation in the expectation of a prince, Balletti was also arranging to make the same journey. His father and his mother, who was the famous actress Silvia,[39] were summoning him back to the bosom of his family. He was to dance at the Théâtre Italien[40] and to play the first lover's roles there. I could not choose company more agreeable and more apt to procure me countless advantages in Paris and a quantity of brilliant acquaintances.

So I took leave of Signor Bragadin and my two other friends, promising them that I would return at the end of two years. I left my brother Francesco studying under the battle painter Simonetti,[41] known as Il Parmigiano, promising him that I would think of him when I was in Paris, where in those days genius was certain to make its way to fortune. The reader will see how I kept my word to him.

I also left in Venice my brother Giovanni, who had returned there with Guarienti[42] after making the tour of Italy. He was about to leave for Rome, where he remained for fourteen years studying under the Cavaliere

Mengs.[43] He returned to Dresden in 1764 and died there in 1795.

So I set out from Venice after Balletti, who had gone on to wait for me in Reggio. It was the first day of June in the year 1750. I set out well equipped, with plenty of money, and certain not to be in want of it if I behaved properly.

A four-oared peota put me ashore at Pontelagoscuro[44] twenty-four hours after I embarked. It was noon. I immediately took a calèche to convey me to Ferrara for dinner.

CHAPTER VII[1]

My stay in Ferrara and comic adventure which befalls me there. My arrival in Paris, 1750.

I DISEMBARK from a peota at noon at Pontelagoscuro; I take a chaise to hurry on to Ferrara for dinner. I put up at the Albergo San Marco,[2] and I go upstairs, preceded by a valet to show me to my room. A sound of merriment coming from an open room prompts me to see what it might be. I see ten or twelve people at table; it is nothing unusual; and I was going on, but I am halted by a "There he is!" spoken by a pretty woman, who rises and runs to me with open arms, embraces me, and says:

"Set a place for my dear cousin at once, and have his trunk put in the room next to this one."

A young man comes toward me, and she says to him:

"Didn't I tell you he would arrive today or tomorrow?"

She makes me sit down beside her, and the entire company, who had risen in my honor, return to their places.

"You are sure to be hungry," she says to me, treading on my foot; "there is my fiancé, whom I introduce to you, and there are my father-in-law and my mother-in-law. These ladies and gentlemen are friends of the family. How is it that my mother did not arrive with you?"

The moment had come when I must speak.

"Your mother, my dear cousin, will be here in three or four days."

I look at the minx closely, and I recognize her as Cattinella,[3] a very well-known dancer, to whom I had never spoken in my life. I see that she is making me play a false role for the sake of a play of her own composition, and one which she needed to bring on its dénouement. Curious to know if I really had the talent with which she credited me, I gladly fall in with her scheme, certain that she will reward me at least with her favors in secret. What was required of me was the skill to play my role well yet not to compromise myself. In the meanwhile, on the pretext that I wanted to eat, I gave her all the time we needed to fill me in. She gave me a good example of her quick wit by explaining the whole working of the plot to me through remarks which she made, while I was eating, now to one member of the company, now to another. I gathered that her marriage could not take place until the arrival of her mother, who was to bring her her clothes and her diamonds, and that I was the maestro who was going to Turin to compose the music of the opera for the marriage of the Duke of Savoy. Certain that she could not prevent me from leaving the next day, I saw that I risked nothing by playing the role. Except for the nocturnal reward which I promised myself, I would have told the company that she was mad. Cattinella might be thirty years of age, she was extremely pretty, and famous for her intrigues.

The supposed mother-in-law, who was seated across from me, filled a glass for me and, as I had to reach out my arm to take it, she noticed my hand, which I held as if it were sprained.

"What's that?" she asked.

"A little sprain which will soon be cured."

Cattinella burst out laughing and said that she was very sorry, for now they could not hear me at the harpsichord.

"I am surprised that you laugh at it."

"I laugh because I remember a sprain I pretended I had suffered two years ago to avoid dancing."

After coffee the mother-in-law said that Signorina Cattinella must have family matters to discuss with me and that we should be left to our own devices; so at last I found myself alone with the schemer in the room next to hers, which she had arranged that I should have.

She sank onto a sofa to succumb to laughter which she could not contain. She said that she felt sure of me, though she knew me only by sight and by name, and she ended by saying that I would do very well to leave the next day.

"I have been here," she said, "for two months without a soldo; I have nothing but some dresses and linen, which I should have had to sell to live on if I had not managed to inspire a passion in the innkeeper's son, whom I flattered into believing that I would become his wife and bring him a dowry of twenty thousand scudi in diamonds, which I am supposed to have in Venice and which my mother is supposed to be bringing me. My mother has nothing, knows nothing about the plot, and will not stir from Venice."

"Pray tell me what end this farce will have: I foresee that it will be tragic."

"You are wrong. Very comic. I am waiting here for a lover, who is Count Ostein,[4] brother to the Elector of Mainz. He wrote to me from Frankfurt, he has left there, and he must now be in Venice. He will come for me to take me to the fair at Reggio. If my supposed fiancé decides to make difficulties, he will certainly give him a beating, at the same time paying him my bill; but I want him neither to beat him nor pay him. As I leave, I will whisper to him that I will come back, and all will go smoothly, for I will assure him that I will marry him on my return."

"It is perfect; you are as clever as an angel; but I will not wait until your return to marry you, that must be done at once."

"What madness! At least wait until tonight."

"Not a bit of it, for I seem to hear your Count's horses already. If he doesn't arrive we'll be none the worse off for tonight."

"So you love me?"

"Madly; but what of it? Your play deserves my adoring you and making you sure of it. Let us be quick."

"Wait. Lock the door. You are right. It is an episode, but a very pretty one."

Toward nightfall they all joined us upstairs, and there was talk of going to take the air. We were just about to do so, when a carriage drawn by six post horses was heard to arrive. Cattinella looks out of the window and tells everyone to leave, since it was a prince coming for her, she was sure of it. Everyone left, and she pushes me into my room and locks me in. Sure enough, I see the berlin[5] stop in front of the inn, I see a nobleman four times my size emerge from it supported by two servants. He comes upstairs, he enters the bride's room, and I had nothing left to entertain me except my ability to hear everything they said and to see through a crack everything that Cattinella did with his enormous bulk. But the entertainment finally bored me, for it went on for five hours. They were devoted to packing all Cattinella's belongings, loading them on the berlin, supping, and emptying several bottles of Rhine wine. At midnight Count Ostein left as he had arrived, taking the bride away from the bridegroom. No one ever came to my room during all this time, and I avoided summoning anyone. I was afraid I should be discovered and I did not know how the German prince might take it if he knew that he had a hidden witness to his demonstrations of love, which did no honor to either of the persons who were concerned in them. I made sundry reflections on the miserable estate of the human race.

After the heroine's departure I saw the innkeeper's son through the crack; I knocked to get him to open the door for me, and he told me in a plaintive voice that the lock would have to be broken since the Signorina had carried off the key. I asked him to do it at once since I was hungry; and it was done. He kept me company at table. He told me that the Signorina had found a moment to assure him that she would return in six weeks; he told me that she had wept as she gave him the assurance and that she had embraced him.

"Did the Prince pay her bill?"

"No indeed. We would not have accepted it if he had offered to. My intended would have taken offense, for you cannot imagine how nobly she thinks."

"What does your father say about her going?"

"My father always thinks the worst; he says that she will not come back, and my mother is more of his opinion than of mine. But you, Signor Maestro, what do you think?"

"That if she told you so, she will undoubtedly return."

"If she had not intended to come back, she would not have assured me of it."

"Exactly. Your reasoning is faultless."

My supper was the remains of what the Count's cook had prepared, and I drank a bottle of Rhenish which Cattinella had filched as a present for him.[6] After supper I took the post, and I left after assuring him that I would persuade my cousin to return as soon as she could. I wanted to pay; but he would take nothing. I reached

Bologna a quarter of an hour after Cattinella and lodged at the same inn. I found an opportunity to tell her of the conversation I had had with her stupid lover.

I reached Reggio before her, but I was never able to speak to her, for she never left her Count. I spent the whole fair there without anything happening to me which is worth recording. I left Reggio with Balletti, and reached Turin, which I was eager to see. When I had been there with Henriette I had stopped only long enough to change horses.

At Turin I found everything equally fine—the city, the court, the theater, and the women, who were all beautiful beginning with the Duchesses of Savoy.[7] I laughed when I was told that the city was well policed and saw the streets full of beggars. Yet the efficiency of the police was the principal concern of the King[8] himself, who was highly intelligent, as everyone knows from history. But I was silly enough to be astonished by the monarch's appearance. Never having seen a king in my life, a spurious idea made me believe that a king should have something rarely beautiful or majestic in his physiognomy, not shared by the rest of mankind. As a young, thinking republican, my idea was not entirely stupid; but I soon got rid of it when I saw the King of Sardinia ugly, hunchbacked, morose, and common even in his manners. I heard La Astrua[9] and Gafarello[10] sing, and I saw La Geoffroi[11] dance, whom a very gentlemanly dancer named Bodin married at about this time. No amorous inclination disturbed the peace of my soul in Turin, except for the daughter of a washerwoman, with whom there befell me an accident which I record only because it taught me a lesson in physiology.

After doing everything I could to obtain an interview with the girl in my lodging or in hers or anywhere at all and not succeeding, I resolved to have her by using a little violence at the foot of the concealed staircase down which she usually went when she left my lodging. I hid at the foot of it, and when I saw that she was within reach I sprang on her and, partly by persuasion, partly by swift action, I subjugated her on the last steps; but at the first thrust of our union a most extraordinary sound, proceeding from the place next to the one I was occupying, stayed my fury for a moment, and the more so because I saw the victim put her hand over her face to hide the shame she felt at her indiscretion.

I reassure her by a kiss and make to continue, but lo! a second sound, louder than the first; I proceed, and now comes the third, then the fourth, and so regularly that it was like the bass of an orchestra giving the time for a piece of music. This aural phenomenon, together with the embarrassment and confusion which I saw in my victim, suddenly took possession of my soul; all together they presented so comical an idea to my mind that, laughter having overpowered all my faculties, I had to let go. She seized the moment to run away. From that day on she did not dare to enter my sight. I remained there sitting on the stairs for more than a quarter of an hour before I could shake off the comedy of the thing, which makes me laugh every time I think of it. I reflected afterward that the girl perhaps owed her virtuous behavior to her infirmity. It might also be due to a certain configuration of the organ, and in that case she ought to thank eternal Providence for a gift which an ungrateful feeling perhaps prompted her to consider a defect. I believe that three out of four loose women would cease to be so if they were subject to this phenomenon, unless they were sure that their lovers were subject to it too, for then the strange symphony might become one more charm of a happy union. It might even be easy to hit on a device which could be applied to the sluice gate and which would make the explosions odoriferous, for one sense should not suffer when another sense is enjoying; and the sense of smell plays no small part in the pleasures of Venus.

Gambling at Turin avenged me for the wrong it had done me at Reggio, and I was easily persuaded by my friend Balletti to go with him to Paris, where magnificent festivals were being prepared in expectation of the birth of a Duke of Burgundy.[12] Everyone knew that Madame la Dauphine was near the end of her pregnancy. So we set out from Turin, and on the fifth day we arrived in Lyons. We spent a week there.

Lyons is a very fine city, in which not even three or four noble houses are open to foreigners; but to make up for it there are a hundred belonging to businessmen, merchants, manufacturers, and commission agents far richer than manufacturers, in which there is excellent society. The tone is considerably below that of Paris, but one gets used to it, and one enjoys life more methodically. What makes Lyons rich is taste and low prices. The divinity to which the city owes its prosperity is fashion. It changes every year, and a stuff for which thirty is paid because of its new pattern fetches only twenty the next year and is sent to foreign countries, where the buyers sell it as something brand-new. Lyons pays high fees to designers who have taste; that is the secret. Low prices come from competition, whose soul is freedom. Hence a government which wishes to see the state prospering by commerce has but to leave commerce completely free, only being watchful to prevent frauds which private interest may invent to the detriment of the general interest. The sovereign should hold the scales, and allow his subjects to load them as they please.

At Lyons I found the most celebrated of all Venetian courtesans. Her name was Ancilla.[13] Her beauty was astonishing. Everyone said that her equal had never been seen. Those who saw her could not help wanting to enjoy her, and she could refuse no one, for if all men loved her individually, she loved the male sex in general. Those who had not the small amount of money which the law demanded that they give her to obtain her favors obtained them for nothing as soon as they could acquaint her with their desires.

Venice always had courtesans more famous for their beauty than for their intelligence; the chief of these among my contemporaries were this same Ancilla and another named Spina;[14] both daughters of gondoliers; both dead at an early age after deciding to enter a profession which they thought would raise their standing. Ancilla at the age of twenty-two became a dancer; and Spina tried to become a singer. The man who made Ancilla a dancer was a dancer named Campioni,[15] a Venetian who, dancing serious roles, taught her all the graces of which her beautiful form was capable, and married her. Spina learned music from a castrato who called himself Beppino della Mammana,[16] who could not marry her; but she was always less than mediocre and continued to live on what she earned by her charms. Ancilla danced in Venice until two years before her death, of which I will speak at the proper time.

I found her at Lyons with her husband. They had just come from London, where they had been applauded at the Haymarket Theater.[17] She had stopped at Lyons with her husband purely for her own pleasure, and she had at her feet all the fashionable and rich young men of the city, who went to call on her every evening and did whatever she wanted to please her: outings by day, great suppers, and faro all night. The banker was a certain Don Giuseppe Marcati,[18] the same man whose acquaintance I had made in the Spanish army eight years earlier, where he was called Don Bepe il cadetto, and who some years later made known his real name of Afflisio and who came to such a bad end. His bank won three hundred thousand francs in a few days. In a country with a court such a sum would not have been talked about, but in a city of merchants it alarmed all the heads of families, and the Italian contingent thought of leaving.

A respectable personage whom I met at the house of Monsieur de Rochebaron[19] procured me the privilege of being admitted[20] into the company of those who see the light. I became an apprentice Freemason. Two months later at Paris I received the second degree,[21] and some months later the third, which is the mastership. It is the highest. All the other titles which were conferred on me in the course of time are pleasing fictions which, though symbolic, add nothing to the dignity of Master.

There is not a man on earth who succeeds in knowing everything; but every man should aspire to know everything. Every young man who travels, who wishes to know society, who does not wish to be inferior to another and excluded from the company of his equals in the age in which we live, should be initiated into what is called Freemasonry, if only to acquire a superficial knowledge of what it is. However, he must be careful to make the right choice of the lodge of which he wishes to become a member, for though evil company cannot act in the lodge, it may be present in it, and the candidate must beware of dangerous connections. Those who decide to become Masons only to learn the secret may well be deceiving themselves, for a man can be a Master Mason for fifty years and never learn the secret of the brotherhood.

The secret of Masonry is inviolable by its own nature, since the Mason who knows it, knows it only because he has divined it. He has learned it from no one. He has discovered it by virtue of going to the lodge, observing, reasoning, and deducing. When he has arrived at it, he takes great care not to share his discovery with anyone, were it his best friend and a Mason, because if he has not had the ability to find it out, he will by the same token not have the ability to profit by it if he learns it by word of mouth. The secret, then, will always be a secret.

Whatever one does in lodge must be kept secret; but those who, in their dishonest indiscretion, have not scrupled to reveal what is done there have not revealed the heart of the matter. How could they reveal it if they did not know it? If they had known it they would not have revealed the ceremonies.

The same impression which the Brotherhood of Masons produces today on many who have not been initiated into it was produced in ancient times by the great mysteries which were celebrated at Eleusis[22] in honor of Ceres. They aroused the interest of all Greece, and the greatest men in the world aspired to be initiated into them. That initiation was of far greater significance than initiation into modern Freemasonry, among whose members some are rascals and the dregs of human society. Impenetrable silence was long preserved concerning everything that took place in the Eleusinian mysteries, because of the veneration which they inspired. Someone dared, for example, to reveal the three words which the hierophant[23] addressed to the initiates when he dismissed them at the conclusion of the mysteries; but what did that accomplish? Only to dishonor him who had revealed them, for the three words were in a barbarian language unknown to the profane. I have somewhere read that the three words meant: "Watch, and do no evil." The initiation lasted for nine days, the ceremonies were most imposing, the company was of the worthiest. We read in Plutarch[24] that Alcibiades was sentenced to death and that all his property was confiscated because he had dared to ridicule the great mysteries in the privacy of his house with Polytion and Theodoros, contrary to the laws of the Eumolpides.[25] In consequence of his sacrilege he was sentenced to be cursed by the priests and priestesses, but the curse was not pronounced; a priestess[26] opposed it, giving as her reason that she was a priestess "to bless, not to curse," a most noble lesson which our Most Holy Father the Pope scorns. Nothing is important today.

Botarelli[27] publishes all the practices of the Freemasons in a pamphlet, and no one says anything except that he is a scoundrel. It was already common knowledge. At Naples a Prince and Monsieur Hamilton[28] perform the miracle of San Gennaro[29] at home. The King shuts his eyes and does not remember that he wears on his royal breast an order on which, around the effigy of San Gennaro, are the three words: In sanguine foedus ("In the blood of the covenant").[30] Everything nowadays is inconsequential and there is nothing which has any significance. The present trend will be defended and pursued; but everything will go from bad to worse if it stops halfway.

We engaged two places in the diligence which would take us to Paris in five days; Balletti informed his family of the time of his departure, so they knew the hour at which we should arrive.

We were eight in the conveyance, which is called a "diligence";[31] we were all seated, but all uncomfortably, for it was oval; no one had a corner seat since it had no corners. I thought this poorly considered; but I said nothing, for as an Italian it was my part to consider everything in France admirable. An oval coach: I bowed to the fashion, and I cursed it, for the strange movement of the vehicle made me want to vomit. It was too well sprung. I should have found a jolting less trying. The very force of its speed over the fine road made it rock; hence it was called a "gondola"; but the true Venetian gondola propelled by two oarsmen goes smoothly and does not cause a nausea which turns one inside out. My head was spinning. The swift motion, which at least did not jolt me in the slightest, affected my intestinal vapors and made me throw up everything I had in my stomach. My fellow passengers thought me bad company, but none of them said so. All that anyone said was that I had eaten too much supper, and a Parisian Abbé spoke up in my defense, saying that I had a weak stomach, and there was an argument. Out of patience, I put a stop to it by saying:

"You are both wrong, for I have an excellent stomach and I did not eat supper."

An elderly man who had a boy of twelve or thirteen years with him said to me in honeyed tones that I should not tell the gentlemen that they were "wrong," but that I could have told them that they were "not right," thus imitating Cicero, who did not tell the Romans that Catiline[32] and the other conspirators were dead but that they "had lived."

"Is it not the same thing?"

"I beg your pardon, Monsieur, the one is impolite and the other is polite."

He then delivered a magnificent dissertation on politeness, which he concluded by saying to me, with a smile:

"I wager that Monsieur is Italian."

"Yes, but may I make bold to ask you from what you guessed it?"

"Oh, from the attention with which you honored my lengthy prattle."

The whole company then burst out laughing, and I began making up to the eccentric, who was tutor to the youth beside him. I made use of him through all those five days to give me lessons in French politeness, and when we had to part he called me aside and said that he wished to make me a small present.

"What is it?"

"You must forget and renounce the particle non which you use without mercy in season and out of season. Non is not a French word. Say pardon, it comes to the same thing and does not offend. Non is a contradiction. Give it up, Monsieur, or be prepared to draw your sword in Paris every moment."

"I thank you, Monsieur, and I promise never to say non again as long as I live."

At the beginning of my stay in Paris it seemed to me that I had become the guiltiest of men, for I did nothing but beg pardon. One day I even thought that I had brought a quarrel on myself by begging it out of season. It was at the theater that a young dandy trod on my foot by mistake.

"Pardon me, Monsieur," I said quickly.

"It is for you to pardon."

"For you."

"For you."

"Alas, Monsieur, let us pardon each other and embrace."

So ended our quarrel.

One day when I was sleeping quite soundly sitting up in the gondola-diligence, which was making great speed, my neighbor suddenly shakes me to wake me up.

"What is it?"

"Ah, Monsieur, look at that château, I beg you."

"I see it. It is not much. What do you consider remarkable about it?"

"Nothing—if we were not forty leagues from Paris. Will my gawking fellow citizens believe me when I tell them I have seen such a fine château forty leagues from the capital? How ignorant one is when one has not traveled a little!"

"You are quite right."

The man was a Parisian himself, an inveterate gawker, like a Gaul in the days of Caesar.

But if the Parisians go gawking about from morning to night, being amused by everything and admiring everything, a foreigner like myself should be even more of a curiosity-seeker. The difference between them and myself was that, being accustomed to seeing things as they are, I was surprised to see them under a mask which changed their nature, whereas the Parisians' surprise is due to their often being led to suspect what is under the mask.

What greatly pleased me was the beauty of the highroad, the immortal work of Louis XV, the cleanliness of the inns, the fare which they supplied, the promptness with which we were served, the excellence of the beds, the modest manner of the person who served us at table, who was usually the most accomplished daughter of the house and whose bearing, cleanliness, and manners were enough to check any licentiousness. Who among us in Italy takes pleasure in seeing the waiters in our inns with their effrontery and their insolence? In those days in France overcharging was unknown; France was the home of foreigners. Is it now the home of the French? There was the disadvantage of often seeing an odious despotism consisting in lettres de cachet.[33] It was the despotism of kings. We shall see what is the despotism of a raging, ferocious, uncontrollable people who flock together, hang, cut off heads, and murder those who, not being of the people, dare to speak their minds.[34]

We slept at Fontainebleau, and an hour before reaching Paris we saw a berlin coming from it.

"That is my mother," said Balletti, "stop, stop!"

We got out; and after the usual ecstasies between mother and son he introduces me, and his mother, who was the celebrated actress Silvia, greets me only with:

"I hope, Monsieur, that my son's friend will be so good as to sup with us tonight."

So saying she gets into her carriage with her son and her daughter, who was nine years old. I return to the gondola.

On arriving in Paris I find one of Silvia's servants waiting with a hackney coach; he attended to everything and conducted me to a lodging[35] which I found very clean. After leaving my trunk and all my possessions there he took me to his mistress's house, which was fifty paces away. Balletti introduced me to his father, who was named Mario,[36] and who was convalescing. Mario and Silvia were the names they bore in the comedies which they improvised. The French never called the Italian actors any other names in society than those by which they were known on the stage. "Bonjour, Monsieur Arlequin; bonjour, Monsieur Pantalon"—so the actors who played those parts were addressed at the Palais-Royal.[37]

CHAPTER VIII

My apprenticeship in Paris. Portraits. Oddities. Things many and various.

SILVIA CELEBRATED her son's arrival by inviting her relatives to supper at her house. I was delighted to have reached Paris in time to make their acquaintance. Mario, Balletti's father, did not come to the table because he was recovering from an illness, but I met his elder sister, who was called by her stage name of Flaminia.[1] She was known in the Republic of Letters[2] for some translations; but what made me want to know her well was the story, which was current all over Italy, of the sojourn[3] which three famous men had made in Paris. The three men were the Marchese Maffei,[4] the Abate Conti,[5] and Pier Giacomo Martelli.[6] They became enemies, the story went, because of the preference to which each of them aspired in the actress's good graces, and as men of learning they fought with their pens. Martelli wrote a satire on Maffei, in which he gave him the anagrammatic name of "Femia."

As I was presented to Flaminia as a candidate in the Republic of Letters, she saw fit to honor me with her conversation. I found her repulsive in her face, her tone, her style, and even her voice; she did not quite say it, but she gave me to understand that, famous herself in the Republic of Letters, she was talking to an insect; she acted as if she were laying down the law and she considered that, at the age of seventy, she had every right to do so toward a youth of twenty-five who had added nothing to any library. To flatter her, I talked of the Abate Conti, and in a certain connection I cited two lines by that profound writer. She corrected me affably enough on the word scevra, which means separated, which I pronounced with the consonantal u, which is v.[7] She said that it should be pronounced as a vowel, and that I should not take it amiss to have learned the fact in Paris on my first day there.

"I am certainly eager to learn, Madame, but not to unlearn. It should be pronounced scevra, and not sceura, because it is a contraction of scévera."

"It remains to be seen which of us is wrong."

"You are, Madame, according to Ariosto, who rhymes scevra with persevra."

She was going on when her husband, who was eighty years old,[8] told her that she was mistaken. She said no more, and from that time on she told everyone that I was an impostor. Her husband was Lodovico Riccoboni, known as Lelio, the same man who had brought the Italian troupe to Paris in the year sixteen in the service of the Duke-Regent.[9] I was aware of his merit. He had been very handsome, and he rightly enjoyed the esteem of the public both for his talent and for his morals. During supper my principal concern was to study Silvia, who was praised to the skies. I found her above everything that was said of her. Her age was fifty, her figure elegant, her bearing distinguished, as were her manners; she was easy, affable, pleasant, well-spoken, obliging to everyone, full of wit yet completely unpretentious. Her face was an enigma, it was interesting and it pleased everyone, yet on examination it could not be considered beautiful; but by the same token no one had ever dared to pronounce it ugly. She could not be said to be neither beautiful nor ugly, for the fascination of her character made an instantaneous impression. So what was she? Beautiful—but in accordance with laws and proportions unknown to all except those who, feeling an occult power drawing them to love her, had the courage to study her and the capacity to discover them.

This actress was the idol of all France, and her talent was the mainstay of all the comedies which the greatest authors wrote for her, and especially Marivaux.[10] But for her, their comedies would never have come down to posterity. An actress capable of replacing her has never been found, and never will be found, for she would have to combine in herself all the aptitudes which Silvia possessed in the too difficult art of the theater—action, voice, countenance, intelligence, bearing, and knowledge of the human heart. Everything in her was nature; the art which accompanied and had perfected it all was not allowed to appear.

To be unique in every respect, she added to those which I have just mentioned a quality even without which she would have risen to the pinnacle of fame as an actress. Her life was pure. She was ready to make friends of men, but never lovers—scorning a privilege which she could have enjoyed but which would have made her base in her own estimation. For this reason she gained a reputation for respectability at an age when it would have seemed absurd and almost insulting to all women of her profession. For this reason several ladies of the highest rank honored her with their friendship even more than with their patronage. For this reason the capricious Parisian groundlings never dared to hiss her in a role which they did not like. By general and unanimous consent, Silvia was a woman above her profession.

Since she did not consider that her good conduct could be placed to her credit, for she knew that she practiced it only for the sake of her self-esteem, no pride, no show of superiority was ever seen in the relations she was obliged to have with her fellow actresses, who, content to shine by their talents, were not concerned to make themselves conspicuous by their virtue. Silvia loved them all, and she was loved by them, she did them justice publicly, and she praised them. But she was right: she had nothing to fear, none of them could cast the slightest shadow on her.

Nature cheated this unique woman out of ten years of her life. She became consumptive at the age of sixty, ten years after I met her. The climate of Paris plays these tricks on Italian women. Two years before her death I saw her play the role of Marianne in Marivaux's comedy,[11] in which she seemed to be only Marianne's age. She died in my presence, holding her daughter in her arms and giving her her last advice five minutes before she expired. She was honorably buried at Saint-Sauveur[12] without the slightest opposition from the parish priest, who said that her profession[13] of actress had never prevented her from being a Christian.

Excuse me, reader, if I have delivered Silvia's funeral oration ten years before reaching her death. When I come to that, I will spare you another.

Her only daughter, the principal object of her affection, was seated beside her at this same supper. She was only nine years old. Entirely taken up by the mother's excellences, I did not pause to make any observations on the daughter. That was to come only later. Well satisfied with my first evening, I returned to my lodgings in the house of Madame Quinson. Such was the name of my hostess.

When I woke, Mademoiselle Quinson came to tell me that there was a manservant outside, who had come to offer me his services. I see a very short man; this I find distasteful, and I tell him so.

"My shortness, Prince, will assure you that I will not wear your clothes to go gadding in."

"Your name?"

"Whatever name you please."

"What? I am asking you what your name is."

"I have none. Each master whom I serve gives me one, and in the course of my life I have had more than fifty. I will take the name you give me."

"Come now, you must have a name of your own, your family name."

"Family? I never had a family. I had a name in my youth, but in the twenty years that I have been a servant, always changing masters, I have forgotten it."

"I will call you L'Esprit."

"You do me great honor."

"Go get me change for this louis."

"Here it is."

"I see you are rich."

"Entirely at your service, Monsieur."

"Who will give me information about you?"

"The agency for servants, and Madame Quinson as well. Everyone in Paris knows me."

"That will do. I will give you thirty sous a day. I do not provide your clothing, you will sleep at home, and you will be at my orders every morning at seven o'clock."

Balletti came to see me and asked me to come to dinner and supper every day. I had L'Esprit show me the way to the Palais-Royal[14] and left him at the gate. Eager to satisfy my curiosity concerning a promenade which was so highly praised, I began by observing everything. I saw a rather fine garden, walks bordered by big trees, fountains, the whole surrounded by high houses, many men and women strolling, benches here and there, from which new pamphlets, scented waters, toothpicks, and trinkets were sold; I saw cane chairs which were rented for a sou, newspaper readers sitting in the shade, light women and men breakfasting alone and in company; coffeehouse waiters hurrying up and down a small concealed staircase behind beds of shrubbery. I sit down at a small empty table, a waiter asks me what I will have, I ask for chocolate without milk, and he brings me some which is horrible in a silver cup. I let it stand and tell the waiter to bring me coffee if it is good.

"Excellent, I made it yesterday myself."

"Yesterday? I don't want it."

"The milk in it is excellent."

"Milk? I never drink it. Make me a cup of coffee made with water, at once."

"With water? We make that only after dinner. Would you like a bavaroise?[15] Would you like a decanter of orgeat?"[16]

"Yes, orgeat."

I find it an excellent beverage, and I decide to make it my regular breakfast. I ask the waiter if there is anything new, and he answers that the Dauphine has given birth to a prince; an abbé tells him he is mad: it is a princess she has borne. A third man comes forward and says:

"I have just come from Versailles, and the Dauphine has borne neither a prince nor a princess."

He tells me that he gathers I am a foreigner, and I answer that I am an Italian, arrived in Paris the day before. He then talks to me of the court, of society, of the theater; he offers to introduce me everywhere, I thank him, I leave, and the Abbé accompanies me and tells me the names of all the light women who are strolling about. A gentleman of the robe[17] meets him, he embraces him, and the Abbé introduces him to me as learned in Italian literature; I address him in Italian, he answers wittily, and I laugh at his style and tell him the reason: he spoke exactly in the style of Boccaccio. My remark pleases him, I persuade him that it is not the way to speak, though that ancient writer's language is perfect. In less than a quarter of an hour we become fast friends, finding that we have the same inclinations. He a poet, I a poet, he interested in Italian literature, I in French, we give each other our addresses and promise to exchange visits.

I see many men and women crowded together in one corner of the garden, looking up. I asked my new friend what was remarkable there. He said that they were watching the meridian line, each with his timepiece in his hand, waiting for the moment when the shadow of the style would show exactly noon, when they would set their timepieces.

"But aren't there meridians everywhere?"

"Yes, but the most celebrated is the one in the Palais-Royal."

At that I could not help laughing.

"Why are you laughing?"

"Because it is impossible that all meridians are not the same; so this is the height of gawking."

He thought a little and then laughed too; and he gave me the courage to criticize the good Parisians. We leave the Palais-Royal by the main gate, and I see to my right a crowd in front of a shop whose sign was a civet cat.[18]

"What's this?"

"Now you will really laugh. All these people are waiting to buy snuff."

"Is it sold only in this shop?"

"It is sold everywhere; but for the last three weeks no one will have any snuff in his snuffbox except what comes from the Civet Cat."

"Is it better than others?"

"Not at all; it may even be worse; but since the Duchess of Chartres[19] made it fashionable no one will have anything else."

"What did she do to make it fashionable?"

"She stopped her carriage two or three times outside the shop, buying only enough to fill her snuffbox and openly telling the young woman who sells it that it was the best snuff in Paris; the gawkers who crowded around her told others, and everyone in Paris knew that if one wanted good snuff one had to buy it at the Civet Cat. The woman will make her fortune, for she sells over a hundred crowns' worth of it a day."

"The Duchess of Chartres probably does not know she has made the woman's fortune."

"On the contrary, the Duchess, who is very intelligent, contrived the whole thing herself; being fond of the woman, who was recently married, and considering what she could do to help her, she decided that the thing to do was just what she has done. You cannot imagine what good souls the Parisians are. You are in the only country in the world in which intelligence can make its way to fortune either if it displays itself in genuine contributions, in which case it is welcomed by intelligence, or if it imposes what is specious, in which case it is rewarded by stupidity; stupidity is characteristic of the nation, and what is astonishing is that it is the daughter of intelligence, so that it is no paradox to say that the French nation would be wiser if it were less intelligent.

"The gods who are worshiped here, though no altars are raised to them, are novelty and fashion. A man has but to run, and all those who see him run after him. They would not stop until he was found to be mad; but to find that out is to count the sands: we have madmen here who have been mad from birth and they are still accepted as wise. The snuff from the Civet Cat is a very small example of what a flock of sheep our citizens are. Our King, out hunting, came to the Pont de Neuilly[20] and wanted a drink of ratafia.[21] He stopped at the tavern there; he asked for it, and by some strange chance the poor tavernkeeper had a flagon of it, and the King, after drinking a glass, saw fit to say to those around him that it was an excellent drink and asked for another.

That was all it took to make the tavernkeeper's fortune. In less than twenty-four hours the whole court and the whole city knew that the ratafia at Neuilly was the best drink in Europe, for the King had said so. The most fashionable people flocked to Neuilly at midnight to drink ratafia, and in less than three years the tavernkeeper was a rich man and had a house built on the same spot, on which you will see the inscription Ex liquidis solidum ('From liquids, a solid'), which is quite amusing and which was given him by one of our Academicians. What saint must the fellow thank for his swift rise to a brilliant fortune? Stupidity, flightiness, love of a joke."

"It seems to me," I said, "that this approbation of the views of the King and the princes of the blood comes from an unconquerable affection in the nation, which adores them; it is so great that they believe them to be infallible."

"True. Everything that happens in France makes foreigners believe that the nation adores its King; but those among us who think see that this love of the nation for the monarch is only tinsel. How can one base anything on a love which has no basis? The court does not rely on it. The King comes to Paris, and everyone cries: 'Long live the King' because some idler has begun shouting it. It is a cry which comes from high spirits, or perhaps from fear, and which the King himself, believe me, does not take seriously. He cannot wait to get back to Versailles, where there are twenty-five thousand men to protect him from the fury of the same populace which, grown wise, might take it into their heads to cry: 'Death to the King.' Louis XIV knew them. And his knowledge cost several councilors of the Great Chamber[22] their lives when they ventured to talk of assembling the States-General[23] when the country was threatened with calamity. France has never loved her Kings, except St. Louis[24] for his piety, Louis XII,[25] and Henri IV[26] after his death. The King who now reigns said with perfect sincerity during his convalescence: 'I am amazed at these great rejoicings because I have recovered my health, for I cannot see any reason why I should be so much loved.' This remark of our monarch's has been praised to the skies. He was actually using his reason. A philosophical courtier should have told him that he was so much loved because his surname was 'the Well Beloved.' "

"Are there any philosophers among the courtiers?"

"No—for as a courtier, a man cannot be a philosopher; but there are intelligent men who, in deference to their own interests, only champ the bit. Not long ago the King, in conversation with a courtier whom I will not name, extolled the pleasures he enjoyed when he spent the night with Madame la M.,[27] and said that he did not believe there was another woman on earth who could furnish their equal. The courtier answered that His Majesty was of that opinion because His Majesty had never been to a bordello.[28] The courtier was banished to his estate."

"The Kings of France are right, I believe, to shun summoning the States-General, for then they are in the same situation as a Pope who summons a Council."

"Not quite, but very nearly. The States-General would be dangerous if the people, who are the third estate, could counterbalance the votes of the nobility and the clergy; but that is not the case,[29] and it never will be, for it is not to be believed that policy will put the sword in the hands of madmen. The people would be glad to acquire the same influence, but there will never be either a King or a minister who will grant it to them. Such a minister would be a fool or a traitor."

The young man who, so discoursing, at once gave me a just idea of the nation, of the Parisian populace, of the court, and of the monarch, was named Patu.[30] I shall have occasion to speak of him. Still talking in the same vein, he took me to Silvia's door and congratulated me on my having the entrée to such a house.

I found the amiable actress in brilliant company. She introduced me to all her guests, telling me who each of them was as she introduced me. The name which struck me was Crébillon.[31]

"What, Monsieur!" I said to him. "Am I so quickly fortunate? For eight years you have charmed me. Listen, I beg you."

Thereupon I recite him the finest scene in his Zénobie et Rhadamiste,[32] in my blank verse translation. Silvia was delighted to see the pleasure which Crébillon, at the age of eighty, took in hearing himself rendered into a language which he loved more than his own. He recited the same scene in French, and he politely pointed out the places in which he said I had improved it. I thanked him, but was not taken in by his compliment. We sat down at table and, asked what I had seen of interest in Paris, I told them everything I had seen and heard, except Patu's discourse. After I had talked for at least two hours Crébillon, who had seen more clearly than any of the others the course I was taking to learn both the good and the bad of his nation, addressed me as follows:

"For a first day, Monsieur, I think you promise very well. You will make rapid progress. You tell your story excellently. You speak French in a way which is perfectly comprehensible; but all that you said, you put in Italian constructions. You make people listen to you, you arouse interest, and the novelty of your language renders your listeners doubly attentive; I will even say that your idiom is just the thing to gain their approval, for it is odd and new, and you are in the country where everything odd and new is sought after; nevertheless, you must begin tomorrow, and no later, to make every effort to learn to speak our language well, for in two or three months the same people who now applaud you will begin laughing at you."

"I believe it, and I fear it; so my principal purpose in coming here was to apply myself entirely to the French language and French literature; but how, Monsieur, am I to go about finding a teacher? I am an intolerable pupil, always questioning, curious, demanding, insatiable. I am not rich enough to pay such a teacher, even supposing that I find him."

"For fifty years now, Monsieur, I have been looking for a pupil such as you describe yourself to be, and it is I who will pay you if you will come to me for lessons. I live in the Marais,[33] in the Rue des Douze Portes, I have the best Italian poets, whom I will make you translate into French, and I will never find you insatiable."

I accepted, at a loss to express all my gratitude. Crébillon was six feet tall, overtopping me by three inches; he ate well, told stories amusingly but without laughing himself, and he was famous for his witticisms. He spent his life at home, going out very seldom, and seeing almost no one because he always had a pipe in his mouth and was surrounded by eighteen or twenty cats with which he played for the greater part of the day. He had an old housekeeper, a cook, and a valet. His housekeeper saw to everything, handled his money, and, since she never let him want for anything, he never asked her to render an account. It is a remarkable fact that Crébillon's face resembled a lion's, or a cat's, which is the same thing. He was a royal censor,[34] and he told me it entertained him. His housekeeper read him the works which were brought to him, and paused in her reading when she thought something called for his criticism; and I often laughed over his quarrels with the woman when he was of a different opinion. One day I heard her turn away someone who had come to receive his corrected manuscript:

"Come next week," she said, "for we haven't had time to look over your work yet."

I visited Crébillon three times a week for a year, and I learned from him all the French I know, but I have never been able to rid myself of Italianisms; I recognize them when I find them in others; but when they come from my pen I do not recognize them, and I am sure I shall never learn to recognize them, just as I have never known what fault in Latinity Livy[35] is taxed with.

I composed an octet in irregular measure on a certain subject and took it to Crébillon for him to correct. After reading my eight lines attentively he addressed me as follows:

"Your thought is fine and very poetic; your language is flawless; your verses are good and exactly measured; nevertheless your octet is bad."

"How can that be?"

"I have no idea. What is lacking is the 'certain something.'[36] Imagine that you see a man and find him handsome, well built, pleasing, witty, and in short perfect in your most severe judgment. A woman comes up, she looks at him, and after considering him thoroughly she leaves, telling you that he does not please her. 'But, Madame, tell me what fault you find in him.' 'I don't know.' You go back to the man, you consider him more carefully, and you find that he is a castrato. 'Ah!' you say, 'now I see the reason why the woman did not find him to her taste.'"

It was by this comparison that Crébillon made me realize why my octet could not please.

At table we talked a great deal about Louis XIV,[37] to whom Crébillon had paid court for fifteen years, and he told us some very curious anecdotes which no one knew. He assured us that the Siamese Ambassadors[38] were rogues in the pay of Madame de Maintenon. He said that he had never finished his tragedy entitled Cromwell[39] because the King himself had one day told him not to waste his pen portraying a scoundrel.

He talked to us of his Catilina,[40] and said that he considered it the weakest of all his plays, but that he would not have wanted it to be good if, to make it so, he had had to bring Caesar on the stage, for Caesar as a young man would arouse laughter, as Medea[41] would do if she were brought on the stage before she knew Jason. He praised Voltaire's talent highly, at the same time accusing him of theft, for he had stolen the Senate scene[42] from him. He said that, to do him justice, he was born with every talent for writing history but that he falsified it and filled it with fairy tales to make it interesting. According to Crébillon the Man in the Iron Mask [43] was a fairy tale, and he said that he had been assured of it by Louis XIV himself.

The play being given at the Theâtre Italien that day was Cénie,[44] by Madame de Graffigny.[45] I went early to get a good place in the amphitheater.[46] The ladies covered with diamonds who were entering the first-tier boxes interested me, and I observed them attentively. I had a fine coat, but since the sleeves of it were open and it had buttons all the way down everyone who saw me recognized me as a foreigner; the fashion no longer existed in Paris. While my attention was thus occupied a richly dressed man three times my size approaches me and politely asks if I am a foreigner. I say that I am, and he immediately asks me if I like Paris. I reply by praising it; and at the same moment I see entering the box at my left a woman covered with jewels but immensely stout.

"Who on earth," I ask my fat neighbor, "is that fat sow?"

"She is the wife of this fat pig."

"Ah, Monsieur, I ask a million pardons."

But the man was in no state for me to beg his pardon for, far from being angry, he was choking with laughter. I was in despair. After having a good laugh, he rises, leaves the balcony, and a moment later I see him in the box speaking to his wife. I see them both laugh, and I was on the verge of leaving when I hear him calling me:

"Monsieur, Monsieur."

I cannot refuse without being impolite, and I approach the box. Now perfectly serious, he begs my pardon with the greatest dignity for having laughed so much and most graciously invites me to come to supper at his house that evening. I thank him and tell him that I already have an engagement. But he insists and his wife joins in, and to convince them that it is not a pretext I tell them that I am invited to Silvia's.

"I am certain," he says, "that I can obtain your release, if you have no objection; I will go to her myself."

I yield, he goes; he comes back later with Balletti, who gives me a message from his mother that she is delighted to have me make such excellent acquaintances and that she expects me for dinner the next day. Balletti tells me privately that it is Monsieur de Beauchamp,[47] Receiver-General of Finances.

After the play I gave my hand to Madame and got into her carriage. In their house I found the lavishness which was the rule among all people of their sort in Paris: a great crowd of guests, a great many parties at cards, and great gaiety at table. We rose from supper an hour after midnight, and I was driven home. The house was open to me during all the time I stayed in Paris, and it was very useful to me. Those who say that all foreigners who go to Paris are bored for at least the first two weeks are right, for it takes time to make one's way in. For my part, I know that in twenty-four hours I was already kept occupied and was sure that I would enjoy myself there.

The next morning Patu appeared at my lodging and presented me with the prose eulogy he had composed on the Maréchal de Saxe.[48] We set out together and went to breakfast at the Tuileries, where he introduced me to Madame du Boccage.[49] Speaking of the Maréchal de Saxe, the lady made a witty remark.

"It is strange," she said, "that we cannot say a De profundis for the man who has made us sing so many Te Deums." [50]

Afterward he took me to call on a famous actress of the Opéra whose name was Le Fel,[51] a favorite of all Paris and a member of the Royal Academy of Music.[52] She had three small and charming children, who fluttered about the house.

"I adore them," she said.

"The beauty of their faces," I said, "is of a different sort in each of the three."

"And well it may be. The eldest is the son of the Duke of Aneci,[53] that one is by Count Egmont,[54] and the youngest is the son of Maisonrouge,[55] who has just married La Romainville."

"Oh, oh. Excuse me, I beg you. I thought you were the mother of all three of them."

"And so I am."

So saying she looks at Patu, and she and he together burst out laughing, which makes me blush to the ears. I was a novice. I was not used to hearing a woman usurp the rights of men in this way. Mademoiselle Le Fel was not shameless, she was frank, and superior to all prejudices. The noblemen to whom these little bastards belonged left them in their mother's care and paid her a pension for bringing them up, and the mother lived in luxury. My inexperience of Parisian customs led me into many such awkward blunders. Mademoiselle Le Fel would have laughed at anyone who told her that I had wit after the interrogation through which I had put her.

Another day, calling on Lany,[56] the ballet master at the Opéra, I saw four or five girls, each accompanied by her mother, to whom he was giving dancing lessons. They were all between thirteen and fourteen years old, and had the modest manner which comes from being well brought up. I said flattering things to them, and they replied by lowering their eyes. One of them had a headache, and I made her smell Eau des Carmes;[57] her little friend asks her if she had slept well.

"It is not that," the child answers; "I think I am pregnant."

At this unexpected reply I say, like a fool:

"I should never have thought that Madame was married."

She looks at me, then turns to her friend, and they both fall to laughing with all their hearts. I went away covered with shame and determined that in future I would never impute virtue to young women of the theater. They pride themselves on not having it, and they laugh at the stupidity of those who impute it to them.

Patu introduced me to all the women of pleasure who enjoyed some reputation in Paris; he loved the fair sex as much as I did, but unfortunately for him he did not have as strong a constitution as mine and he paid for it with his life. If he had lived he would have taken Voltaire's place. He died at the age of thirty, at Saint-Jean-de-Maurienne,[58] on his way back from Rome to France. It was from him that I learned a secret which a number of young French writers use to make sure that their prose is perfect when they have to write something which demands the most beautiful prose possible, for example eulogies, funeral orations, letters of dedication. I got the secret out of Patu himself, by surprise.

One morning at his house I saw on his table loose sheets filled with unrhymed alexandrines;[59] I read a dozen verses and told him that, though they were well turned, they gave me more vexation than pleasure, and I added that what I had read in the verses had pleased me much more in the prose eulogy he had composed on the Maréchal de Saxe.

"My prose would not have pleased you if I had not first written everything I say in it in unrhymed alexandrines."

"That is going to a great deal of trouble for nothing."

"No trouble, since unrhymed verses require no effort. One writes them as if one were writing prose."

"Then you believe that your prose becomes more beautiful when you copy it from your own verses?"

"I believe it because there is no doubt of it; it becomes more beautiful, and in addition I make sure that my prose has not the fault of being full of hemistichs, which come from a writer's pen without his being aware of it."

"Is it a fault?"

"A great one, and unforgivable. Prose interlarded with chance verses is worse than prosaic poetry."

"It is true that involuntary verses which occur in an oration must make a bad impression and indeed be bad."

"Certainly. Take the example of Tacitus, whose history begins with Urbem Romam a principio reges habuere ('In the beginning the city of Rome was ruled by kings').[60] It is a very bad hexameter,[61] which he certainly did not write intentionally and which he did not notice afterward, for he would have constructed his sentence differently. Is not your Italian prose in which involuntary verses occur faulty?"

"Very faulty. But I will tell you that several writers of little genius put verses into their prose intentionally, to make it more sonorous; it is tinsel, but they flatter themselves that it will pass for gold and that their readers will not notice the difference. But I think you are the only writer who is willing to go to so much trouble."

"The only one? You are mistaken. All those to whom verses come without effort, as is the case with me, do it when the thing they are writing is to be copied by themselves. Ask Crébillon, the Abbé de Voisenon,[62] La Harpe,[63] anyone you please, and they will tell you what I am telling you. Voltaire was the first to make use of the art in the little pieces in which his prose is enchanting. His epistle to Madame du Châtelet[64] is one of them; it is superb; read it, and if you find a single hemistich, say that I am wrong."

I asked Crébillon, and he told me the same thing; but he assured me that he had never done it himself.

Patu could not wait to take me to the Opéra to see the impression which the spectacle would make on me, for an Italian cannot but find it extraordinary. The opera being given was entitled Les Fêtes vénitiennes.[65] An interesting title. We take places in the parterre, paying forty sous; one stands[66] there, and one finds good company. The spectacle is the delight of the nation. Solus Gallus cantat ("Only the cock [or: the Gaul] sings").[67]

After an overture which was very beautiful in its kind, performed by an excellent orchestra, the curtain goes up and I see a set representing the Piazzetta seen from the little island of San Giorgio Maggiore; but I am surprised to see the Doge's Palace on my left and the Procuratie and the great campanile on my right. This too ridiculous mistake—a disgrace to my century—begins by making me laugh, and Patu, whom I enlighten, has to laugh too. The music, though beautiful in the old style, entertains me for a time because of its newness, then bores me, and the recitative distresses me because of its monotony and its senseless shrieks. The French claim that this recitative of theirs replaces both the melopoeia of the Greeks and our recitativo, which they detest and which they would not detest if they understood our language.

As for the error in the stage setting, I attribute it to the crass ignorance of the painter, who had made a botch of copying a print. If he had found men wearing swords at their right sides he would not have understood that if he sees them on the right they should be on the left.

The action took place on a day during the Carnival, when the Venetians walk about masked in the great Piazza San Marco, and the scene represented gallants, procuresses, and women entering into and carrying on intrigues; everything in the way of costumes was false but amusing. But what really made me laugh was seeing the Doge and twelve Councilors come out of the wings in bizarre robes and fall to dancing a passacaglia.[68] Suddenly I hear the parterre clapping at the appearance of a tall, well-built masked dancer in a black wig with long curls which reached halfway to his waist and wearing a robe which was open in front and came down to his heels. Patu told me in devout and earnest tones that I was seeing the great Dupré.[69] I had heard him talked of, and I am all attention. I see the fine figure advance with rhythmical steps and, reaching the edge of the orchestra pit, slowly raise its arms in a circle, move them gracefully, extend them to the full, draw them in again, move its feet, take small steps, execute some mid-leg battements, then a pirouette, and disappear, backwards, into the wings. This whole dance of Dupré's lasted only thirty seconds. The clapping from the parterre and the boxes was universal; I ask Patu what it means, and he answers seriously that the applause was for Dupré's grace and the divine harmony of his movements. He was, he said, sixty years of age, and he was the same as he had been forty years earlier.

"What! He never danced differently?"

"He cannot have danced better; for the performance you saw is perfect. Is there anything above perfection? He always does the same thing, and we always find it new; such is the power of the beautiful, the good, the true, it speaks to the soul. This is true dancing; it is a song; you have no notion of it in Italy."

At the end of the second act out comes Dupré again with his face, needless to say, covered by a mask, and dances to a different air but, so far as I could see, the same thing. He advances toward the orchestra pit, halts for a moment, striking—I admit—a very fine pose; and suddenly I hear a hundred voices in the parterre whispering:

"Oh my God, my God! he is stretching, he is stretching."

And to tell the truth he appeared to be an elastic body which, by stretching, became larger. I granted Patu that there was grace in it all, and I saw that he was pleased. Immediately after Dupré I see a female dancer who rushes all over the stage like a madwoman, making entrechats to right and left in rapid succession, but scarcely rising, and violently applauded.

"She is the famous Camargo,[70] my friend, whom you have come to Paris in time to see. She is sixty years old too. She is the first woman dancer who dared to leap, before her they did not, and the wonderful thing is that she does not wear drawers."

"I beg your pardon, I saw."

"What did you see? It was only her skin, which, to tell the truth, is not white."

"La Camargo," I answered penitently, "does not please me; I prefer Dupré."

An admirer, a very old man, who was on my left, said that when she was young she did the saut de basque and even the gargouillade[71] and that he had never seen her thighs even though she danced without drawers.

"But if you never saw her thighs how can you swear that she did not have on drawers?"

"Oh, that sort of thing is easy to find out. I see that Monsieur is a foreigner."

"You are right about that."

A thing which pleased me at the French opera was the scene changes at the command of the whistle. Likewise the orchestra attacking at the stroke of the bow; but the originator of the music with scepter in hand indulging in violent movements to right and left, as if he had to make all the instruments work by strings, offended me.

What pleased me too was the silence of all the spectators. In Italy one is rightly scandalized by the insolent noise made during the singing, and one cannot but laugh afterward when one observes that silence is maintained during the performance of the ballet. There is not a place on earth where the observer does not note aberrations if he is a foreigner, for if he is a native of the country he cannot discern them.

I was delighted at the Comédie Française.[72] My great pleasure was to go there on the days when something old was being given and there were not two hundred spectators. I saw Le Misanthrope, L'Avare, Le Joueur, Le Glorieux,[73] and I pretended that I was seeing their first performances. I arrived in time to see Sarrazin, his wife Grandval, La Dangeville, La Dumesnil, La Gaussin, La Clairon, Préville,[74] as well as several actresses who had retired from the stage and were living on their pensions, among them La Levasseur.[75] I talked with them with pleasure, for they told me the most savory anecdotes. In addition they were very helpful. A tragedy was being performed in which a pretty actress played the mute role of a priestess.

"How pretty she is!" I said to one of these matrons.

"Yes, delicious. She's the daughter of the actor who played the confidant. She is very agreeable in company and shows a great deal of promise."

"I should very much like to make her acquaintance."

"Lord! that's not difficult. Her father and mother are civility itself, and I am sure they will be delighted if you ask them to invite you to supper, and they will not be in your way; they will go off to bed and leave you at table with the girl for as long as you please. You are in France, Monsieur, where people know what life is worth and try to make the most of it. We love pleasures and count ourselves happy if we can be the cause of them."

"Your way of thinking is divine, Madame; but how could I have the effrontery to ask an invitation to supper of respectable people who do not know me?"

"Lord, what are you saying? We know everyone. You see how I treat you. Would anyone think I did not know you? After the play I will introduce you."

"I will ask you, Madame, to do me the honor some other day."

"Whenever you please, Monsieur."

CHAPTER IX

My blunders in French, my successes, my numerous acquaintances. Louis XV. My brother comes to Paris.

ALL THE Italian actors in Paris wanted to show me how lavishly they lived. They invited me to meals, they entertained me. Carlino Bertinazzi,[1] who played Arlecchino, and whom everyone in Paris adored, reminded me that he had seen me at Padua thirteen years earlier, when he had come from Petersburg with my mother. He gave me a fine dinner in the house of Madame de La Caillerie,[2] where he was lodging. The lady was in love with him. She had four children, who fluttered about the house; I complimented her husband on their childish charm, and her husband replied that they were Carlino's.

"That may be so, but in the meanwhile it is you who take care of them, and it is you whom they should recognize as their father, whose name they will bear."

"Yes, that would be so in law; but Carlino is too decent a man not to look after them when I take it into my head to get rid of them. He knows very well that they are his, and my wife would be the first to complain if he did not admit it."

Thus did this honest man think, and thus did he express himself with the utmost calm. He loved Carlino as much as his wife loved him, with only the difference that the consequences of his fondness were not those which result in children being born. Affairs of this kind are not uncommon in Paris among people of a certain sort. Two of the greatest noblemen of France changed wives quite calmly and had children who bore the names not of their real fathers but of their mothers' husbands; this happened not a century ago (Boufflers and Luxembourg),[3] and the descendants of their children go under the same names today. Those who know about the matter laugh, and they are right. The privilege of laughing and being right is one which belongs only to those who know how a matter stands.

The richest of the Italian actors was Pantalone,[4] he was the father of Corallina and Camilla; in addition he knew and practiced the art of lending against pledges. He invited me to dinner with his family. The two sisters enchanted me. Corallina was being kept by the Prince of Monaco,[5] son of the Duke of Valentinois,[6] who was still alive, and Camilla was in love with the Count of Melfort,[7] the favorite of the Duchess of Chartres, who had recently become the Duchess of Orléans by the death of her father-in-law.

Corallina was less animated than Camilla, but she was prettier; I began paying my court to her at odd hours, as a person of no importance; but odd hours, too, belong to the proprietor; so I would sometimes be there at the time the Prince came to see her. On the first few of these occasions I bowed and left, but later I was asked to stay, for princes alone with their mistresses usually do not know what to do. The three of us would sup together, and their part would be to look at me, listen to me, and laugh; while mine was to eat and talk.

I thought it my duty to pay my respects to the Prince at the Hôtel de Matignon in the Rue de Varenne.

"I am very glad," he said to me one morning, "that you have come, for I promised the Duchess of Ruffec[8] that I would bring you to call on her, and we will go at once."

Another Duchess! I asked nothing better. We get into a diable,[9] a carriage then fashionable, and by eleven o'clock in the morning we are being received by the Duchess. I see a woman of sixty with a face covered with rouge, a blotchy complexion, thin, ugly, and faded, sitting immodestly on a sofa, who as soon as I appear cries:

"Oh, what a handsome young man! Prince, you are charming. Come and sit here, young man."

I obey, thoroughly astonished, and am immediately repelled by an unbearable stench of musk. I see a hideous bosom, which the virago displayed in its entirety, and pimples, not visible because they were covered with patches, but palpable. Where am I? The Prince leaves, saying that he will send his diable back for me in half an hour and will wait for me at Corallina's.

Scarcely is the Prince gone before the harpy surprises we with two drooling lips which offer me a kiss I should perhaps have put up with, but at the same time she extends a gaunt arm to the place to which her hellish fury bound her ugly soul saying:

"Let's see if you have a fine . . ."

"Oh, my God! Madame la Duchesse!"

"You draw back? You are acting like a child."

"Yes, Madame. Because . . ."

"What?"

"I have . . . I can't . . . I don't dare . . ."

"What's the matter with you?"

"I have the clap."[10]

"Filthy creature!"

She rises in anger, and so do I, and I make for the door and leave the house, very much afraid that the porter will stop me. I take a hackney coach, and I go and tell the infamous adventure in so many words to Corallina, who laughed heartily but at the same time agreed that the Prince had played me a foul trick. She praised the presence of mind with which I had escaped from the nasty situation; but she did not give me the opportunity to convince her that I had deceived the Duchess. Nevertheless I did not despair. I knew that she did not consider me enough in love.

At supper three or four days later I talked to her so eloquently and demanded my dismissal in such clear terms that she promised me the reward of my love on the following day.

"The Prince of Monaco," she said, "will not return from Versailles until day after tomorrow. Tomorrow we will go to the warren,[11] we will dine together in private, have a hunt with a ferret, and come back to Paris satisfied."

"Very good."

The next morning at ten o'clock we get into a cabriolet and are soon at the Vaugirard barrier.[12] Just as we are going through, along comes a vis-à-vis[13] with a foreign livery: "Stop, stop!"

It was the Chevalier de Württemberg, who, not condescending to give me even a look, begins flattering Corallina, then, thrusting out his whole head, whispers to her; she answers in the same manner, he speaks to her again, she thinks for a moment, then, taking my hand and with her face all smiles, says:

"I have important business with the Prince; go to the warren, my dear friend, dine there, hunt, and come to see me tomorrow."

So saying, she steps out, gets into the vis-à-vis, and abandons me.

Any of my readers who has found himself in a situation like mine has no need for me to explain the kind of anger with which I was fired at that outrageous moment. I am powerless to explain it to those who have not been so situated. I could not bear to remain in the accursed cabriolet a single instant; I told the driver to go to the devil, I took the first hackney coach I found, and went to see Patu, to whom I told the story in a fury. Patu found my adventure comical, not new, and quite within the rules.

"Within the rules?"

"Within the rules, for there is not a fancy man to whom something of the sort is not bound to happen, and who, if he is intelligent, is not willing to put up with it. For my part, I envy such a hitch; I would sign a note to have one like it tomorrow. I congratulate you. You are certain to have Corallina tomorrow."

"I don't want her any more."

"That's another matter. Shall we go dine at the Hôtel du Roule?[14]

"Yes indeed. It's an excellent idea. Let us go."

The Hôtel du Roule was celebrated in Paris. In the two months that I had spent there I had not yet seen it and I was most curious to do so. The capable woman who had rented it had furnished it very well and had twelve or fourteen choice girls there. She had a good cook, good wines, excellent beds, and she welcomed all who came to visit her. She was known as Madame Paris, she was protected by the police;[15] she was at some distance from Paris, hence she was certain that those who came to her establishment were people of means, for it was too far to go on foot. Her business was excellently organized; pleasures were charged for at a set price, which was not high. One paid six francs to breakfast with a girl, twelve francs to dine there, and a louis to sup and spend the night. It was an orderly house, and people spoke of it with admiration. I could not wait to be there, and I decided that it was better than the warren.

We get into a hackney coach. Patu says to the driver:

"To the Porte Chaillot."[16]

"I understand, Your Honor."

He is there in half an hour. He stops at a portecochère, on which I read "Hôtel du Roule." The door was closed. A mustachioed servant, emerging from a door at the rear, comes and looks at us. Satisfied with our appearance, he opens. We dismiss our coach, we enter; and he shuts the door. A well-dressed, polite woman, with one eye missing, who seemed to be about fifty, asks us if we have come to dine there and to see the young ladies of her household. We answer yes, and she conducts us to a drawing room where we see fourteen girls wearing identical dresses of white muslin, with their sewing in their hands, sitting in a semicircle; when we appear they all rise and simultaneously make us a deep curtsy. They all had their hair nicely dressed, were all about the same age, and all pretty—some tall, others of middle height, others short, some were brunettes, some blondes, some auburn-haired. We pass them all in review, saying a few words to each, and just as Patu was choosing his I take hold of mine. Our two choices cry out joyously, throw themselves on our necks, hurry us out of the room to show us the garden while we wait to be called for dinner. Madame Paris leaves us, saying:

"Take a stroll in my garden, gentlemen, enjoy the good air and the peace and silence which reign in my house, and I answer to you for the good health of the girls you have chosen."

After a short stroll each of us takes his partner to a room on the ground floor. The girl I had chosen looked rather like Corallina, so I immediately paid her my respects. We were summoned to table, where we dined moderately well, but we had scarcely finished our coffee when the one-eyed dame appeared, watch in hand, to tell us that our turn was over, but that by paying another six francs we could amuse ourselves until evening. Patu says that he agrees but wants to choose another partner, and I am of the same mind.

"It is for you to say, gentlemen."

So we go back to the seraglio, we choose again, and go out for a stroll. As might be expected, this second combat made us find the time too short. We were informed that it was up at an unpleasant moment, but we had to yield and obey the regulations. I took Patu aside, and after our philosophical considerations we concluded that these pleasures measured out by the hour fell short of perfection.

"Let us go back to the seraglio," I said, "and choose a third partner and assure ourselves that she will be in our power until tomorrow."

Patu liked my plan, and we went and imparted it to the abbess, who confessed that we thereby proved ourselves men of discernment. But when we entered the room to make a third choice, and the girls we had already had found that they were rejected, all the others laughed at them, and they avenged themselves by booing at us and saying that we were awkward.

But I was astonished when I saw my third, who was a beauty. I thanked Heaven that she had escaped me, for I was now sure that I would have her for fourteen hours. Her name was Saint-Hilaire;[17] she was the girl who, under the same name, became notorious a year later with an English nobleman who took her to England. She looked at me with an air of pride and scorn. It took me more than an hour's walk with her to calm her. She considered me unworthy to sleep with her because I had presumed not to take her either the first or the second time. But when I showed her that my inadvertence would now make us both the gainers, she began to laugh and she became charming to me. The girl had intelligence, culture, and everything necessary to make her fortune in the profession she had entered. While we were supping Patu said to me in Italian that I had forestalled him only by a moment, but he insisted on having her five or six days later. He assured me in the morning that he had spent the whole night sleeping; but I did not imitate him. La Saint-Hilaire was very well satisfied with me, and boasted of it to her companions. I returned to Madame Paris's more than ten times before I left for Fontainebleau, and I did not have the heart to take another girl. Saint-Hilaire was proud of having been able to hold me.

The Hôtel du Roule was the reason why I cooled off in my pursuit of Corallina. A Venetian musician named Guadagni,[18] handsome, well versed in his art, and a man of quick intelligence, succeeded in ingratiating himself with Corallina two or three weeks after I fell out with her. The handsome young fellow, who had only the appearance of virility, aroused Corallina's curiosity, and he was the cause of her breaking with the Prince of Monaco, who caught her in the act. But Corallina managed to patch it up with the Prince a month later, and to such effect that nine months later she gave him a child. It was a girl, whom she named Adélaïde[19] and whom the Prince dowered. Then the Prince left her after the death of the Duke of Valentinois to marry Signorina Brignole,[20] of Genoa, and Corallina became the mistress of Count de La Marche, who is now Prince of Conti.[21] Corallina is no longer living, nor is a son whom the Prince had by her and to whom he gave the title of Count of Montréal.[22] But to return to myself.

At this time Madame la Dauphine gave birth to a princess,[23] who at once received the title of Madame de France. In August I saw at the Louvre the new paintings which the members of the Royal Academy of Painting[24] were exhibiting to the public, and seeing no battle pieces I formed the plan of bringing my brother Francesco to Paris; he was in Venice and was talented in the genre. Parosselli,[25] the only French battle painter, being dead, I thought that my brother could make his fortune; I wrote to Signor Grimani and to my brother himself, and I persuaded them, but he did not reach Paris until the beginning of the next year.

King Louis XV, who was passionately fond of hunting, was in the habit of spending six weeks of the autumn of every year at Fontainebleau.[26] He was always back at Versailles by the middle of November. The journey cost him five millions; he took with him everything that could contribute to the enjoyment of all the foreign envoys and his whole court. The French and Italian comedians and his actors and actresses of the Opéra were commanded to follow him. During these six weeks Fontainebleau was far more brilliant than Versailles. Even so, the great city of Paris was not left without spectacles. Opera and the French and Italian players continued nevertheless, for there were so many actors that substitutes could be found for those who were absent.

Mario, Balletti's father, who had completely recovered his health, was to go there[27] with his wife Silvia and his whole family; he invited me to go with them, offering me a lodging in a house which he had rented, and I accepted. I could not have enjoyed a better opportunity to become acquainted with all the court of Louis XV and all the foreign envoys. So I at once waited on Signor Morosini,[28] now Procurator of San Marco, then Ambassador of the Republic to the King of France. The first day on which opera was given he permitted me to escort him; it was a piece by Lully.[29] I was seated in the parquet, exactly under the box occupied by Madame de Pompadour,[30] whom I did not know. In the very first scene the famous Lemaure[31] comes out of the wings and at her second line gives a shriek so loud and so unexpected that I thought she had gone mad; I give a little laugh, in all innocence, never imagining that anyone would think it out of place. A Blue Ribbon,[32] who was in attendance on the Marquise, asks me curtly from what country I come, and I answer curtly that I am from Venice.

"When I was in Venice I often laughed at the recitative in your operas too."

"I believe you, Monsieur, and I am equally certain that no one there ever thought of preventing you from laughing."

My rather sharp answer brought a laugh from Madame de Pompadour, who asked me if I really came from "down there."

"From where?"

"From Venice."

"Venice, Madame, is not down; it is up."

This answer of mine was thought even odder than my first, and the whole box falls to deciding whether Venice was down or up. Apparently it was concluded that I was right, and I was not attacked again. I listened to the opera without laughing, and since I had a cold I blew my nose too often. The same Blue Ribbon, whom I did not know, and who was the Maréchal de Richelieu,[33] remarked to me that apparently the windows of my room were not tightly closed.

"Beg pardon, Monsieur; they are even calfoutrées."

There was general laughter, and I was mortified because I realized that I had mispronounced the word calfeutrées.[34] I looked thoroughly humiliated. A half hour later Monsieur de Richelieu asks me which of the two actresses pleased me better in the way of beauty.

"That one."

"She has ugly legs."

"One does not see them, Monsieur, and in any case in assessing the beauty of a woman the first thing I put apart[35] is her legs."

This witticism, which I had uttered by chance and of whose implication I was unaware, gave me standing and made the company in the box curious about me. The Maréchal learned who I was from Signor Morosini himself, who told me that he[36] would be pleased to have me wait on him. My witticism became celebrated, and the Maréchal de Richelieu received me graciously. The foreign envoy on whom I waited most assiduously was Lord

Keith,[37] Marshal of Scotland, who was Ambassador from the King of Prussia. I shall have occasion to speak of him.

It was on the day after I arrived in Fontainebleau that I went to court alone. I saw the handsome King on his way to mass, the whole royal family, and all the court ladies, who surprised me by their ugliness as those at the court of Turin had surprised me by their beauty. But seeing a surprising beauty among so much ugliness, I asked someone what the lady's name was.

"She is Madame de Brionne,[38] Monsieur, who is even more virtuous than beautiful, for not only is there not a single story about her but she has never given the slightest occasion for slander to invent one."

"Perhaps nothing became known."

"Oh, Monsieur, at court everything becomes known."

I went on alone, prowling everywhere, even into the royal apartments, when I saw ten or twelve ugly ladies who looked as if they were running rather than walking and so awkwardly that they seemed about to fall flat on their faces. I asked where they were coming from and why they were walking so awkwardly.

"They are coming from the apartment of the Queen, who is about to dine, and they walk so awkwardly because their slippers have heels half a foot high, which makes them walk with their knees bent."

"Why do they not wear lower heels?"

"Because they think these make them look taller."

I enter a gallery and I see the King pass supporting himself with one arm around Monsieur d'Argenson's[39] shoulders. Louis XV's head was ravishingly beautiful and set on his neck to perfection. Not even a most skillful painter could draw the attitude the monarch gave it when he turned to look at someone. One felt instantly forced to love him. I thought that I saw the majesty for which I had looked in vain in the face of the King of Sardinia. I felt certain that Madame de Pompadour had already fallen in love with that countenance when she contrived to make his acquaintance. Perhaps it was not true, but the face of Louis XV[40] compelled the observer to think so.

I enter a room in which I see ten or twelve courtiers walking up and down, and a table prepared for dinner, big enough for twelve, but set only for one.

"For whom is that table?"

"For the Queen, who is about to dine. There she is."

I see the Queen of France,[41] without rouge, wearing a large bonnet, looking old and pious, thanking two nuns who set on the table a plate containing fresh butter. She sits down; the ten or twelve courtiers who were walking about station themselves before the table in a semicircle ten paces away, and I join them in the deepest silence.

The Queen begins to eat, looking at no one and keeping her eyes fixed on her plate. She had eaten some of a dish and, finding it to her taste, she returned to it, but as she returned to it she cast her eyes over the company, apparently to see if she saw anyone to whom she should justify her epicureanism. She found him and she addressed him, saying:

"Monsieur de Lowendal."[42]

At the name I see a handsome man two inches taller than myself, who, bowing and taking three steps toward the table, answers:

"Madame."

"I believe that the best ragout of all is a fricassee of chicken."

"I am of that opinion, Madame."

After this answer, which was delivered in the most serious tone, the Queen eats and the Maréchal de Lowendal falls back three steps and resumes his previous station. The Queen said no more, finished dining, and returned to her apartments.

Curious as I was to make the acquaintance of the celebrated soldier who had taken Bergen-op-Zoom,[43] I am enchanted to have done so on this occasion. Consulted by the Queen of France on the excellence of a fricassee, and giving his opinion in the same tone in which a death sentence is pronounced at a court-martial. Enriched by the anecdote, I go to regale Silvia's table with it at an elegant dinner at which I found the choicest of agreeable company.

A week or ten days later I am in the gallery at ten o'clock, forming a line with everyone else to have the ever fresh pleasure of seeing the King go by on his way to mass and the singular pleasure of seeing the nipples of Mesdames de France[44] his daughters, who were so dressed that they displayed them to everyone, together with their completely bare shoulders, when I am surprised to see La Cavamacchie, Giulietta,[45] whom I had left in Cesena under the name of Signora Querini. If I was surprised to see her, she was no less so to see me in such a place. Giving her his arm was the Marquis de Saint-Simon,[46] first gentleman of the bedchamber to Prince de Conti.[47]

"Signora Querini at Fontainebleau?"

"You here? I remember Queen Elizabeth,[48] who said: Pauper ubique jacet" ("The poor man makes his bed everywhere").[49]

"The comparison is excellent, Madame."

"I am joking, my friend; I have come here to see the King, who does not know me, but the Ambassador will present me tomorrow."

She takes her place in the line five or six paces above me in the direction from which the King was to come. The King enters, with Monsieur de Richelieu by his side, and I see him immediately look at the supposed Madame Querini, and as he walks along I hear him address his friend exactly in these words:

"We have prettier women here."

After dinner I go to the Venetian Ambassador's, and I find him at dessert with a large company, seated beside Signora Querini, who, on seeing me, says the most gracious things possible, which was extraordinary in such a nitwit who had no reason either past or present to like me, for she was aware that I knew her through and through and had been able to make her do as I wished. But I understand the reason for it all, and I make up my mind to do everything to please her and even to serve her as a false witness if that should be what she needed.

She comes round to speaking of Signor Querini, and the Ambassador congratulates her on his having rendered justice to her merit by marrying her.

"Strangely enough," said the Ambassador, "I did not know of it."

"Yet it happened more than two years ago," said Giulietta.

"It is a fact," I said to him, "for it was two years ago that General Spada introduced the Signora by the name of Querini to all the nobility in Cesena, where I had the honor to be."

"I do not doubt it," said the Ambassador, looking at me, "since Querini himself writes me of it."

When I made to leave, the Ambassador took me into another room on the pretext of showing me a letter. He asked me what was said in Venice on the subject of the marriage, and I answered that no one knew of it and that, in fact, people were saying that the heir of the house of Querini was to marry a Grimani.[50]

"I will write the news to Venice day after tomorrow."

"What news?"

"That Giulietta is really Querini, since Your Excellency will present her as such to Louis XV."

"Who told you that I shall present her?"

"She herself."

"She may have changed her mind by now."

I thereupon repeated to him the exact words I had heard from the King's lips, which showed him the reason why Giulietta no longer wished to be presented. Monsieur de Saint-Quentin,[51] the minister who secretly carried out the monarch's private commands, had gone in person after mass to tell the beautiful Venetian that the King of France had poor taste, since he had not thought her more beautiful than several other ladies at his court. Giulietta left Fontainebleau early the next morning. I discussed Giulietta's beauty at the beginning of these memoirs;[52] her countenance had extraordinary charms, but they had lost their power by the time I saw her at Fontainebleau; then, too, she painted her face white, an artifice which the French cannot forgive; and they are right, for white paint conceals nature. Yet women, whose business is to please, will continue to use it, for they always hope to find a man who is taken in by it.

After my journey to Fontainebleau I saw Giulietta again at the Venetian Ambassador's; she laughed and told me that she had been joking when she called herself Madame Querini and that in future she would be obliged to me if I would call her by her real name of Countess Preati;[53] she told me to come and see her at the Hôtel du Luxembourg, where she was staying. I went there very often to amuse myself by observing her intrigues, but I never entered into them. During the four months which she spent in Paris she drove Signor Zanchi out of his mind. He was secretary of the Venetian Embassy, an amiable, upright, and well-read man. She made him fall in love with her, he said he was ready to marry her, she flattered him, and then she treated him so badly and made him so jealous that the poor wretch lost his reason and died soon afterward. Count Kaunitz,[54] Ambassador of the Empress-Queen, was attracted by her, and so was Count Zinzendorf.[55] The intermediary in these brief affairs was an Abbé Guasco,[56] who, not being rich and being extremely ugly, could aspire to her favors only by becoming her confidant. But the man on whom she set her heart was the Marquis de Saint-Simon. She wanted to become his wife, and he would have married her if she had not given him false addresses for him to obtain information about her birth. The Preati family, of Verona, which she had appropriated, disowned her, and Monsieur de Saint-Simon, who despite his love had managed to keep his common sense, had the strength of mind to leave her. She did not come off well in Paris, and she left her diamonds in pawn there. Back in Venice, she managed to marry the son of the same Signor Uccelli[57] who sixteen years earlier had taken her out of poverty and put her on the stage. She died ten years ago.

In Paris I still went to take lessons from the elder Crébillon; nevertheless my speech, which was full of Italianisms, often made me say in company what I did not mean to say, and my remarks almost always produced very odd jokes which were repeated afterward; but my gibberish did not prevent people from forming a favorable opinion of my wit; on the contrary, it gained me some choice acquaintances. Several women who mattered asked me to come and teach them Italian, adding that it would give them the pleasure of correcting my French, and in the exchange I gained more than they did.

Madame Préaudeau,[58] who was one of my pupils, received me one morning still in bed and saying that she did not feel like taking a lesson because she had taken medicine the night before. I asked her if during the night she had déchargé[59] well.

"What a question! What curiosity! You are intolerable."

"Lord, Madame, why does one take a medicine if it is not to décharger?"

"A medicine purges, Monsieur, and does not make one décharger, and let this be the last time in your life that you use the word."

"I know very well, now that I think of it, that I can be misinterpreted; but say what you will, it is the right word."

"Would you like some breakfast?"

"No, Madame, I've had it. I drank a café with two Savoyards[60] in it."

"Good God! I am lost. What a madman's breakfast! Explain yourself."

"I drank a café, as I drink one every morning."

"But that is nonsense, my friend; a café is the shop in which it is sold, and what one drinks is a cup of it."

"Do you drink the cup? In Italy we say un caffè, and we have brains enough to understand that we didn't drink the shop."

"He refuses to be wrong. And the two Savoyards—how did you swallow them?"

"Dipped in the coffee. They were no bigger than those you have there on your night table."

"You call those Savoyards? Say biscuits."

"We call them Savoyards in Italy, Madame, for the fashion for them came from Savoy, and it is not my fault if you thought I ate two of those porters who stand at street corners to serve the public and whom you call Savoyards,[61] while they may be from some other country. In future I will say that I have eaten biscuits, to conform to your usage; but permit me to tell you that the term Savoyards fits them better."

In comes her husband; she tells him of our disagreements; he laughs and says that I am right. Her niece enters. She was a girl of fourteen, well behaved, intelligent, and extremely modest; I had given her five or six lessons, and since she liked the language and applied herself earnestly she was beginning to speak. Here is the fatal compliment which she addressed to me:

"Signore, sono incantata di vi vedere in buona salute" ("Sir, I am delighted to see you in good health").

"I thank you, Mademoiselle, but to translate 'I am delighted' you must say ho piacere. And again, to translate 'to see you,' you must say di vidervi, not di vi vedere."

"I thought, Monsieur, that the vi should be put in front."

"No, Mademoiselle, we put it derrière" ("behind").[62]

Monsieur and Madame are dying with laughter, the young lady smiling, and I speechless and in despair at having made so gross a blunder; but it was done. I take up a book, sulking and wishing in vain that their laughter would end; but it lasted more than a week. My shameless double-entendre spread all over Paris and made me furious; but I at last learned the power of words and for the time being my credit diminished. Crébillon, after laughing heartily, told me that I should have said après instead of derrière. But if the French laughed over the mistakes I made in speaking their language, I took my revenge by pointing out some absurd usages of theirs.

"Monsieur," I ask, "how is Madame your wife?"

"You do her great honor."

"Her honor has nothing to do with it; I am asking after her health."

A young man in the Bois de Boulogne falls from his horse; I run to pick him up, but he is on his feet and full of life.

"Have you come to any harm?"

"On the contrary, Monsieur."

"Then I take it the fall did you good."

I am calling on Madame la Présidente Charon[63] for the first time; her nephew makes a brilliant entrance; she presents me and tells him my name and country.

"What! You are an Italian, Monsieur? On my word, you make such a good appearance that I would have wagered you were French."

"Monsieur, when I saw you I very nearly fell into the same error—I would have wagered that you were Italian."

"I did not know that I looked Italian."

I was at table at Lady Lambert's,[64] someone remarked on a cornelian I had on my finger on which the head of Louis XV was engraved to perfection. My ring makes the round of the table, everyone finds the likeness striking; a young Marquise hands me back the ring, saying:

"Is it really an antique?"

"You mean the stone? Yes, Madame, it is."

Everyone laughs, and the Marquise, who had the reputation of being intelligent, does not see fit to ask why people are laughing. After dinner the conversation turns to the rhinoceros which was being shown at the fair at Saint-Germain[65] for twenty-four sous a head. "Let us go see it, let us go see it!" We get into a carriage, stop at the fair, and take several turns through the walks, looking for the one in which the rhinoceros was. I was the only man, I had a lady on either arm, the intelligent Marquise was preceding us. At the end of the walk where we had been told the animal was, its master was sitting at the gate to take their money from people who wished to go in. It is true that he was dressed in African costume, enormously fat, and looked like a monster; but the Marquise ought at least to have recognized that he was a man. Not a bit of it.

"Are you the rhinoceros, Monsieur?"

"Step in, Madame, step in."

She sees us choking with laughter, and, seeing the real rhinoceros, she feels obliged to apologize to the African, assuring him that she had never in her life seen a rhinoceros and so he must not be offended if she had made a mistake.

In the greenroom of the Comédie Italienne, where during the intermissions the greatest noblemen are to be found, for they go there to get warm in winter and at all seasons to amuse themselves by talking with the actresses who sit there waiting for their turns in the parts they are playing, I was sitting beside Camilla, Corallina's sister, keeping her laughing by flirting with her. A young councilor, who did not like my monopolizing her attention, attacked me in a conceited tone on an account I had given of an Italian play and showed his ill-humor only too clearly by unjustly criticizing my country. I answered him in a way which he did not expect, keeping my eyes on Camilla, who laughed; and everyone present was intent on the encounter, which, as it was only a duel of wits, had nothing so far to make it disagreeable. But it seemed to become serious when the fop, changing the subject to the police of the city, said that for some time it had been dangerous to walk at night in Paris.

"In the last month," he said, "Paris has seen seven hanged men in the Place de Grève[66] and five of them were Italians. It is astonishing."

"Not at all astonishing," I replied, "for right-thinking people go and get themselves hanged outside their own countries—in proof of which sixty Frenchmen were hanged last year between Naples, Rome, and Venice. Five times twelve makes sixty, and you see that it is only a fair exchange."

The laughter was all on my side, and the young councilor left. An agreeable nobleman who thought I had answered well came up to Camilla and asked her in a whisper who I was, and the acquaintance was made. He was Monsieur de Marigny,[67] brother of Madame la Marquise, whom I was delighted to know so that I could present my brother to him, for I was expecting him from day to day. He was overseer of the royal buildings, and the whole Academy of Painting was under his jurisdiction. I mentioned my brother to him at once, and he promised me that he would be his patron. Another young nobleman struck up a conversation with me, asked me to come to see him, and told me that he was the Duke of Maddaloni.[68] I told him that I had seen him when he was still a child, eight years earlier in Naples, and that Don Lelio Caraffa, his uncle, had been my benefactor. The young Duke was delighted, and, he having repeatedly insisted that I come to see him, we became good friends.

My brother arrived in Paris in the spring of 1751, lodged with me at Madame Quinson's, and began working successfully for private individuals; but since his main idea was to paint a picture for the Academy to judge, I presented him to Monsieur de Marigny, who received him graciously and encouraged him by promising him his protection. So he set to work making sketches, in order not to fail in his purpose.

Signor Morosini, having completed his embassy, had gone back to Venice, and Signor Mocenigo[69] had come in his place. I had been recommended to him by Signor Bragadin and he opened his house to me, as he did to my brother, whom he was concerned to patronize as a Venetian and as a young man who was seeking to make his fortune in France by his talent.

Signor Mocenigo was completely unassuming; he loved gambling, and he always lost; he loved women, and he was unsuccessful because he did not know how to go about it. Two years after he came to Paris he fell in love with Madame de Colande;[70] she would have none of him, and the Venetian Ambassador killed himself.

Madame la Dauphine gave birth to a Duke of Burgundy,[71] and the rejoicings which I witnessed become incredible today when we see what the very same nation is doing against its King.[72] The nation wants to free itself; its ambition is noble and reasonable, and it will bring its enterprise to fulfillment under this same monarch, who, by a strange and unique coincidence, has a soul without ambition, the successor to sixty-five kings, all of them more or less ambitious and jealous of their authority. But is it likely that his soul will pass into the body of his successor?

France has seen her throne occupied by several other monarchs who were indolent, who hated work, avoided difficulties, and were concerned only with their own peace of mind. Secluded at the center of their palace, abandoning despotism to their deputies, who acted in their names, they always remained kings and true monarchs; but the world has never seen a king like this one, who has in good faith put himself at the head of the nation which has assembled to dethrone him. He seems delighted that he has at last reached the point of not having to think of anything except obeying. Hence he was not born to reign, and it seems certain that he regards as his personal enemies all those who, animated by a genuine regard for his interests, do not subscribe to the decrees of the Assembly, all of which are calculated to degrade the King's majesty.

A nation which revolts to cast off the yoke of despotism, which it calls and will always call "tyranny," is not unusual, for it is natural; the proof is that the monarch always expects it and is careful not to drop the reins, for he is certain that the nation will not fail to take the bit in its teeth. What is unusual, unique, and unexampled is a monarch who puts himself at the head of twenty-three millions of his subjects and asks nothing of them except that they leave him the empty name of king and leader, not that he may command them but to execute their orders. "Be legislators," he says to them, "and I will see that all your laws are carried out, provided that you will give me armed assistance against the unruly who will not obey; moreover you will be free to pursue them tooth and claw and tear them to pieces without any sort of legal proceedings; for who could oppose your will? You will actually occupy my place. Those who will object to this will be the nobles and the priests, but they are only one against twenty-five. It is for you to clip their physical and moral wings so that they will have no power to set bounds to your authority or to harm you. To achieve this you will break the pride of the priests by giving ecclesiastical dignities to your equals and by giving them only such stipends as are necessary to support them. As for the nobility, you do not need to impoverish it; you will have done enough if you cease to respect it for its empty titles of birth; there will be no more nobles; follow the example of the wise Turkish regulations;[73] when these gentlemen find that they are no longer dukes or marquises they will moderate their ambition, and the only pleasure which will remain to them will be to spend their money on ostentation, and so much the better for the nation, for their expenditures will pour their money into it, and it will make their money circulate and increase by commerce. As for my ministers, they will be discreet in the future, for they will depend upon you and it will not be for me to judge of their capability; I will choose them myself for form's sake; but I will dismiss as many of them as you please. I shall thus at last see an end to the tyranny under which they oppressed me, by making me do whatever they wished, by very frequently compromising me, and by always burdening the State with debt in my name. I said nothing, but I could bear it no longer. Now at last I am delivered. My wife, and in time my children, my brothers, my cousins who call themselves princes of the blood, will condemn me, I know, but only in their hearts, for they will not dare to speak out to me. I shall instill more fear in them now under your high protection than I did when my only defense was my household, the uselessness of which I have myself helped you demonstrate to the public.

"Those who are discontented and have gone to live outside of the kingdom will return to it one day or another if they feel so inclined, and if not, they must be left to do as they please; they say that they are my true friends, and they make me laugh, for I cannot have any true friends except those who are willing to think as I do. The only important thing in the world, according to them, is the ancient rights of our house to royalty and its concomitant despotism; the only important thing in the world, according to me, is first my peace, second the extirpation of the tyranny which my ministers exercised over me, and third that you should be content. I could also tell you, if I were a charlatan, that what concerns me is the wealth of the kingdom, but I am indifferent to it; it is for you to think of it, it concerns only you, since the kingdom is no longer mine; I am no longer, thanks be to God, King of France; but I am, as you very well put it, King of the French. All that I ask of you is that you make haste, and let me go hunting at last, for I am tired of being bored.''

This historic and completely authentic harangue proves, I believe, that the counterrevolution cannot take place. But it also proves that it will take place when the King changes his way of thinking; and there is no likelihood of that, as there is no likelihood that he can have a successor who will resemble him.

The National Assembly will do whatever it pleases, despite the nobility and the clergy, because it has at its service the unbridled people, the blind executor of its orders. At the present moment the French nation can be regarded as like gunpowder, or like chocolate; both are composed of three ingredients; their goodness could not, and cannot, depend upon anything but the proportions. Time will show us which ingredients were in excess before the Revolution, or which ingredients are in excess now. All I know is that the stench of sulphur is deadly and that vanilla is a poison.

As for the people, the people is the same everywhere: give a thief six francs to shout ''Long live the King,'' he will do you the favor, and for three livres[74] he will shout ''Death to the King'' a minute later. Put a rabble-rouser at its head and in one day it will destroy a citadel of marble. It has neither laws, nor system, nor religion; its gods are bread, wine, and idleness, it believes that liberty means impunity, that aristocrat means tiger, that demagogue means loving shepherd of his flock. The people, in short, is only an enormous animal which does not reason. The prisons of Paris are overflowing with prisoners who were all members of the people in revolt. Let anyone go and say to them, "I will open the doors of your prison if you will promise to blow up the hall in which the Assembly sits," they will agree and go at once. Every people is a union of executioners. The French clergy knows this; hence the clergy counts on nothing but the people if it can succeed in inspiring them with religious zeal, which is perhaps even stronger than zeal for liberty, which is known only by a process of abstraction of which material minds are incapable.

It is possible, moreover, not to believe that there is a single member of the National Assembly who is solely animated by his country's good. The soul of each of them is his own self-interest; and there is not one among them who, if he were king, would have imitated Louis XVI.

The Duke of Maddaloni introduced me to the Roman Princes Don Marcantonio and Don Giovanni Battista Borghese[75] who were amusing themselves in Paris and living without ostentation. I observed that when these Roman princes are presented at the French court they are received only under the title of Marquis. For the same reason the Russian princes who were presented were not accorded the title of Prince; they were called Knez.[76] It made no difference to them, for the word means "Prince." The French court was always scrupulously particular in the matter of titles. Simply reading the gazette is enough to show it. The title "Monsieur"—which is commonly given everywhere—is used very sparingly; "Sieur" is the form of address to the untitled. I noticed that the King called none of his bishops "Bishop," he called them "Abbé." He also affected not to know any nobleman of his kingdom whose name he did not find inscribed among those who were in his service. Yet the haughtiness of Louis XV had only been inculcated into him by his upbringing, it was not natural to him. When an ambassador presented someone to him, the person so presented went home certain that the King of France had seen him, but that was all. He was the most polite of Frenchmen, especially toward ladies and toward his mistresses in public; he dismissed from his favor anyone who dared to fail in respect to them, even in the slightest; and no one more than he possessed the royal virtue of dissimulation, faithfully keeping a secret and delighted when he was sure that he knew something of which everyone else had no inkling. Monsieur d'Éon's being a woman[77] is a small example. The King alone knew, and had always known, that he was a woman, and the whole altercation between the false Chevalier and the Foreign Office was a comedy which the King allowed to play itself out simply because it amused him.

Louis XV was great in everything, and he would not have had a failing if flattery had not forced failings upon him. How could he know that he was at fault when he was always being told that he was the best of kings? About this time the Princess of Ardore gave birth to a son.[78] Her husband, who was the Neapolitan Ambassador, wanted Louis XV to stand godfather to it, and the King consented. The present he gave his godson was a regiment. The new mother would have none of it, because she did not like soldiers. The Maréchal de Richelieu told me that he had never seen the King laugh so much as when he was informed of her refusal.

At the Duchess of Fulvy's[79] I made the acquaintance of Mademoiselle Gaussin,[80] known as Lolotte, who was the mistress of Lord Albemarle,[81] the English Ambassador, a man of brilliant and most noble parts and very generous, who, one night when he was out walking with Lolotte, chided her for praising the beauty of the stars she saw in the sky, since he could not give them to her. If His Lordship had been the English envoy in France at the time of the break between his nation and the French he would have patched things up, and the unhappy war which caused France to lose the whole of Canada[82] would not have occurred. There is no doubt that the harmony between two nations most often depends upon the respective envoys whom they have at the courts which are on the verge or in danger of falling out.

As for his mistress, all who knew her had the same opinion of her. She had all the qualities to deserve to become his wife, and the greatest houses in France did not consider that she needed the title of Lady Albemarle in order to be admitted into their society, and no woman was offended to find her seated at her side because it was common knowledge that she had no title except that of His Lordship's mistress. She passed from her mother's arms into His Lordship's at the age of thirteen, and her conduct was always irreproachable; she had children, whom His Lordship recognized, and she died Countess of Érouville. I will speak of her in due course.

At this same time I met at the house of the Venetian Ambassador Signor Mocenigo a Venetian lady,[83] the widow of the English baronet Wynne, who had just come from London with her children. She had gone there to make sure of her dowry and the estate of her late husband, which could not pass to her children unless they declared that they were of the Anglican religion. She had accomplished this, and she was returning to Venice satisfied with her journey. She had with her her eldest daughter,[84] who was only twelve years old but whose character was already delineated to perfection in her beautiful face. She now lives in Venice, the widow of the late Count Rosenberg, who died in Venice as Ambassador from the Empress-Queen Maria Theresa; she shines in her native country by her discreet behavior, her wit, and her social virtues, which are of the highest. Everyone says of her that her only failing is not being rich. It is true, but no one can complain of it; she feels how great a failing it is only when it prevents her from being generous.

At this time I had some little difficulties with the French guardians of the law.

CHAPTER X

I run foul of the law in Paris. Mademoiselle Vesian.

THE YOUNGEST daughter of my landlady Madame Quinson often came to my room unsummoned, and having perceived that she loved me I should have thought it strange in me if I had taken it into my head to be cold to her—the more so as she was not without qualities, she had a pretty voice, she read all the new publications, and rattled away about everything with a vivacity which was charming. Her age was an ambrosial fifteen or sixteen.

For the first four or five months there was nothing between us but childish trifling; but happening one night to come in very late I found her asleep on my bed. Curious to see if she would wake, I undressed by myself, I got in, and the rest goes without saying. At daybreak she went downstairs and got into her own bed. Her name was Mimi. Two or three hours later chance would have it that a milliner came with a young girl to see if I would offer them a breakfast. The girl was pretty, but having worked too hard with Mimi I told them to go away after spending an hour chatting with them. As they were leaving my room, in comes Madame Quinson with Mimi to make my bed. I sit down to write, and I hear her say:

"Oh, the sluts!"

"To whom do you refer, Madame?"

"The riddle is easily answered; these sheets are ruined."

"I am sorry; excuse me; say nothing and change them."

"Say nothing? Just let the hussies come back!"

She goes downstairs for fresh sheets, Mimi remains, I reproach her for her imprudence, she laughs and says that Heaven has protected the innocence of our doings. From that day on Mimi stood on no ceremony; she came to sleep with me when she felt the need, and I, no less unceremoniously, sent her away when I did not want her, and our little household was as harmonious as possible. Four months after our union Mimi told me she was pregnant; I answered that I did not know anything to do about it.

"Something must be thought of."

"Then think."

"What am I to think of? What will happen, will happen. As for me, I will not give it another thought."

By the fifth or sixth month Mimi's belly leaves her mother in no doubt of the state of things; she takes her by the hair, beats her, forces her to admit it, insists on knowing who is responsible for her girth; and Mimi tells her—and perhaps truthfully—that it is I.

Madame Quinson comes upstairs and enters my room raging. She flings herself into an armchair, recovers her breath, relieves her anger by insulting me, and ends by saying that I must prepare to marry her daughter. At this ultimatum I understand what is afoot, and I reply that I am married in Italy.

"Then why did you go and give my daughter a baby?"

"I assure you I had no such intention, and besides, who told you that it is I?"

"She did, Monsieur, she is certain of it."

"I congratulate her; for my part, I am ready to swear that I am not certain of it."

"Then what?"

"Then nothing. If she is pregnant, she will bear a child."

She goes downstairs threatening me, and from my window I see her get into a hackney coach. The next day I am summoned before the district commissary;[1] I go, and find Madame Quinson in battle array. After asking my name, how long I had been in Paris, and various other things, and writing down all my answers, the commissary asks me if I admit having done the wrong of which I was accused to the daughter of the lady there present.

"Be good enough, Monsieur le Commissaire, to write down my answer word for word."

"Very well."

"I have done no wrong to Mimi, daughter of Madame Quinson here present, and I refer you to Mimi herself, who has always shown me the same friendship that I have shown her."

"She says that you made her pregnant."

"It is possible, but it is not certain."

"She says it is certain, since she has seen no man but you."

"If that is true, she is unfortunate, for a man cannot trust anyone in such a matter except his wife."

"What did you give her to seduce her?"

"Nothing, for it was she who seduced me, and we were of one mind in an instant."

"Was she a virgin?"

"I was not concerned about that either before or afterward; so I have no idea."

"Her mother demands reparation from you, and the law is against you."

"I have no reparation to make to her, and as for the law, I will gladly submit to it when I have seen it and am convinced that I have broken it."

"You have already admitted that. Do you maintain that a man who gets a decent girl with child in a house of which he is an inmate does not transgress the laws of society?"

"I agree, if the mother is deceived; but when she sends her daughter to my own room, must I not suppose that she is prepared to suffer all the consequences of the frequentation without complaining?"

"She sent her to you only to serve you."

"And she served me, even as I served her in the needs of human nature; and if she sends her to me this evening I may do the same, if Mimi is willing, but nothing by force, or outside of my room, for which I have always punctually paid the rent."

"You can say what you please, but you will pay the fine."

"I will pay nothing, for there cannot be a fine to pay when no violation of law has occurred, and if I am found guilty I will appeal to the last jurisdiction and until equity does me justice, for I know that such as I am I shall never have the ill grace to refuse my caresses to a girl who attracts me and who comes to my own room to submit to them, especially when I am certain that she has come with her mother's consent."

Such, or very nearly such, was my interrogation, which I read and signed and which the commissary transmitted to the Lieutenant-General of Police,[2] who summoned me to a hearing and who, after examining the mother and daughter, acquitted me and sentenced the imprudent mother to pay the costs. Nevertheless I yielded to Mimi's tears and defrayed her mother for her lying-in. She gave birth to a boy, whom I allowed to go to the Hôtel-Dieu[3] for the benefit of the nation. After all this Mimi ran away from her mother's house to appear on the stage of the comic opera[4] at the Saint-Laurent fair[5] under Monnet.[6] As she was not known she had no trouble finding a lover who thought her a virgin. I was delighted when I saw her on the stage at the fair. I thought her very pretty.

"I did not know," I said to her, "that you were a musician."

"Like all the rest of us here. The girls at the Paris Opéra don't know a note either; but they sing just the same. All one needs is a good voice."

I asked Mimi to have Patu to supper and he thought her charming. But later she got into trouble. She fell in love with a violinist named Bérard[7] who ran through everything she had, and she disappeared.

The Italian players were then allowed to give parodies of operas and tragedies on their stage, and I made the acquaintance of the famous Chantilly[8] who had been the mistress of the Maréchal de Saxe,[9] and who was known as Favart because the poet Favart[10] had married her. She sang the part of Tonton in the parody of Monsieur de Fontenelle's[11] Thétis et Pélée,[12] to tremendous applause. Her charms and her talent won the heart of a man of the greatest merit, whom all France knew by his works. He was the Abbé de Voisenon,[13] with whom I became as intimately acquainted as I had been with Crébillon. All the plays which are generally supposed to be by Madame Favart and which bear her name are by the celebrated Abbé, who was elected to the Academy[14] after my departure. I made his acquaintance, I cultivated it, and he honored me with his friendship. It was from me that he conceived the idea of writing oratorios in verse, which were sung for the first time at the Concert Spirituel[15] at the Tuileries during the few days of the year when religion commands that the theaters be closed. The Abbé, secretly the author of several comedies, was a man whose health was as precarious as his person was small; he was all sparkle and grace, famous for his witticisms, which were cutting and which nevertheless offended no one. He could not have enemies, for his criticism only grazed the skin and did not sting.

"The King was yawning," he told me one day when he had just come back from Versailles, "because he has to go to the Parlement tomorrow to hold a bed of justice."[16]

"Why is it called a 'bed of justice'?"

"I don't know. Perhaps because justice sleeps in it."

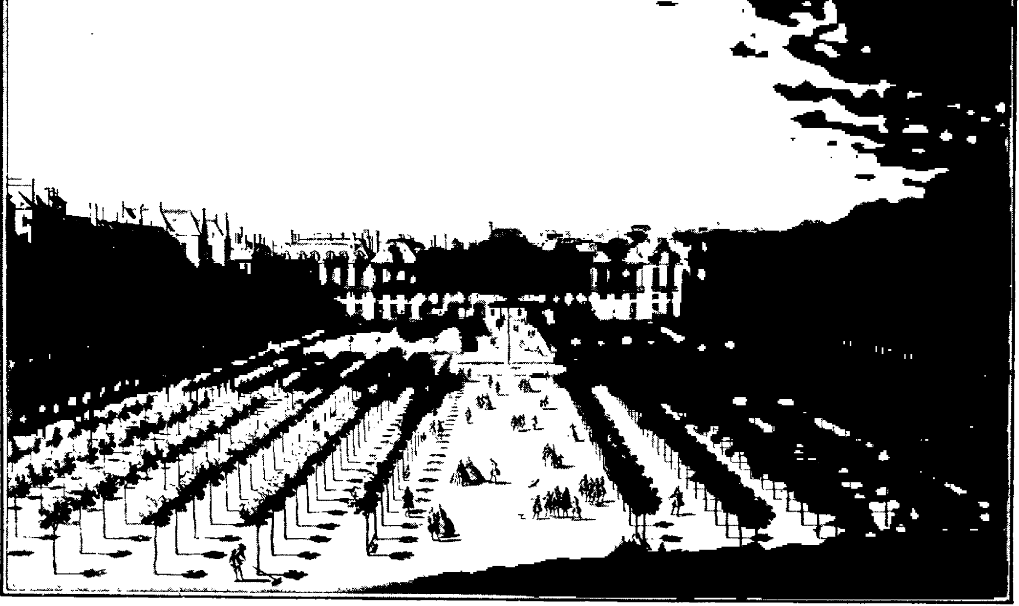
I found the image of the Abbé at Prague in the person of Count Franz Hartig,[17] now Minister Plenipotentiary of the Emperor at the electoral court of Saxony. It was the Abbé who introduced me to Monsieur de Fontenelle, who was then ninety-three years of age and who was not only a wit but also a profound natural scientist, famous too for his epigrams, of which a collection could be made. He could not pay a compliment without enlivening it with wit. I told him that I had come from Italy expressly to visit him. He answered, pouncing upon the meaning of the word "express":

"Confess that you have kept me waiting a long time."

A courteous and at the same time a critical answer, for it shows the mendaciousness of my compliment. He presented me with his works.[18] He asked me if I liked French theatrical performances, and I answered that I had seen Thétis et Pélée at the Opéra; it was by him, but when I praised it to him he said it was a tête pelée.[19]

"Friday at the Théâtre Français,"[20] I said, "I saw Athalie."[21]

"It is Racine's masterpiece, Monsieur, and Voltaire was wrong when he accused me of criticizing him by attributing to me an epigram of which no one has ever discovered the author and the last two lines of which are very bad:



Garden of the Palais-Royal, Paris

Pour avoir fait pis qu'Esther[22]
Comment diable as-tu pu faire?"

("How the devil did you manage to compose something worse than Esther?")[23]

I was told that Monsieur de Fontenelle had been the lover of Madame de Tencin[24] and that Monsieur d'Alembert[25] had been the fruit of their intimacy. Le Rond was the name of his foster father. I met D'Alembert at Madame de Graffigny's.[26] That great philosopher had in the highest degree the talent of never seeming learned when he was in an agreeable company of people who were not scientists. He also had the art of imparting intelligence to those who argued with him.

The second time I returned to Paris, on my flight from the Leads,[27] I looked forward to seeing Fontenelle again, and he died two weeks after I arrived, at the beginning of the year 1757.

The third time[28] I returned to Paris, intending to stay there until my death, I counted on the friendship of Monsieur d'Alembert, and he died just two weeks after the day I arrived, toward the end of the year 1783. I shall not see Paris again, nor France; I am too much afraid of the executions of an unbridled people.

Count Loss,[29] Ambassador of the King of Poland and Elector of Saxony[30] in Paris, ordered me in this year 1751 to translate into Italian a French opera which would allow for great transformation scenes and for great ballets connected with the subject of the opera, and I chose Zoroastre[31] by Monsieur de Cahusac. I had to fit the Italian words to the French music of the choruses. The music remains beautiful, but the Italian poetry did not come off well. Nevertheless I received from the generous monarch a handsome gold snuffbox, and greatly pleased my mother.[32]

At this same time Mademoiselle Vesian[33] came to Paris with her brother, in the first flush of her youth, well born, well brought up, very pretty, completely unspoiled, and as charming as possible. Her father, who had served in the army in France, had died in Parma, his native country; left an orphan, and having nothing to live on, his daughter followed the advice someone gave her to sell everything and make her way as best she could to Versailles with her brother to move the Minister of War[34] to pity and obtain something. Leaving the diligence, she told a coachman to take her to a furnished room near the Théâtre Italien, and the coachman took her to the Hôtel de Bourgogne[35] in the Rue Mauconseil, where I was lodging.

I was told the next morning that the room on the rear of my floor was occupied by two young Italians, a brother and sister who had just arrived, both very handsome but having with them only what could be contained in a small traveling bag. Italians, just arrived, good-looking, poor, and my neighbors were five reasons for my going in person to see what it was all about. I knock, I knock again, and a youth in his shirt comes and opens the door, begging my pardon for being in his shirt.

"It is I who must ask your pardon. I come as an Italian and your neighbor to offer you my services."

I see a mattress on the floor, on which, as the brother of the pair, the youth had slept, and I see a bed hidden by curtains in which I suppose the sister must be, and I say to her without seeing her that if I had thought she would still be in bed at nine o'clock in the morning I would not have made bold to knock at her door. She answers, without appearing, that she had slept longer than usual because she had gone to bed exhausted by the journey and that she would get up if I would be so kind as to give her time.

"I will go to my room, Mademoiselle, and you will be so good as to have me called as soon as you consider yourself fit to be seen. I am your neighbor."

A quarter of an hour later, instead of sending for me she arrives herself and making me a pretty curtsy says that she has come to return my visit and that her brother will come as soon as he is ready. I thank her, I ask her to be seated, I at once inform her candidly of the interest she inspires in me, she is delighted, and she does not wait for many questions to tell me the whole short and simple story which I have just described; she ends it by saying that she must try that day to find a cheaper lodging, for she has only six francs left and nothing to sell. She had to pay a month in advance for the room she was occupying. I ask her if she has any letters of recommendation, and she draws from her pocket a parcel of papers in which I soon see seven or eight testimonials to her father's services, baptismal certificates for him, herself, and her brother, death certificates, testimonials to good conduct and poverty, and passports. That is all.

"I will wait, with my brother," she says, "on the Minister of War, and I hope that he will take pity on us."

"You know no one?"

"No one. You are the first person in France to whom I have told my story."

"We are fellow countrymen. You are commended to me by your situation and your face, and I will be your adviser, if you are willing. Give me your papers and let me make inquiries. Tell no one that you are in want, do not leave this house, and here are two louis which I lend you."

She accepts them, overcome with gratitude.

Mademoiselle Vesian was a brunette sixteen years of age with every attraction, though not a perfect beauty. Speaking French well, she told me her pitiful situation without groveling and without the timidity which seems to come from fear that the listener is disposed to take advantage of the distress which is being confided to him.

She seemed neither humiliated nor bold; she was not without hope, and she did not boast of her courage; with a noble bearing, and with no sign that she was trying to make a parade of virtue, she yet had something which discouraged the libertine; and the proof is that though her eyes, her fine figure, her white, fresh complexion, her dishabille all tempted me, from the very first moment she summoned up my better feelings and not only did I make no attempt on her but I promised myself that I would not be the first to set her on the wrong road. I put off until another time a speech by which I should learn her attitude in that respect and which would perhaps make me adopt a different course of conduct; but on this first occasion I told her only that she had come to a city in which her destiny was bound to declare itself and in which all the qualities she possessed, and which appeared to be gifts of nature to help her make her fortune, might be the causes of her irreparable ruin.

"You have," I said, "come to a city in which rich men scorn all light women except those who have sacrificed their virtue to them. If you have virtue and are resolved to keep it, prepare to suffer poverty, and if you feel that you have a mind above prejudice and ready to consent to anything to secure you a comfortable position, at least try not to let yourself be deceived. Put no trust in the gilded words which a man full of ardor will address to you to obtain your favors; believe him when deeds will have preceded words, for after enjoyment the fire goes out, and you will find that you are betrayed. Beware, too, of assuming disinterested feelings in those whom you see overwhelmed by your charms: they will give you false coin in abundance to persuade you to give them good. Do not be compliant. For my part, I am sure that I will do you no harm, and I hope I shall do you good; and to reassure you, I will treat you like my sister, for I am still too young to treat you as a father:

I would not be talking to you in this way if I did not find you charming."

Her brother then entered, and I saw a handsome youth of eighteen years, very well built, but entirely lacking in style, speaking very little, and with a countenance that promised nothing. We breakfasted, and when I tried to learn from him what course he wished to take, he answered that he was ready to do anything to earn an honest living.

"Have you any particular talent?"

"I write fairly well."

"That is something. If you go out, beware of everyone; you must not go to a coffeehouse, and you must speak to no one in the street. Eat in your room with your sister, and arrange at once to have a small room for yourself on the fourth floor. Write something in French today to give to me tomorrow morning, and hope. As for you, Mademoiselle, here are books, choose among them. I have your papers, I shall have something to tell you tomorrow, for I come home very late."

She chose some books and took her leave in the most well-bred manner, after saying that she had complete confidence in me.

Very much inclined to be of use to the girl, I talked of her situation wherever I went all that day, and everywhere I heard both men and women say that if she was pretty some good fortune could not fail to befall her, and that in the meanwhile she should take what steps she could; as for the brother, I was told that if he could write a place would be found for him in some office. I considered finding a woman of station in a position to recommend her to Monsieur d'Argenson and to introduce her to him. It was the best course; I felt that I could support her meanwhile, and I asked Silvia to mention the matter to Madame de Monconseil,[36] who had great influence with the Minister of War. She promised me she would do so, and she asked to see the young lady first.

I got home at eleven o'clock, and seeing a light in Mademoiselle Vesian's room I knocked and she opened the door, saying that she had not gone to bed in the hope of seeing me. I told her all that I had done for her, and I found her ready for anything and overwhelmed with gratitude. She talked of her situation with an air of noble indifference which was maintained only to restrain tears which she would not allow to flow; but I saw her eyes, which the gathering tears made brighter, the sight wrung a sigh from me, and I felt ashamed. Our talk continued for two hours. In the course of the conversation I managed decorously to bring it out that she had never loved and so was worthy of a lover who would recompense her properly if she sacrificed her virtue to him. It was absurd to suppose that the recompense should be marriage; the girl had never taken the false step, but she did not play the prude by telling me that she would not have taken it for all the money in the world; her one hope was that she would not give herself inconsiderately or for very little.

I sighed as I heard her speaking so sensibly and with a sincerity beyond her years, and I burned. I remembered poor Lucia at Pasiano, my remorse, and the wrong I had done in acting toward her as I had acted, and I saw myself now sitting beside a lamb who was bound to be the prey of some hungry wolf and who had not been brought up to end so and whose education had given her sentiments which deserved to be fostered by virtue and honor. I sighed because I was in a position neither to provide her with a competence by taking her illegitimately, nor to be her safeguard. I even saw that by becoming her protector[37] I should have done her more harm than good and that instead of helping her to a respectable competence I should perhaps have contributed to her ruin. There she was, sitting beside me; and there was I, talking sentiment to her and never love, kissing her hand too often and even her arm, and never proceeding to a decision or a beginning which would too quickly have reached its end and which would then have obliged me to keep her; after that, there would be no good for which she could hope or any way for me to get rid of her. I have loved women even to madness, but I have always preferred my freedom to them. When I have been in danger of sacrificing it, only chance has saved me.

It was three hours after midnight when I took leave of Mademoiselle Vesian, who, since she could not suppose that my restraint was the result of my virtue, must have attributed it either to shame or to impotence or to some secret malady; but not to a lack of inclination, for my amorous fire had sufficiently shown itself in my eyes and in the absurd avidity with which I kissed her hands and her arms. Such was I forced to be with that charming girl, only to repent of it afterward. As I wished her a happy slumber, I said that we would dine together the next day.

We dined in high spirits, and her brother went for a walk after dinner. The windows of my room, from which we saw the whole of the Rue Française, also permitted us to see all the carriages which were arriving at the entrance to the Théâtre Italien, where there was a great crowd that day. I ask my fellow countrywoman if she would be pleased to let me take her to the play; she begs me to do so; I find her a place in the amphitheater and I leave her there, saying that we would meet again at the house at eleven o'clock. I did not want to stay with her, in order to avoid all the questions I should be asked, for the more simply she was dressed the more interest she aroused.

After supping at Silvia's I go home, and at the door I see a most elegant carriage; I am told that it belongs to a young nobleman who had supped with Mademoiselle

Vesian and who was still there. So she was launched. What do I care? I go to bed.

I get up the next morning, I see a hackney coach stop at the door, a young man in morning dress gets out, comes upstairs, and I hear him enter my neighbor's room. It is nothing to me. I dress to leave, and in comes Vesian to tell me that he is not going to his sister's room because the same nobleman who had taken them to supper was with her.

"That is to be expected."

"He is rich, and extremely well-mannered. He wants to take us to Versailles himself, and to get me a position at once."

"Who is he?"

"I have no idea."

I put her papers in an envelope, which I seal, and give it to him to deliver to his sister, and I go out. I come back at three o'clock, and the hostess hands me a note which the young lady, who had gone, had told her to give me. I go to my room, I open the note, and I find two louis and these words: "I return the money you lent me, and I thank you. The Count of Narbonne[38] is concerned for me and certainly wishes only to help me, as he does my brother, and I will write you everything from the house in which he wishes me to live and where he will see that I want for nothing; but I have the highest regard for your friendship and I beg you to continue it toward me. My brother remains in the small room on the fourth floor, and my room is mine for the whole month, for I have paid for everything."

Her leaving her brother tells the story. She moved very fast. I decide to have nothing more to do with it, and I repent of having left her untouched for the young Count, who will make God knows what of her. I dress to go to the Français and to find out what I could about Narbonne, for, though I was angry, I felt some interest in learning the whole story. At the Comédie Française the first comer tells me that Narbonne is the son of a rich father on whom he is dependent, that he is riddled with debt, and that he frequents all the light women in Paris.

I went to two or three theaters every day, more to see Narbonne, whom I was curious to know, than for the sake of La Vesian, whom I thought I despised, and a week having gone by without my having managed to learn anything or even to see the young nobleman, I was beginning to forget the incident when Vesian came to my room at eight in the morning to tell me that his sister was in hers and that she wished to speak with me. I go without losing a moment, and I find her very sad and with her eyes swollen. She told her brother to go out for a walk, and she spoke to me as follows:

"Monsieur de Narbonne, whom I believed to be upright because I needed him to be so, sat down beside me where you left me, told me that my face interested him, and asked who I was. I told him all that I told you. You promised me that you would think about my situation; but Narbonne said there was no need to think and that he would see to everything immediately. I believed him; I was his dupe; he deceived me; he is a scoundrel."

As she could no longer hold back her tears I went to the window to give her time to shed them unobserved, and a few minutes later I returned to her side.

"Tell me everything, my dear Vesian, and unburden yourself freely. Do not think that you are guilty toward me, for when all is said and done I am the cause of your misfortune. You would not feel the grief which is rending your soul if I had not been so thoughtless as to take you to the theater."

"Alas, Monsieur, do not say that; am I to hold it against you that you believed me virtuous? To be brief: He promised to do everything for me on condition that I give him a proof of the confidence which he deserved that I should place in him; the proof was that I should go to lodge with a woman of station in a small house which he rented, and above all without my brother, for spite could think him my lover. Alas for me! Could I go there without asking your advice? He told me—and he lied to me—that the respectable woman to whose house he was taking me would herself escort me to Versailles, where he would arrange for my brother to be, so that we could be presented to the Minister together. After supper he left, saying that he would come for me the next morning in a hackney coach, and he gave me two louis and a gold watch, which I thought I could accept without putting myself under any obligation to a rich nobleman who said that he wished to do me good without any other design.

"When we reached his small house he introduced me to a woman whose appearance did not seem to me respectable, and he kept me there all this week, coming, going, leaving, returning, but never reaching a decision; when at last today, at seven o'clock in the morning, the woman told me that for family reasons the Count had been obliged to go to the country and that there was a hackney coach at the door to take me to the Hôtel de Bourgogne, from which he had brought me and where he would come to see me on his return. She told me, pretending regret, that I must leave the gold watch he had given me with her, for she had to return it to the watchmaker, whom the Count had forgotten to pay for it. I handed it to her instantly, answering not a word; I wrapped what I had brought with me in a kerchief, and returned here half an hour ago."

A minute later I asked her if she hoped to see him again on his return from the country.

"See him again! Speak to him again! Not I!"

I quickly went back to the window to give her tears scope again, for she was choking. Never did an unhappy girl in a lamentable situation so touch me. Pity took the place of the love she had inspired in me a week earlier, and though she did not accuse me of it I recognized that I was the chief cause of her misfortune; hence I felt obliged to show her the same friendship. Narbonne's infamous proceedings so disgusted me that if I had known where to find him alone there is no doubt that, without saying anything to La Vesian, I would have gone and attacked him.

I took care not to ask her for the detailed story of the week she had spent in the small house. It was a story which I knew by heart without needing to reduce her to humiliation by indirectly forcing her to tell it to me. In the return of the watch I saw the infamy, the low deceit, the miserliness, the shame of the base Narbonne. She left me at the window for more than a quarter of an hour; I returned to her when she called me, and I found her less sad. In great sorrow the relief of tears is an infallible remedy. She begged me to have the heart of a father toward her, assuring me that she would not again be unworthy of it, and to tell her what she should do.

"As things now stand," I said, "you must not only forget Narbonne's crime, you must also forget the error you made in enabling him to commit it. What is done is done, my dear Vesian; you must love yourself again and recover the expression which lightened your beautiful face a week ago. Honesty, frankness, good faith were visible in it then, and the noble self-assurance which arouses sympathy in those who appreciate its charms. All this must appear in your face again, for only this commands the interest of decent people, and you need their interest now more than ever. As for me, my friendship can do little, but I promise you the full extent of it when I tell you that you have a claim upon it which you did not have a week ago. I promise you that I will never leave you until you are certain of a secure future. At this moment I do not know what more to say; but be sure that I will take thought for you."

"Ah, my dear friend, if you promise me that, I ask no more. Alas, there is no one who takes thought for me!"

The reflection affected her so much that I saw her chin tremble and the onslaught of anxiety which made her faint away. I took care of her without summoning anyone, until I saw her restored and calm. I told her true or improvised stories about the snares set by those whose only occupation in Paris was to deceive girls; I told her amusing stories to cheer her, and I ended by saying that she ought to thank Heaven for what had happened to her with Narbonne, for she needed the misfortune to teach her once and for all to be more circumspect in future.

Throughout this conversation, by which I instilled true balm into her soul, I had no difficulty in abstaining from taking her hand and showing her signs of love, for to tell the truth the only feeling which animated me was pity. It was with genuine pleasure that, at the end of two hours, I saw her convinced and with courage enough to bear her misfortune like a heroine. She suddenly rises; she looks at me with an expression between confidence and doubt, and she asks me if I have any pressing business to attend to that day; I answer no.

"Then," she says, "take me somewhere outside of Paris, where breathing the country air will give me back the appearance which you consider I must have in order to enlist the interest of those who see me. If I can manage to sleep peacefully this coming night, I feel that I can be happy again."

"I thank you for your confidence in me; I will dress, and we will go somewhere; in the meanwhile your brother will come back."

"What does my brother have to do with it?"

"Remember, my dear friend, that you must make Narbonne ashamed and miserable all his life by your conduct. Consider that if he ever learns that on the very day on which he sent you away you went to the country alone with me, he will exult and say that he treated you as you deserved. But accompanied by your brother, and going with me your fellow countryman, you will give malice no ground and slander no occasion."

The docile child blushes and agrees to wait for her brother; he came back a quarter of an hour later, and I at once sent for a hackney coach. Just as we were getting into it Balletti turns up to call on me. After introducing him to the young lady I invite him to join the party; he accepts, and we go to Le Gros Caillou[39] to eat eel stew, boiled beef, an omelet, and boned and broiled pigeons; the gaiety which I managed to inspire in the young lady made up for the rather helter-skelter dinner.

After dinner Vesian went for a walk by himself, and his sister remained alone with us. I saw with pleasure that Balletti thought her agreeable, and without consulting her I determine to persuade my friend to teach her to dance. I inform him of her situation, of her reason for leaving Italy, the slight hope she had of obtaining a pension at court, and of her need for some employment suitable to her sex and by which she could live decently. Balletti reflects and says that he is ready to do anything, and after carefully considering the young lady's figure and frame of mind, he assures her that he will find a way to induce Lany[40] to take her for the ballets at the Opéra.

"Then," said I, "you must begin giving her lessons tomorrow. Mademoiselle is staying in the room next to mine."

The extemporized plan thus quickly decided upon, La Vesian burst out laughing at the idea of becoming a dancer, a thing which had never entered her head.

"But can one learn to dance so quickly? I can only dance the minuet, and I have a good ear for quadrilles; but I don't know a single step."

"The ballet girls at the Opéra," Balletti answers, "know no more than you do."

"And how much shall I ask from Monsieur Lany, for I do not think I can expect much?"

"Nothing. For ballet girls are not paid at the Opéra."

"Then what will I live on?"

"Don't worry about that. Such as you are, you will immediately find ten rich noblemen who will offer you their homage. Your part will be to choose wisely. We shall see you covered with diamonds."

"Now I understand. One of them will take me and keep me as his mistress."

"Exactly. It's much better than a pension of four hundred francs, which you will perhaps only obtain after a great deal of effort."

In her astonishment she looked at me to find out if all this was serious; and Balletti having gone off, I assured her that it was the best course she could take unless she preferred the dreary position of chambermaid to some great lady whom we might find for her. She answered that she would not be a chambermaid to the Queen herself.

"And a ballet girl at the Opéra?"

"Better that."

"You are laughing?"

"It's enough to make anyone die laughing. Mistress of a great nobleman, who will cover me with diamonds! I will choose the oldest."

"Right you are, my dear friend; but take care you do not cuckold him."

"I promise you I will be true to him. He will find a post for my brother."

"Of course."

"But until I get into the Opéra and my old lover appears, who will give me enough to live on?"

"I, Balletti, and all my friends—and all of us for no other reward than to see your beautiful face, to be sure that you are behaving as you should, and that we are contributing to your happiness. Are you convinced?"

"Completely convinced; I will do nothing but what you tell me to do. Only be always my friend."

We returned to Paris at nightfall. I left La Vesian at the Hôtel de Bourgogne and went off to sup with my friend, who at table made his mother promise to speak to Lany. Silvia said it was better than begging a wretched pension from the War Ministry. The talk then turned to a plan which was being considered by the management of the Opéra and which consisted in putting up for sale all the appointments for ballet girls and chorus girls; the intention, in fact, was to set a high price on them, for the more expensive they were the more the girls who bought them would be esteemed. This project, which was part of the general dissoluteness of the times, nevertheless had an appearance of wisdom. It would in a way have ennobled a breed of women who continue to be contemptible.

In those days at the Opéra I noticed a number of girls, both dancers and singers, who were ugly and untalented, yet all of whom were living comfortably; for it is inevitable that a girl who is there must, by her position, renounce what the lower classes call "virtue," for if one of them tried to live virtuously she would die of starvation. But if a new girl is clever enough to remain virtuous for a month her fortune is made, for then the noblemen who try to conquer such an exemplary virtue are among the most eminent. A great nobleman is delighted if the audience names him when the girl appears. He even forgives her some infidelities provided she does not throw away what he gives her and that she does not cuckold him too brazenly; the nobleman who keeps her seldom objects to her fancy man, and in any case he never goes to sup with his mistress without letting her know in advance. What chiefly makes French noblemen eager to have a girl at the Opéra to their credit is the fact that all the girls there belong to the King as members of his Royal Academy of Music.

I came home at eleven o'clock, and seeing Vesian's door ajar I went in. She was in bed.

"I'll get up, for I want to talk with you."

"Stay in bed, and you can talk with me just as well. I find you more beautiful."

"Then I am glad."

"What do you want to say to me?"

"Nothing—just to talk about the profession I am entering. I am about to practice virtue in order to find a man who loves it only to destroy it."

"That is it exactly; and believe me, everything in this life is much the same. We refer everything to ourselves, and each of us is a tyrant. That is why the best of mortals is he who is tolerant. I am happy to see you becoming a philosopher."

"How does one do that?"

"By thinking."

"How long?"

"All one's life."

"Then it's never over?"

"Never; but one learns what one can and gains all the share of happiness of which one is capable."

"And this happiness—in what effect is it felt?"

"It is felt in all the pleasures which the philosopher can procure for himself, and when he considers that he has procured them by his own efforts and by overriding all prejudices."

"What is pleasure, and what is prejudice?"

"Pleasure is immediate sensual enjoyment; it is a complete satisfaction which we grant to our senses in all that they desire; and when, exhausted or wearied, our senses want rest, whether to catch breath or to revive, pleasure becomes imagination; imagination takes pleasure in reflecting on the happiness which its tranquillity procures it. The philosopher is he who refuses no pleasure which does not produce greater pains and who knows how to create pleasures.''

''And you say this depends on overriding prejudices. What is prejudice, and how can we override it and where can we find the strength to do so?''

''There is no greater question in moral philosophy, my dear friend, than the one which you ask me; hence it is a study which lasts all our lifetime. But I will tell you briefly that prejudice means every so-called duty for which we find no reason in nature.''

''Then the principal occupation of the philosopher must be to study nature?''

''It is the only thing he must do. The wisest man is he who is least mistaken.''

''Who, according to you, is the philosopher who has been least often mistaken?''

''Socrates.''

''But he was sometimes mistaken.''

''Yes, in metaphysics.''

''Oh, that's no matter. I think he could get on without that.''

''You are wrong; for ethics itself is the metaphysics of natural science, since everything is nature. For which reason I allow you to call any man a fool who comes and tells you that he has made a new discovery in metaphysics. But now I must be becoming obscure to you. Think, be guided by maxims which follow from sound reasoning, always have your happiness in view, you will be happy.''

''I like the lesson you have given me much better than the dancing lesson Balletti is to give me tomorrow, for I foresee that I will be bored, and I am not bored in your company now."

"What tells you that you are not bored?"

"The desire I feel that you should not leave me."

"May I perish, my dear Vesian, if a philosopher ever defined boredom better than you have done. What a pleasure! How is it that I want to prove it to you by kissing you?"

"It is because our souls cannot be happy except when they are in harmony with our senses."

"What do I hear, divine Vesian? Your mind is giving birth."

"It is you, my divine friend, who are the midwife, and I am grateful to you for it, and so much so that I feel the same desire that you do."

"Then let us satisfy our desire, my dear, and embrace each other without restraint."

In such considerations we spent the whole night, and what assured us at dawn that our joy had been perfect was that it never occurred to us that the door of the room was open—proof that we never thought we had any reason to go and shut it.

Balletti gave her a few lessons, she was accepted at the Opéra, and she appeared there only two or three months, always governing herself by the precepts which I had inculcated in her and which her intelligence made her realize were golden. She refused all who came to conquer her, because they all in some way resembled Narbonne. The one she chose was a nobleman different from all the rest because he did for her what none of them would ever have done. He made her give up the stage at once. He took a small box for her, which she occupied every day there was a performance at the Opéra and in which she received her patron and all his friends. He was the Count de Tressan, if I am not mistaken, or de Trean,[41] for the name wavers in my memory. She remained with him until his death, always happy and making him happy. She still lives in Paris, dependent upon no one, for her lover settled an income on her. No one talks of her now, for in Paris a woman of fifty-six is as if she no longer existed. After she left the Hôtel de Bourgogne I did not speak to her again; when I saw her covered with diamonds, our souls greeted each other. Her brother was given a post, but the only profession he practiced was being married to La Piccinelli,[42] who may be dead by now.

CHAPTER XI

The beautiful O-Morphi. Imposture by a painter. I practice cabalism for the Duchess of Chartres. I leave Paris. My stay in Dresden and my departure from there.

AT THE Saint-Laurent fair my friend Patu took a notion to sup with a Flemish actress named Morphy[1] and invited me to join him; I accepted. La Morphy did not tempt me; but that did not matter—a friend's pleasure is motive enough. So he offered her two louis, which were at once accepted, and after the opera we went to the beauty's house in the Rue des Deux Portes Saint-Sauveur. After supper Patu wanted to sleep with her, and I asked for a couch for myself in some corner of the house. La Morphy's younger sister, a pretty, ragged, dirty little creature, said she would give me her bed but wanted a half écu;[2] I promised it to her. She takes me to a closet in which I see only a mattress on three or four boards.

"Do you call that a bed?"

"It's my bed."

"I don't want it, and you shan't have the half écu."

"Were you going to undress for bed?"

"Of course."

"What an idea! We haven't any bedclothes."

"Then you sleep with your clothes on?"

"Certainly not."

"Very well, go to bed yourself and you shall have the half écu. I want to see you."

"All right, but you mustn't do anything to me."

"Not a thing."

She undresses, lies down, and covers herself with an old curtain. She was thirteen years old. I look at the girl; I send every prejudice packing; I see her neither slovenly nor in rags, I find her a perfect beauty. I make to examine her completely, she refuses, she laughs, she resists; but a whole écu makes her as mild as a lamb, and since her only fault is being dirty I wash her all over with my own hands; my reader knows that admiration is inseparable from another kind of appreciation, and I find the little Morphy willing to let me do whatever I please, except what I did not want to do. She warns me that she will not permit that—for that, according to her elder sister, was worth twenty-five louis.[3] I tell her we will haggle about it some other time; and thereupon she gives me every indication of her future consent by consenting most freely to everything I could want.

The little Helen[4] whom I had enjoyed, though leaving her a virgin, gave her sister the six francs and told her what she hoped from me. She calls me aside before I leave and says that, since she needs money, she will come down a little. I answer that I will return and talk to her the next day. I wanted Patu to see the girl as I had seen her, to make him admit that it was impossible to see a more consummate beauty. Helen, white as a lily, had everything that nature and the art of the painter could combine in the way of perfect beauty. In addition she had a beauty of countenance which instilled the most delicious peace into the soul which beheld her. She was blonde. I went there that evening, and not having reached a suitable price, I gave her twelve francs in exchange for her sister's lending her her bed, and I finally came to an agreement to keep giving her twelve francs each time until I decided to pay the six hundred. The rate of interest was usurious, but La Morphy was a Greek[5] by nature, and she had no scruples in the matter. It is certain that I would never have brought myself to pay the twenty-five louis, for I should have thought that I was the loser by it. The elder Morphy thought me the greatest of dupes, since in two months I had spent three hundred francs for nothing. She attributed it to my stinginess. Stinginess indeed! I paid six louis to have her painted naked by a German painter,[6] who produced a living likeness. She was lying on her stomach, resting her arms and her bosom on a pillow and holding her head as if she were lying on her back. The skillful artist had drawn her legs and thighs in such a way that the eye could not wish to see more. I had him write under it O-Morphi.[7] The word is not Homeric, but it is Greek none the less. It means "beautiful."

But what are not the secret paths of all-powerful destiny! My friend Patu wanted a copy of the portrait. Can one refuse such a thing to a friend? The same painter made it, went to Versailles, and showed it, with several other portraits, to Monsieur de Saint-Quentin,[8] who showed them to the King, who became curious to know if the portrait of the "Greek Girl" was a true likeness. If it was, the monarch claimed the right to sentence the original to quench the fire which it had kindled in his heart.

Monsieur de Saint-Quentin asked the painter if he could bring the original of the "Greek Girl" to Versailles, and he answered that he thought it perfectly possible. He called on me to tell me of the proposal, and I thought it excellent. La Morphy jumped for joy when I told her that she was to go to court with her sister under conduct of the painter and there submit to the decrees of Providence. So one fine morning she cleaned up her little sister, dressed her decently, and went to Versailles with the painter, who told her to stroll in the park until he came back.

He came back with the Groom of the Bedchamber, who told him to go to the inn and wait for the two sisters, whom he took to a garden house and shut them in. I learned the next morning from La Morphy herself that a half hour later the King came, alone, asked her if she was Greek, drew the portrait from his pocket, looked carefully at her younger sister, and said:

"I have never seen a better likeness."

He sat down, took her on his knees, caressed her here and there, and, after his royal hand had assured him that she was a virgin, gave her a kiss. O-Morphi looked at him and laughed.

"What are you laughing at?"

"Because you are as like a six-franc piece[9] as two peas."

At this ingenuousness the monarch burst out laughing and asked her if she would like to stay at Versailles; she answered that he must arrange it with her sister, and her sister told the King that nothing could make her happier. The King then left, locking them in. A quarter of an hour later Saint-Quentin came and let them out, put the younger sister in an apartment on the ground floor in the custody of a woman, and went off with the elder sister to find the German, to whom he gave fifty louis for the portrait, but nothing to La Morphy. He only took her address, assuring her that she would hear from him. She received a thousand louis, which she showed me the next day. The honest German gave me twenty-five louis for my portrait and made me another, copying it from the one Patu had. He offered to paint for me, gratis, all the pretty girls whose portraits I might wish to have. What gave me the most pleasure was seeing the joy of the worthy Flemish girl, who, gazing at five hundred double louis,[10] thought she was rich, and who considered me the first cause of her good fortune.

"I didn't expect so much, for it's true that Helen is pretty but I didn't believe what she told me about you. Is it possible, my dear friend, that you left her a virgin? Tell me the truth."

"If she was, I can assure you that she did not cease to be by my doing."

"She certainly was, for you're the only one I gave her to. What a man of honor! She was destined for the King. Who would have thought it? God disposes. I admire your virtue. Come here and let me kiss you."

O-Morphi (for so the King always called her) pleased him even more by an ingenuousness of which the monarch had no notion than by her beauty, though it was as perfect as possible. He put her in an apartment in the Parc aux Cerfs,[11] where His Majesty kept nothing short of a seraglio and which no one was allowed to enter except ladies presented at court. At the end of a year[12] the girl bore a son, who became no one knows what, for Louis XV would never hear anything about his bastards as long as Queen Marie was alive.

O-Morphi fell into disgrace after three years. The King gave her four hundred thousand francs, which she brought as a dowry to a staff officer[13] in Brittany. I saw a son from this marriage at Fontainebleau in the year 1783. He was twenty-five years of age, and he did not know the story of his mother, whose living image he was. I asked him to give her my compliments and wrote my name on his tablets.[14]

The cause of the beauty's disgrace was the malice of Madame de Valentinois,[15] sister-in-law of the Prince of Monaco. During a visit to the Parc aux Cerfs, that lady, who is well known in Paris, told O-Morphi to make the King laugh by asking him how he treated his old wife.[16] O-Morphi, who was too simple-minded, asked the King the impertinent and insulting question, which so astonished the monarch that, rising and looking daggers at her,

"You miserable wretch," he said, "who got you to ask me that question?"

O-Morphi tremblingly told him the truth; the King turned his back on her and never saw her again. The Countess of Valentinois was not seen at court again until two years later. Louis XV, who knew that he failed his wife as a husband, wanted at least to make it up to her as King. Woe to anyone who dared fail in respect to her!

Despite all the wit of the French, Paris is and will always be the city in which impostors will succeed. When an imposture is discovered everyone shrugs and laughs, and the impostor laughs even more, for he has already become rich, recto stat fabula talo ("the play is a hit").[17] This characteristic which makes the nation fall into a trap so easily comes from the supreme influence which fashion exercises over it. The imposture is new; so it becomes fashionable. It is enough if the thing has the power to surprise by being out of the ordinary, and everyone welcomes it for everyone fears he will look foolish if he says "It is impossible." In France alone is it true that only natural philosophers know that between the possibility and the act there is infinity, whereas in Italy the meaning of the axiom is firmly fixed in everyone's mind. A painter had a great success for a time by announcing that he could paint a person's portrait without seeing him; all that he asked was full information from the person who ordered the portrait; he had to describe the countenance to him so precisely that the painter could not possibly go wrong. The result was that the portrait was even more to the informant's credit than to the painter's; it also followed that the informant had to say that the portrait was a perfect likeness, for if he said anything else the painter alleged the most legitimate excuse: he said that if the portrait was not a good likeness the fault lay with the person who had not been able to describe the subject's countenance to him. I was surprised at Silvia's when someone retailed this piece of news, but—be it noted—without ridiculing it or casting doubt on the skill of the painter, who, so he had heard, had already painted over a hundred portraits, all excellent likenesses. Everyone said it was brilliant. I alone, choking with laughter, said it was an imposture. The man who had told the story took offense and offered to wager me a hundred louis; but I laughed again, because it was a question on which one could not wager without running the risk of being duped.

"But the portraits are likenesses."

"I do not believe it; and if they are likenesses there is trickery."

Only Silvia, who was of my opinion, accepts his proposal to go and dine at the painter's with him and myself. We go, and we see a quantity of portraits, all said to be likenesses; but since we did not know the originals it meant nothing.

"Could you paint my daughter's portrait for me, Monsieur," Silvia asked him, "without seeing her?"

"Yes, Madame, if you are sure you can describe her countenance to me."

We exchanged a look, and that was the end of it. Politeness forbade us to say more. The painter, whose name was Sanson,[18] gave us a good dinner, and his niece, who was intelligent, pleased me extremely. As I was in a good humor I held her attention by making her laugh a great deal. The painter told us that his favorite meal was supper and that he would be honored if we would often give him the pleasure of our company at it. He showed us more than fifty letters from Bordeaux, Toulouse, Lyons, Rouen, Marseilles, the writers of which ordered portraits from him, giving him descriptions of the faces they wanted him to paint; I read three or four of them with the greatest pleasure. He was paid in advance.

Two or three days later at the fair I saw his pretty niece, who reproached me for not coming to supper at her uncle's. The niece was very attractive and, flattered by her reproach, I went there the next day, and in a week or so the business became serious. I fell in love with her, and the niece, who was intelligent and was not in love, granted me nothing. Nevertheless I hoped, and I saw that I was snared.

I was drinking coffee alone in my room and thinking of her when I am visited by a young man whom I cannot place. He tells me he has had the honor to sup with me at the house of the painter Sanson.

"Ah yes, excuse me, Monsieur, I did not place you."

"That is only natural; at table you had eyes for no one but Mademoiselle Sanson."

"That may well be, for you must admit she is charming."

"It is not hard for me to admit it since, unfortunately, I know it only too well."

"Then you are in love with her."

"Alas, yes."

"Then win her love."

"That is what I have been trying to do for a year, and I was beginning to hope when you appeared and reduced me to despair."

"Who, Monsieur, I?"

"Yes, you."

"I am very sorry; but at the same time I fail to see what I can do about it."

"Yet it would not be very difficult, and if you will permit me I will myself suggest what you could do to oblige me."

"Please tell me."

"You could never set foot in her house again."

"I agree that it is the only thing I could do if I wanted very much to oblige you; but do you think that, if I did it, she would love you?"

"Oh, that is up to me. Meanwhile, do not go there again, and I will see to the rest."

"I admit that I may do you this extraordinary favor, but permit me to say that I think it strange you should have counted on it."

"Yes, Monsieur, after giving it much thought I saw that you were a man of great intelligence. I therefore made bold to conclude that you would be able to put yourself completely in my place, that you would consider the matter rationally, and that you would not wish to fight to the death with me for a young lady whom you, I imagine, do not wish to marry, whereas in my love my only object is that bond."

"And if I, too, were thinking of asking for her hand?"

"Then we should both deserve to be pitied, and I more than you, for as long as I am alive Mademoiselle Sanson will never be the wife of another."

This well-built young man, pale, serious, cold as ice, and in love, standing there in my own room deliberately saying such things to me with amazing calm, gave me occasion to think. I walked up and down for a good quarter of an hour to weigh the two courses of action dispassionately and see which of them would prove me the more courageous and the more worthy of my own esteem. I saw that the one which would best prove me the more courageous was the one which would prove to my rival that I was wiser than he.

"What will you think of me, Monsieur," I asked him firmly, "if I never set foot in Mademoiselle Sanson's house again?"

"That you pity an unhappy wretch who will always be ready to shed all his blood to show you his gratitude."

"Who are you?"

"I am Garnier,[19] only son of Garnier the wine merchant in the Rue de Seine."

"Very well, Monsieur Garnier, I will cease to visit Mademoiselle Sanson. Be my friend."

"Until death. Good-by, Monsieur."

A moment after he was gone, in comes Patu, to whom I tell the story and who declares me a hero; he embraces me, he thinks, and he says that he would have done the same in my place, but not in Garnier's place.

The Count of Melfort, then Colonel of the Orléans regiment, asked me through Camilla, sister of Corallina (the latter I no longer saw), to answer two questions by means of my cabala. I make up two answers which are very obscure but full of meanings, I seal them and give them to Camilla, who the next day asks me to go with her to a place which she will not name. She takes me to the Palais-Royal and we go up a narrow staircase to the apartment of the Duchess of Chartres,[20] who comes in a quarter of an hour later, showers the little beauty with caresses, and thanks her for having brought me to her. After a short preamble, all dignity and graciousness but without ceremony, she begins telling me all the difficulties she had found in the two answers I had given and which she had in her hand. After showing some surprise that the questions had been Her Highness's, I tell her that I know how to operate the cabala but that I am no good at interpreting it, so she must go to the trouble of asking further questions likely to produce clearer answers. So she writes down everything she could not understand and everything she wanted to know; I tell her that she must separate the questions, since one could not ask the oracle two things; she tells me to prepare the questions myself; I answer that she must write the whole with her own hand and imagine that she is interrogating an intelligence which knew all her secrets. She writes down everything she wanted to know in seven or eight questions; she reads them over to herself, and says with great dignity that she wishes to be sure that no one except myself will ever see what she has just written. I promise it on my word of honor; I read, and I see not only that she was right but that by putting them in my pocket to return them to her the next day with the answers I was in danger of compromising myself.

"I need only three hours, Madame, to do all this, and I want Your Highness to feel no anxiety. If Your Highness has anything to do, Your Highness can go and leave me here, provided that no one interrupts me. When I have finished I will seal everything; I need only know to whom I am to deliver the packet."

"To me, or to Madame de Polignac,[21] if you know her."

"Yes, Madame, I know her."

With her own hands the Duchess gave me a tinderbox so that I could light a small candle when I needed to seal, and she left and Camilla with her. I remained there, locked in; and three hours later, just as I was finishing, Madame de Polignac entered and I handed her the package and left.

The Duchess of Chartres, daughter of the Prince of Conti, was twenty-six years of age. She had in abundance the kind of intelligence which makes every woman who possesses it adorable, she was extremely animated, without prejudices, gay, witty in conversation, loving pleasure and preferring it to the hope of a long life. "Short and sweet" was an expression which was forever on her lips. In addition she was kind, generous, patient, tolerant, and constant in all her affections. With all that, she was very pretty. She carried herself awkwardly, and she laughed at the dancing teacher Marcel when he tried to correct her. She danced with her head bent forward and her toes turned in; even so, she was charming. A prime defect, which troubled her greatly and marred her beauty, was pimples, which were believed to be due to her liver but which in fact came from an impurity of the blood which finally caused her death and against which she struggled to her last breath.

The questions she put to my oracle were directed to matters which concerned her heart, and among other things she wanted to know a remedy to rid her beautiful skin of the small pimples which distressed everyone who saw her. My oracles were obscure concerning everything whose particulars I did not know; but they were not obscure concerning her malady, and it was this which made my oracle precious and necessary to her.

The next day after dinner Camilla, as I expected, wrote me a letter in which she asked me to drop everything and be at the Palais-Royal at five o'clock, in the room to which she had taken me. I went, and an old valet, who was waiting for me, set off at once and five minutes later I saw the charming Princess.

After complimenting me briefly but most graciously, she took all my answers from her pocket and asked me if I was busy; I assured her that my only business was to serve her.

''Good! I will not go out either and we will work.''

She thereupon showed me all the new questions she had already prepared on all sorts of subjects and especially concerning the remedy to make her pimples disappear. What had given her confidence in my oracle was something it had told her which no one could know. I guessed, and my guess was right; if I had not, it would have made no difference. I had had the same malady, and I was physician enough to know that a forced cure of a cutaneous disease by local remedies could kill the Princess. I had already answered that she could not be cured of the marks of the malady on her face in less than a week, and that it would take at least a year of dieting to cure it radically, but that in a week she would appear to be cured. We now spent three hours finding out all that she must do. Fascinated by what my oracle knew, she submitted to everything, and a week later all her pimples disappeared. I purged her every day, I prescribed what she should eat, I forbade her any pomades, advising her instead only to wash before going to bed and in the morning with plantain water.[22] My modest oracle told the Princess to use the same wash wherever she wanted to produce the same result, and enchanted with the Intelligence's discretion, the Princess obeyed.

I purposely went to the Opéra on the day when the Princess appeared there with her complexion completely clear. After the performance she walked in the great promenade of her Palais-Royal, followed by all the principal ladies, and flattered by everyone; she saw me and honored me with a smile. I felt I was the happiest of men. Camilla, Monsieur de Melfort, and Madame de Polignac alone knew that I had the honor to be the Princess's oracle. But the day after she went to the Opéra, small pimples returned to mar her face, and I was summoned to appear at the Palais-Royal in the morning. The old valet, who did not recognize me, showed me into a delightful little room next to another in which there was a bathtub, and the Duchess came in looking rather sad, for she had pimples on her chin and her forehead. She was holding a question for the oracle, and since it was short I amused myself by making her obtain the answer herself, which surprised her when, translating the numbers into letters, she found that the angel reproached her with having broken the prescribed diet. She could not deny it. She had eaten ham and had drunk liqueurs. Just then one of her chambermaids came in and whispered something to her. She told her to wait outside for a moment.

"You will not take it amiss, Monsieur," she said, "to see someone here who is a friend of yours and discreet."

So saying, she puts all the papers which have nothing to do with her malady in her pocket and she calls. In comes a person whom I really took to be a stable boy. It was Monsieur de Melfort.

"Look," she said, "Monsieur Casanova has taught me to operate the cabala," and she showed him the answer she had obtained. The Count did not believe it.

"Then," she said to me, "we must convince him. What do you want me to ask?"

"Whatever Your Highness pleases."

She thinks, she takes an ivory box from her pocket, and she writes: "Tell me why this pomade no longer produces any effect on me."

She constructs the pyramid, the columns, and the keys as I had already taught her to do, and when she is ready to obtain the answer I show her how to make various additions and subtractions which appear to arise from the numbers but which are really arbitrary, then I tell her to translate the numbers into letters and I go out, alleging some necessity. I come back when I think the translation has been completed, and I see the Duchess beside herself with astonishment.

"Ah, Monsieur, what an answer!"

"It may be wrong; but that can happen."

"Not at all; it is divine. Here it is: 'It has no effect except on the skin of a woman who has not had children.' "

"I see nothing astonishing in the answer."

"Because you do not know that the pomade is the one prescribed for me by the Abbé de Brosses,[23] which cured me five years and ten months ago before I gave birth to the Duke of Montpensier.[24] I would give everything I possess in the world to learn to operate this cabala myself."

"What!" said the Count. "It is the same pomade the history of which I know?"

"The very same."

"It is astonishing."

"I should like to ask another question about a woman whom I do not wish to name."

"Just say 'the woman I have in mind.'"

She then asks what the woman's malady is, and I make her obtain the answer that she wants to deceive her husband. At that the Duchess cried out in amazement.

It was very late, and I left with Monsieur de Melfort, who had first spoken privately to Her Highness. He told me that what the cabala had answered about the pomade was astonishing; and here is the story.

"The Duchess," he said, "pretty as you see her, had her face so full of pimples that the Duke, in disgust, could not bring himself to sleep with her, hence she would never have borne a child. The Abbé de Brosses cured her with this pomade, and in all her beauty she went to the Comédie Française in the Queen's box. As chance would have it, the Duke of Chartres goes to the theater, not knowing that his wife was there, and takes a place in the King's box. He sees his wife in the opposite box, he thinks her pretty, he asks who she is, he is told that she is his wife, he does not believe it; he leaves his box, goes to see her, compliments her on her beauty, then goes back to his box. At half past eleven we were all at the Duchess's apartment; she was playing cards. Suddenly—and contrary to all precedent—a page informs the Duchess that the Duke her husband is entering her apartment, she rises to receive him, and the Duke tells her that he had thought her so beautiful at the theater that, on fire with love, he has come to ask her to allow him to get her with child. Hearing this, we all left immediately; it was in the summer of the year '46, and in the spring of '47 she gave birth to the Duke of Montpensier, who is five years old and in good health. But after her lying-in the pimples came back and the pomade had no more effect."

After relating this anecdote the Count took from his pocket an oval tortoise-shell box with a very good likeness of the Duchess and gave it to me as a present from her, saying that if I wanted to have it set in gold she sent me the gold as well, and he handed me a roll of a hundred louis. I accepted it, begging him to express all my gratitude to the Princess; but I did not have the portrait set in gold, for I was greatly in need of money at the time. When the Duchess summoned me to the Palais-Royal after that there was no further question of curing her pimples, for she would never follow a diet; instead she made me spend five hours or six hours now in one corner now in another, leaving me, coming back again, having dinner or supper served to me by the old valet, who never spoke a word to me. The cabalas concerned only private matters of her own or of other people in whom she was interested, and she hit upon truths which I did not know I knew. She wanted me to teach her to operate the cabala, but she never pressed me to do it; she only had Monsieur de Melfort tell me that she would obtain me a post which would give me an income of twenty-five thousand livres if I would teach her the calculations. Alas, it was impossible. I was madly in love with her, but I never let her see the least sign of my passion. I thought such a conquest beyond me. I feared I should be humiliated by too scornful a refusal, and perhaps I was a fool. All I know is that I have always regretted that I did not speak out. It is true that I enjoyed several privileges which she might not have allowed me to enjoy if she had known that I loved her. I was afraid that I should lose them if I declared myself. One day she wanted the oracle to tell her if it was possible to cure a cancer which Madame La Pouplinière[25] had on one breast. I took it into my head to answer that the lady did not have a cancer and was in excellent health.

"What!" she said, "everyone in Paris believes it, and she consults every doctor; nevertheless, I believe the cabala."

She sees Monsieur de Richelieu at court and she tells him she is sure that Madame La Pouplinière is shamming; the Marshal, who was in on the secret, told the Duchess she was wrong, and she offered to wager him a hundred thousand francs; when she told me this, I trembled.

"Did he accept your wager?"

"No. He seemed amazed, and you know that he ought to know."

Three or four days later she told me that Monsieur de Richelieu had admitted to her that the cancer was a ruse to excite pity in her husband, to whom she wanted to return, but that the Marshal had told her he would pay a thousand louis to find out how she had discovered it.

"If you want to earn them," she said, "I will tell him everything."

"No, no, Madame—I implore you."

I feared a snare. I knew the Marshal's character; and the story of the hole[26] in the fireplace wall by which that illustrious nobleman entered the lady's house was known all over Paris. Monsieur de La Pouplinière had himself made the thing common knowledge by refusing to see his wife, to whom he gave twelve thousand francs a year. The Duchess had composed some very pretty verses on the affair; but no one outside of her own circle had seen them except the King, who was very fond of her despite the fact that she occasionally treated him to cutting witticisms. One day she asked him if it was true that the King of Prussia was coming to Paris; and the King having replied that there was no truth in it, she retorted that she was sorry because she was dying to see a king.

My brother, who had already painted several pictures in Paris, decided to present one of them to Monsieur de Marigny. So one fine morning we went together to call on the nobleman, who lived in the Louvre,[27] where artists went to pay court to him. We were in the large room next to his apartment, and having been the first to arrive were waiting for him to come out. The picture was hanging there. It was a battle piece in the style of Bourguignon.[28]

In comes a man dressed in black, sees the picture, stops in front of it for a moment, and says, addressing no one:

"It is bad."

A moment later two more men come in, look at the picture, laugh, and say:

"It is by some student."

I glanced at my brother, who was sitting beside me, sweating profusely. In less than a quarter of an hour the hall is full of people, and the badness of the picture was the butt of all those who stood around it snickering and criticizing. My poor brother was almost expiring and kept thanking God that no one knew him.

As his state of mind provoked me to laughter, I got up and went into the next room. I told my brother, who followed me, that Monsieur de Marigny would come out presently and, by declaring his picture beautiful, would avenge him on all these people; but with great good sense he did not agree with me. We go downstairs as fast as possible, and get into our hackney coach, ordering our servant to go and fetch the picture. And so we went home, and my brother slashed his picture a good twenty times with his sword and instantly resolved to settle his affairs, leave Paris, and go elsewhere to study and master the art to which he had devoted himself. We decided to go to Dresden.

Two or three days before the end of my pleasant stay in the enchanting city of Paris, I dined alone at the Tuileries in the house of the Swiss at the Porte des Feuillants,[29] whose name was Condé. After dinner his wife, who was rather pretty, handed me a bill in which I found that everything was charged double; I tried to get it reduced, but she would not take off even a liard.[30] So I paid, and as the bill was receipted at the bottom by the words "femme Condé," I took the pen and added to the "Condé" a "Labre."[31] After which I left and walked toward the swing bridge.[32] When I had stopped thinking about the Swiss's wife who had overcharged me, I see a short man with his hat over one ear, an enormous bouquet in his buttonhole, and wearing a sword of which the hilt guard tierced two inches, who comes up to me with an insolent look and tells me in so many words that he has a mind to cut my throat.

"By jumping, since you are only a dwarf compared with me, who will cut off your ears."

"Hell and damnation, Monsieur!"

"That is enough from you. You have only to follow me."

I stride toward the Étoile,[33] where, seeing no one, I ask the insolent fellow what he wants with me and what reason he has to attack me.

"I am the Chevalier de Talvis.[34] You have insulted a respectable woman who is under my protection. Unsheathe."

So saying, he draws his sword. I instantly draw mine and, not waiting for him to guard his body, I wound him in the chest. He jumps back and says that I have wounded him treacherously.

"You lie; admit it, or I will cut your throat."

"You will do no such thing, for I am wounded; but I demand my revenge, and our meeting will be judged."

I left him there; but my thrust was legitimate, for he had his sword out before I did. If he did not guard his body, it was his own fault.

In the middle of August I set out with my brother from Paris, where I had stayed for two years and where I enjoyed all the pleasures of life without any drawbacks, except perhaps that I was often short of money. By way of Metz and Frankfurt we reached Dresden at the end of the month, and we saw our mother, who greeted us most affectionately in her delight at seeing the first two fruits of her marriage, whom she could not hope to see again. My brother devoted himself entirely to studying his art by copying the excellent battle pictures by the most famous painters in the celebrated gallery.[35] He spent four years there until he considered that he was ready to go back to Paris and face criticism. I will relate in due course how we returned there nearly at the same time; but before then my reader will see how I was treated by an alternately benignant and hostile Fortune.

The life I led at Dresden until the end of the Carnival in the following year, 1753, offers nothing out of the ordinary. The only thing I accomplished was to favor the actors with a tragicomedy in which I had two characters playing the role of Harlequin. My play was a parody of Racine's Frères ennemis.[36] The King laughed heartily at the comic incongruities with which my comedy was filled, and at the beginning of the Carnival I received a handsome present from the monarch, whose prodigality was seconded by a minister[37] whose equal in liberality Europe has nowhere seen. I said good-by to my mother, my brother, and my sister, who had married Peter August, the court harpsichordist, who died two years ago leaving his wife with a decent competence and his family happy.

I spent the first three months of my stay in Dresden making the acquaintance of all its mercenary beauties. I found them superior to those of Italy and France in physical endowments, but very inferior in grace, in wit, and in the art of pleasing, which chiefly consists in appearing to be in love with the man who has found them attractive and pays them. In consequence they have the reputation of being cold. What stopped me in this ruthless pursuit was a malady with which I was infected by a Hungarian girl in La Creps's[38] bevy. It was the seventh infection, and I got rid of it, as always, by dieting for six weeks. I have never done anything in my life except try to make myself ill when I had my health and try to make myself well when I had lost it. I have been equally and thoroughly successful in both, and today in that particular I enjoy perfect health, which I wish I could ruin again; but age prevents me. The malady which we call the "French disease" does not shorten life when one knows how to cure it; it merely leaves scars; but we are easily consoled for that when we consider that we gained them with pleasure, even as soldiers take pleasure in seeing the scars of their wounds, the proofs of their virtue and the wellsprings of their fame.

King Augustus, the Elector of Saxony, was fond of his Prime Minister Count Brühl because he spent proportionately more than his master and because he never let him think that anything was impossible. The King was an inveterate enemy of economy, laughing at those who robbed him and spending lavishly merely to find occasions for laughing. Not having wit enough to laugh at the political blunders of his fellow monarchs and the absurdities of people in general, he had in his service four buffoons, known in German as "fools,"[39] whose function was to rouse laughter by outright scurrility, low jests, and impertinence. These gentlemen often obtained considerable favors from their master for those whose interests they undertook to advance. Hence they were often honored and cultivated by decent people who needed their patronage. Where is the man whom necessity does not drive to baseness? Agamemnon in Homer tells Menelaus that necessity commands them to be base.

Both the common voice and history are wrong today when they say that Count Brühl was the cause of what was then called the "ruin of Saxony."[40] The man was no more than his master's faithful minister; and all his children, who inherited nothing of all the wealth he was supposed to have accumulated, sufficiently justify their father's memory.

In short, I saw at Dresden the most brilliant court in Europe, and the arts which flourished at it. I saw no amorous intriguing, for King Augustus was not inclined that way, nor is gallantry in the nature of the Saxons unless their sovereign sets them the example.

On arriving in Prague, where I did not intend to stay, I only sent over a letter from Amorevoli[41] to Locatelli,[42] the manager of the opera, and went to see La Morelli.[43] She was an old acquaintance, who took the place of everything else for me during the three days I spent in that vast city. But just as I was about to leave, I ran into my old friend Fabris[44] in the street; he was now a colonel and he insisted on my going to dine with him. I embrace him and explain to him that I must leave.

"You shall leave this evening with a friend of mine and overtake the diligence."

I did as he wished, and I was delighted. He was longing for war, which came two years later,[45] and he won great glory in it.

As for Locatelli, he was an original character and well worth knowing. He ate every day at a table laid for thirty; the guests were his actors and actresses, his dancers and danseuses, and his friends. He presided himself over the excellent fare which he served, for good eating was his passion. I shall have occasion to speak of him when I come to my journey to Petersburg, where I saw him again and where he died not long ago at the age of ninety.[46]

CHAPTER XII

My stay in Vienna. Joseph II. My departure for Venice.

SO HERE I am, in the capital of Austria for the first time, at the flourishing age of twenty-eight. I had a few possessions, but scarcely any money; so I had to go slowly until the return of a letter of exchange which I at once drew on Signor Bragadin. The only other letter I had was one from the poet Migliavacca,[1] of Dresden, introducing me to the celebrated Abate Metastasio,[2] whose acquaintance I was most eager to make. I presented it to him on the next day but one, and in an hour's conversation I found him even more learned than his works proclaim him to be and with a modesty which at first I could not believe was natural; but I very quickly perceived that it was real when it vanished as soon as he recited something of his own and himself pointed out its beauties. I talked to him of his teacher Gravina,[3] and he recited five or six stanzas which he had composed on his death and which were not printed, and I saw him shed tears, touched by the sweetness of his own poetry. After reciting them to me, he added these words:

"Ditemi il vero: si può dir meglio?" ("Tell me the truth: is it possible to write better?")

I answered that only he had the right to believe it impossible. I asked him if his beautiful lines cost him much effort, and he at once showed me four or five pages filled with erasures due to his trying to bring fourteen lines to perfection. He assured me that he had never been able to compose more lines than that in a day. He then substantiated a truth which I already knew, namely, that the lines which cost a poet the most labor are those which uninitiated readers think cost him none. I asked him which of his operas he liked the best, and he said it was his Attilio Regolo,[4] and he added:

"Ma questo non vuol già dire che sia il migliore." ("But that does not necessarily mean it is the best.")

I told him that all his works had been translated into French prose[5] at Paris, and that the publisher had gone bankrupt because it was impossible to read them, and that this showed the power of his beautiful poetry. He answered that some other fool had gone bankrupt in the previous century by translating Ariosto[6] into French prose, and he laughed heartily at those who maintained, and who maintain, that a work in prose has the right to be called a poem. On the subject of his ariettas, he said that he had never written one of them without setting it to music himself, but that he usually did not show his music to anyone; and he laughed heartily at the French for believing that it is possible to fit words to a tune composed beforehand. He made a very philosophical comparison:

"It is," he said, "as if you said to a sculptor: 'Here is a piece of marble, make me a Venus which will show her expression before you have carved her features.' "

At the Imperial Library[7] I found, to my great surprise, Monsieur de La Haye with two Poles and a young Venetian[8] whom his father had entrusted to him for a good education. I embraced him several times. I thought he was in Poland. He told me that he was in Vienna on business and that he would go back to Venice in the summer. We called on each other, and as soon as I told him I had no money he lent me fifty zecchini, for which I was grateful to him. The news he told me which gave me decided pleasure was that of his friend the Baron de Bavois, who was already a lieutenant-colonel in the Venetian service. He had had the good fortune to be chosen as adjutant-general by Signor Morosini, whom the Republic had appointed border commissioner[9] on his return from his embassy in France. I was delighted at the good fortune of those who could not but recognize me as first cause of it. I learned beyond doubt in Vienna that De La Haye had been a Jesuit; but no one was allowed to speak to him on the subject.

Not knowing where to go and wanting amusement, I went to the rehearsal at the opera,[10] which was to open after Easter, and I found Bodin, the premier danseur, who had married La Geoffroi. I had seen them both at Turin. I also found Campioni, the husband of the beautiful Ancilla, who told me that he had divorced her because she dishonored him. Campioni was a great dancer and a great gambler. I lodged with him.

Everything in Vienna was splendid, there was much money and much luxury; but there was great hardship for those who were votaries of Venus. Rascals turned spies, who were known as "Commissaries for Chastity,"[11] pitilessly persecuted all pretty girls; the Empress, who had all the virtues, had not the virtue of tolerance in the matter of illegitimate love between a man and a woman. That great and very religious sovereign hated mortal sin in general, and wishing to deserve well of God by extirpating it, she rightly thought that it must be persecuted in detail. So, taking into her royal hands the register of what are called mortal sins, she found that they numbered seven, and she thought she could hedge about six of them, but she considered lechery unforgivable, and it was against lechery that her zeal mustered all its forces and let loose.

"It is possible," she said, "not to recognize pride, for dignity bears its standard. Avarice is horrible, but one may be mistaken about it, for it may look like economy to him who loves money. As for anger, it is a disease which is murderous when the fit is on, but murderers are punished with death. Gluttony may be only love of choice food, which is considered a virtue in good society, and it is connected with appetite. So much the worse for those who die of indigestion! Envy is never admitted, and sloth is punished by boredom. But lust is what I cannot pardon. My subjects shall be free to find any woman beautiful in whom they see beauty, and women may do whatever they wish to the end of appearing so; let men and women desire one another as much as they please, I cannot prevent it; but I will never tolerate the base act which satisfies that desire and which is nevertheless inseparable from human nature and the cause of the reproduction of the species. Let people marry if they wish to have that pleasure, and let all those perish who wish to procure it for money, and let there be exile in Temesvar[12] for all the miserable women who live on what they suppose they can earn by their charms. I know that Rome is indulgent in the matter, to prevent, so they say, sodomy and incest and adultery; but my climate is different; my Germans don't have the devil in their bodies like the Italians, who have not, as we have here, the resource of the bottle; in addition, a watch will be kept for licentiousness of any consequence, and when I learn that a wife is unfaithful to her husband I will have her locked up too, despite the claim that her husband is her only master. This cannot be admitted in my dominions, for husbands here are too indolent. Fanatical husbands who claim that I dishonor them by punishing their wives may protest as much as they please. Are they not already dishonored?"

"But, Madame, dishonor can be only in the thing being known, and besides, you may be mistaken."

"Be still!"

From this ferocious principle, the product of the only fault which the great Maria Theresa had sub specie recti ("under the appearance of rectitude"),[13] arose all the injustices and all the violences committed by the murderous "Commissaries for Chastity." At every hour of the day any girl who was walking alone in the streets of Vienna, even to earn an honest living, was seized and haled off to prison. But how could it be known that these girls were going to some man's house for solace or were looking for some man to solace them? A spy followed them at a distance; the police had five hundred of them in their pay, and they were not in uniform. When the girl entered a house the spy who had seen her, having no way of knowing to what floor she had gone, waited downstairs for her and took her in charge to find out on whom she had called and what she had done there, and at the least obscurity in her answers, the villain haled her off to prison, beginning by taking whatever money or jewels she had, of which nothing more was ever heard. During a disturbance in the street at Leopoldstadt a girl who was running away, and whom I did not know, slipped a gold watch into my hands, foreseeing that it would become the booty of those who were going to take her to the Stockhaus.[14] A month later I returned it to her, after hearing her story and by what sacrifices she had delivered herself from her torments. In short, all girls who walked in the streets of Vienna were reduced to carrying rosaries. Then they could not be arrested out of hand, for they said they were going to church, and Maria Theresa would have had the Commissary hanged. Vienna was so encumbered with these blackguards that a man who needed to make water could hardly find a place where no one would see him. I was greatly surprised one day when I was interrupted by a fellow in a round wig who threatened to have me arrested if I did not go and finish somewhere else.

"Why, if you please?"

"Because to your left there is a woman at a window who can see you."

I look and, sure enough, I see in a fourth-story window the face of a woman who, if she had had a spyglass, could have seen whether I was a Jew or a Christian. I obeyed, laughing at the incident, which I related to all and sundry; but no one thought it unusual.

I went to the "Sign of the Crawfish"[15] to dine with Campioni at the common table and I was surprised to see Bepe il cadetto, whom I had met at the time of my arrest by the Spanish army and had seen again at Venice and later at Lyons under the name of Don Giuseppe Marcati. Campioni, who had been his partner in Lyons, embraced him, spoke to him privately, and told me before we sat down at table that the gentleman had resumed his real name, which was Count Afflisio. He said that after dinner they would make a bank at faro, in which I would have a small share, and so I must refrain from playing. I agreed. The bank was made, Afflisio won, Captain Beccaria[16] threw the cards in his face; but Afflisio prudently disregarded it. Afflisio, Campioni, and I went to a coffeehouse with an engaging officer, who looked at me and smiled but not in such a way as to offend against good manners.

"I am smiling because you do not remember me."

"No, Monsieur, but it seems to me . . ."

"Nine years ago at Prince Lobkowitz's order I conducted you to the gate in Rimini."

"You are Baron Weiss."[17]

"The same."

He offered me his friendship and promised to procure me all the pleasures in his power in Vienna. And that very evening he introduced me to a countess, at whose house I met the Abate Testagrossa,[18] whom everyone called Grossatesta, who was Ambassador from the Duke of Modena and well liked at court because he negotiated the marriage between the Archduke and the Princess Beatrice d'Este.[19] Among the guests I met a Count Roggendorf [20] and a Count Sarotin,[21] and several Fräuleins,[22] together with a baroness who had gone the pace but who was still attractive. Supper was served and I was made a baron; it was in vain that I said I had no title; I was told that in such a company I had to be something and I could not be less than a baron and I must agree to be one if I wanted to be received anywhere in Vienna. I gave in. The Baroness nonchalantly made me understand that I was to her taste and that she would be glad to receive my attentions; I paid her a visit the next day: she told me to come in the evening if I liked cards, and I met several players. It was there that I met Tramontini,[23] whose wife I already knew as Signora Tesi.[24] There I also met three or four Fräuleins who, quite unawed by the Commissaries for Chastity, were devoted to love and so kindly disposed that they had no fear of sullying their nobility by accepting money. After discovering the privileges enjoyed by these young ladies, I saw that the Commissaries were a hindrance only to people who did not frequent good houses.

The Baroness told me that I might introduce my friends to her if I had any, and after consulting Campioni, I brought Afflisio, Baron Weiss, and even Campioni, who, being a dancer, did not need a title. Afflisio played, held the bank, won, and Tramontini introduced him to his wife, who introduced him to her Prince Sachsen-Hildburghausen.[25] It was there that Afflisio began the triumphant career which ended so badly for him twenty-five years later. Tramontini, having become his partner in the great gambling sessions which he induced him to organize, easily got his wife to persuade the Prince to have him made a captain in the service of Their Imperial and Royal Austrian Majesties. It did not take long, for three weeks later I myself saw him in uniform. He was already in possession of a hundred thousand florins when I left Vienna, the Empress loved play, and the Emperor too, but not as a punter. He had someone hold a bank for him. He was a good prince, magnificent yet economical; I saw him in his role of Imperial Majesty and was surprised to find that he was dressed in the Spanish fashion.[26] I thought I was seeing Charles V, who established this etiquette, which still existed despite the fact that after him no Emperor was Spanish and Franz I had no connection with that nation. I saw the same thing, but with better reason, in Warsaw at the time of the coronation of Stanislas August Poniatowski,[27] who also indulged the whim of wearing Spanish dress. The costume brought tears to the eyes of the old courtiers, but they had to swallow the pill, for under the Russian despotism they were left with no power but the power to think.

The Emperor Franz I was handsome, and I should have known that his physiognomy promised good fortune even if I had not seen him a monarch. He treated his wife with the utmost consideration, he did not prevent her from being prodigal, for it was only Kremnitz ducats[28] which she staked at cards or gave away in pensions, and he let her put the State in debt because he had the skill to become its creditor himself. He favored commerce because he put into his coffers a good share of the profits which it produced. He was also given to gallantry, and the Empress, who always addressed him as "Master," pretended not to notice. Perhaps she did not want it known that her charms did not suffice her husband's nature, and the more so since everyone admired the beauty of her numerous family. I saw all her Archduchesses[29] and thought them all beautiful except the eldest; among the males I studied only her eldest son,[30] whose physiognomy I found unpromising, despite the contrary opinion of the Abate Grossatesta, who also prided himself on being a physiognomist.

"What do you see in it?"

"I see conceit and suicide."

I guessed rightly, for Joseph II killed himself; and despite the fact that he did not intend it, he killed himself none the less. His conceit was the reason for his not being aware of it. What he professed to know, and did not know, made what he did know useless, and the acuity he tried to have spoiled what acuity he had. He loved to talk to anyone who, dazzled by his reasoning, did not know how to answer him, and those whose sound arguments invalidated his own he called "pedants." He told me in Laxenburg[31] seven years ago, talking of a man who had spent a fortune to buy a patent of nobility, that he despised anyone who bought one. I replied that it would be better to despise the person who sold it. He turned his back on me and from then on did not consider me worthy to hear his voice. His passion was to see people laugh, at least in their sleeves, when he told some story, for he told them well and embroidered on the circumstances amusingly; and he considered those who did not laugh at his jokes lacking in intelligence. They were precisely the people who understood them best. He preferred the arguments of Brambilla,[32] who encouraged him to kill himself, to those of the doctors whose advice to him was Principiis obsta ("Resist from the beginning").[33] As for the art of ruling, he did not know it, for he had no knowledge of the human heart, he could neither dissimulate nor keep a secret; he showed the pleasure he took in punishing, and he had not learned to control his countenance. He so far neglected this art that when he saw someone he did not know he made a grimace which rendered him very ugly, when he could have used an eyeglass instead, for the grimace seemed to say, "Who can that creature be?"

He succumbed to a malady which was most cruel in that it left him his reason until the end and because, before killing him, it showed him that his death was inescapable. He must have known the unhappiness of repenting of everything he had done and the other unhappiness of being unable to undo what he had done, partly because it was impossible and partly because he would have thought it dishonorable, for his sense of his high birth must always have remained in his soul even when it was languishing. He had the greatest esteem for his brother,[34] who reigns in his stead today, yet he had not the strength of mind to follow the important advice which he more than once gave him. With great magnanimity he gave a large reward to the intelligent physician[35] who had pronounced his death sentence, but with no less pusillanimity he had some months earlier rewarded the physicians and the charlatan who had made him believe he was cured. He also had the unhappiness of knowing that he would not be regretted; it is a most grievous thought. Another misfortune he had was not to die before the Archduchess his niece.[36] If those who were about him had really loved him, they would have spared him the dreadful news, for he was already dying and there was no need to fear that he would so far recover as to punish discretion as indiscretion; but they were afraid that his successor would not be generous to the worthy lady, who at once obtained a hundred thousand florins. Leopold would have defrauded no one.

Delighted by my stay in Vienna and by the pleasures I procured with the beautiful Fräuleins whom I had met at the Baroness's, I was thinking of leaving, when Monsieur Weiss, encountering me at the wedding festivities for Count Durazzo,[37] invited me to a picnic at Schönbrunn. We went, and I did not stint myself in anything; but I returned to Vienna with such a case of indigestion that within twenty-four hours I was at the brink of the grave.

I used what dregs of intelligence I had left to save my life. At my bedside were Campioni, in whose house I was lodging, Monsieur Roggendorf, and Sarotin. The latter, who had become my staunch friend, had come with a physician, though I had explained that I did not want one. The physician, considering himself at liberty to employ the despotism of his art, had sent for a surgeon, and I was about to be bled, without my consent and against my will. Half dead, I do not know what inspiration made me open my eyes, whereupon I saw the man with his lancet about to pierce my vein. ''No, no,'' I said, and feebly drew back my arm; but according to the doctor, the butcher was going to restore me to life despite myself, and I see my arm grasped. I quickly laid hold of one of the two pistols which I had on my night table, and I fired it at the man who had sworn to obey the doctor. The ball uncurled a lock of his hair, and that was quite enough to send away the surgeon, the physician, and everyone who was with me. Only the chambermaid did not abandon me and gave me water to drink whenever I asked for it, and in four days I was in perfect health. The whole of Vienna heard the story, and the Abate Grossatesta assured me that if I had killed him nothing would have happened to me, for the two noblemen who were present had been witnesses that I was about to be bled by force. In addition everyone told me that all the physicians in Vienna said that if I had been bled I would be dead. However, it is true that I had to beware of falling ill, for no physician would have dared to visit me again. This incident made a stir. I went to the opera, and many people wanted to make my acquaintance; I was admired as a man who had defended himself against Death by firing a pistol at him. A miniature painter named Marolles,[38] a friend of mine, who had died because he had been bled for indigestion, had impressed it on me that to recover from the indisposition one need only drink water and be patient. One is in a state of distress which one cannot define. One does not want to vomit, for vomiting does not cure. I shall never forget a jest from the lips of a man who never made one; it was Monsieur de Maisonrouge, who was being brought home dying of indigestion. A jam of carts forces his coachman to stop opposite the Quinze-Vingts.[39] A beggar comes up to his carriage and asks him for a sou for charity, saying that he is dying of hunger. Maisonrouge opens his eyes, looks at him, and says:

"You're a very lucky fellow."

At this same period I made the acquaintance of a Milanese dancer who, besides being pretty, had a taste for literature. Her receptions were frequented by people of distinction. There I met a Count Christoph Erdödy,[40] pleasant, rich, and generous, and a sparkling Prince Kinsky[41] who had all the graces of a Harlequin. The girl, who is still alive, I believe, inspired me with love, but in vain, for she had fallen in love with a dancer named Angiolini,[42] who had just arrived from Florence. I paid my court to her, but she would have none of me. A girl of the theater who is in love with some man is invincible unless one can conquer her by force of money. I was not rich. Nevertheless I did not despair and I continued to go there; my company entertained her because she showed me the letters she wrote and I pointed out their beauties; at the same time, sitting beside her, I enjoyed the beauty of her eyes. She showed me letters from her brother, who was a Jesuit and a preacher. She had been painted in miniature, and the portrait was a speaking likeness; on the eve of my departure, furious because I had not been able to obtain anything from the beauty, I resolved to steal her portrait, a poor compensation for one so unlucky as not to have obtained the original. So on the day I bade her good-by I took it without her noticing it, and put it in my pocket. The next day I left for Pressburg, to which Baron Weiss had invited me for an outing with two Fräuleins.

We got out of our carriage at an inn, and the first person I see is the Chevalier de Talvis, the very man who had obliged me to give him a little wound with my sword at the Étoile on the day I had written "Labré" after "Condé" on the receipt from the wife of the Swiss at the Tuileries. He no sooner sees me than he comes up and says I owe him a revenge. I reply that I never leave one company for another and that we shall meet again.

"That is enough," he answered. "Will you do me the honor of introducing me to these ladies?"

"With pleasure, but not in the street."

We go upstairs, he follows us, and it occurs to me that the man, who was certainly no coward, might amuse us, and I introduce him. He had been lodging at the same inn for two days, and he was dressed in mourning[43] and wearing a shirt with frayed cuffs. He asks us if we are going to the Prince-Bishop's[44] ball, of which we had heard nothing, and Weiss answers that we are.

"One can go to it," he says, "without being presented, and that is why I expect to go, for I have no acquaintances here."

A moment later he leaves, the innkeeper comes to take our orders, he tells us about the ball, the Fräuleins want to go to it; after eating something, we go, we see a great many people, and, being known to no one, we walk about freely.

We enter a room in which we see a large table surrounded by members of the nobility punting at faro; the dealer was the Prince and we thought the sovereigns[45] and ducats in the bank amounted to thirteen or fourteen thousand florins. The Chevalier de Talvis was standing between two ladies, to whom he was saying pretty things, while Monsignore was shuffling. He offers the pack to be cut, and takes it into his head to look at the Frenchman and tell him to stake on a card too.

"With pleasure, Monsignore—banco on this card."

"Banco," said the Bishop loftily, wanting to show that he was not afraid, whereupon the card appears at his left and the Chevalier indifferently gathers up all the money. The astonished Bishop says to the Gascon:

"If your card had lost, Monsieur, how would you have paid me?"

"Monsignore, that is not your business."

"Monsieur, you have more luck than sense."

This astonishing incident gave rise to all sorts of talk, but everyone ended by saying that the foreigner must be either mad or desperate and that the Bishop was a fool.

A half hour later we return to the inn, we ask what has become of the winner, and are told that he has gone to bed. I tell Weiss that we ought to turn the incident to advantage by borrowing a small sum. We enter his room very early, I congratulate him and ask him to be so good as to lend me a hundred ducats.

"Most gladly."

"I will return them to you in Vienna. Shall I write you a receipt?"

"No, no."

He counts out a hundred Kremnitz ducats, and a quarter of an hour later leaves for Vienna by post. His entire luggage was a traveling bag, an overcoat, and a pair of boots. I faithfully divided the hundred ducats between the four of us, and we went back to Vienna the next day. We found that the story was on the lips of all our acquaintances, but no one knew either that we had received a hundred ducats or that the winner was the Chevalier de Talvis; furthermore until that moment not a soul in Vienna had been able to guess who the man was.

No one at the French Embassy[46] had any idea. I never learned if anything was heard of him again. I left by the diligence and on the fourth day reached Trieste, whence I at once took ship for Venice. I arrived there two days before Ascension Day in the year 1753.

CHAPTER XIII

I return the portrait I had carried off from Vienna. I go to Padua; incident during my return; its consequences. I meet Teresa Imer again. My acquaintance with Signorina C. C.

DELIGHTED THAT I was back in my native country, which the greatest of prejudices endears to all men, become the superior of several of my equals in respect to experience and to knowledge of the laws of honor and good manners, I could not wait to resume my old courses, but more systematically and with more reserve. In the room where I slept and wrote I saw with pleasure my papers shrouded in dust, certain proof that no one had entered it for the past three years.

The next day but one after my arrival, just as I was going out to accompany the Bucentaur,[1] in which the Doge, according to custom, was going to marry the Adriatic, a gondolier brought me a note. I open it, and I find that Signor Giovanni Grimani[2] asks me to come to his house to receive a letter which he was instructed to deliver to me in person. This nobleman, aged twenty-three, a rich patrician, had no right to summon me, but he counted on my good manners. I went at once. After congratulating me on my safe return, he hands me a small unsealed letter which he had received the previous day. I find this in it:

"After you left I looked everywhere in vain for my portrait in miniature. I am sure that it is in your possession, because, since I do not receive thieves, everything in my house is safe. You will deliver it to the person from whom you receive this letter.—Fogliazzi."

Very glad that I have the portrait in my pocket, I instantly hand it to the nobleman, who is all amiability. I see on his countenance an expression of surprise and satisfaction. He had had good reason to think that his task would be difficult.

"It is apparently love which induced you to commit this theft," he said; "but I congratulate you on its not being very strong. I deduce this from the promptness with which you return the jewel."

"I would not so easily return it to anyone else."

"In that case I beg you to count on my friendship in future."

"It is worth far more than the portrait, and than the original. Dare I hope that Your Excellency will send her my answer?"

"Of course. Here is paper. You need not seal it."

Here are the few lines I wrote: "The pleasure which Casanova feels in ridding himself of this portrait is far greater than that which he enjoyed when an unworthy caprice prompted him to the folly of putting it in his pocket."

On the next day, bad weather having caused the postponement of the miraculous wedding until Sunday, I accompanied Signor Bragadin to Padua, to the quiet of which he was retiring during the days which the festivities in Venice made distasteful to him. A truly amiable old man leaves boisterous pleasures to the young. On Saturday, after dining with him, I kissed his hand and took a barella[3] for Venice. If I had left Padua ten seconds earlier or later, everything that has happened to me in my life would be different; my destiny, if it is true that destiny is dependent upon coincidence, would have been changed. The reader shall judge.

Having, then, left Padua at this fateful moment, two hours later at Oriago[4] I meet a cabriolet, drawn by two post horses at full trot, in which there is a pretty woman on the right of a man in the German uniform. Eight or ten paces from me the cabriolet overturns in the direction of the river, the woman falls across the officer and is in obvious danger of falling into the Brenta.[5] I jump out of my small carriage without shouting ''halt,'' and I stop the lady, quickly pulling down her skirts, which had exposed all her secret wonders to my eyes. Her companion comes running at the same moment, and she stands there in complete confusion and certainly less put out by her fall than by the indiscretion of her skirts, despite the beauty of all that they had displayed. In the course of her thanks, which continued for all the time that her postilion and mine took to right the carriage, she several times called me her ''angel.'' After the two postilions had quarreled, each blaming the other as usual, the lady set off for Padua and I continued my journey. I had scarcely reached Venice before I masked and went to the opera.

The next morning I masked early to follow the Bucentaur, which, as the day was fair, was to go to the Lido without fail. This function, which is not only unusual but unique, depends upon the courage of the Admiral of the Arsenal,[6] since he must answer for the weather remaining fair on peril of his head. The least contrary wind could capsize the vessel and drown the Doge with the whole Serenissima Signoria, the Ambassadors, and the Nuncio of the Pope, founder and guarantor of the efficacy of this strange sacramental ceremony, which the Venetians rightly revere to the point of superstition. The crowning misfortune of such a tragic accident would be that it would set all Europe laughing and saying that the Doge of Venice had finally gone to consummate the marriage.

I was drinking coffee unmasked under the Procuratie[7] in the Piazza San Marco when a beautiful female masker who was passing by gave me a playful blow on the shoulder with her fan. Not knowing the masker, I pay no attention. After drinking my coffee I put on my mask and make my way to the Riva del Sepolcro, where Signor Bragadin's gondola was waiting for me. Near the Ponte della Paglia[8] I see the same masker who had struck me with her fan staring at the picture of a caged monster[9] which was shown to anyone curious enough to give ten soldi to go in. I approached the masked lady and ask her what right she had had to strike me.

"To punish you for not recognizing me after you saved my life yesterday beside the Brenta."

I compliment her, I ask her if she intends to follow the Bucentaur, and she answers that she would go if she had a perfectly safe gondola; I offer her mine, which is of the largest; she consults with the officer whom, though he is masked, I recognize by his uniform, and she accepts. We go aboard, I urge them to unmask, and they answer that they have reasons not to reveal themselves. I then ask them to tell me if they were connected with some ambassador, in which case I must ask them to get out, and they answer that they are Venetians. Since the gondoliers wore the livery of a patrician, I should have been in trouble with the State Inquisitors. We followed the Bucentaur. As I am sitting on the bench beside the lady, I take a few liberties under cover of her cloak; but she discourages me by changing her position. After the ceremony we return to Venice, we disembark at the Colonne,[10] and the officer says that they would be happy if I would dine with them at the "Wild Man,"[11] I accept. I had become greatly interested in the woman, who was pretty and of whom I had seen something more than her face. The officer left me alone with her, going on ahead to order dinner for three.

I at once told her that I loved her, that I had a box at the opera, that I offered it to her, and that I would attend her throughout the fair if she would assure me that I would not be wasting my time.

"So if you intend," I said, "to be cruel to me, be so good as to tell me so frankly."

"Be so good as to tell me with whom you think you are."

"With a woman who is completely charming, be she a princess or a woman of the lowest condition. You will show me some signs of kindness today, or after dinner I will take a respectful leave of you."

"You will do as you please; but I hope that after dinner you will speak differently, for the tone you are taking is one to make you hated. It seems to me that such a matter can hardly be discussed until after people know each other. Do you not agree?"

"Yes—but I am afraid of being deceived."

"Poor man! And for that reason you want to begin where people end."

"I ask only a payment on account today; after that you will find me undemanding, obedient, and discreet."

"I think you are very amusing; I advise you to calm yourself."

We found the officer at the door of the "Wild Man" and went upstairs. When she unmasked I thought her even prettier than the day before. I still had to find out, for the sake of form and etiquette, whether the officer was her husband, her lover, her relative, or her procurer. Inured as I was to adventures, I wanted to know on what kind of adventure I had embarked.

We eat, we converse, and both she and he behave in such a way that I believe I must proceed cautiously. It was to him that I saw I should offer my box, and it was accepted; but since I did not have one I left them, on some pretext, to go and buy one, and I took it for the opera buffa[12] which was being given at the San Moisè and in which Laschi[13] and Pertici[14] were appearing with great success. After the opera I invited them to supper at an inn; then I took them to their lodging in my gondola, in which, under cover of the darkness, the beauty granted me all the favors which propriety permits a woman to grant when there is a third person to be considered. When we parted the officer said that I would hear from him the next day.

"Where and how?"

"I will see to it."

The next morning I was told that an officer had come to call. It was he. After thanking him for honoring me with a visit, I ask him to tell me his name and rank, congratulating myself on having made his acquaintance. He answers me as follows, speaking very fluently but not looking at me:

"My name is P. C.[15] My father is very well off and in excellent standing at the Exchange; but we do not get on well with each other. My house is on the Fondamenta di San Marco;[16] and the lady whom you have seen, whose maiden name was O.,[17] is the wife of the broker C. Her sister[18] is married to the patrician P. M. Signora C. is at odds with her husband over me, as I am at odds with my father over her. I wear this uniform by virtue of a captain's commission in the Austrian service; but I have never served. I am in charge of supplying the Venetian State with beef cattle,[19] importing them from Styria and Hungary. When the accounts are made up, this enterprise assures me of a clear ten thousand florins a year; but an unexpected slump, which I shall remedy, a fraudulent bankruptcy, and unusual expenditures now place me in financial difficulties. It is four years since, having heard of you, I wished to make your acquaintance; and you see that Heaven itself decreed that I should make it day before yesterday. I do not hesitate to ask you for a necessary favor which will unite us in the closest friendship. Become my backer without risking anything yourself. Honor these three bills of exchange, and do not fear that you will have to redeem them when they fall due, for I will give you these other three, which will be paid to you before the due date of yours. In addition, I will mortgage my cattle shipments to you for the whole of the present year, so that, if I should fail you, you could sequestrate all my cattle at Trieste, for they can only come to Venice from there."

Astonished by such a speech and such a proposition, which seemed to me chimerical and the source of countless difficulties which I loathed, and by the man's extraordinary notion that I would be taken in by it which had made him choose me in preference to a hundred other men he must know, I do not hesitate to reply that I will never honor the three bills of exchange. At that, his eloquence redoubled to convince me; but his ardor diminished when I told him that I was surprised he should have chosen me in preference to many others. He replied that, knowing that I was highly intelligent, he had felt certain that I would have no objection to raise.

"Then you know better by now," I said. "Indeed I am such a fool that I shall never get it through my head how, if I do it, I shall not risk being gulled by it."

He left, excusing himself and saying that he hoped to see me toward evening on the Liston[20] at the Piazza San Marco, where he and Signora C. would be. He left me his address, saying that, without his father's knowledge, he was still occupying his rooms. It was as much as to tell me that I must return his visit. If I had been wise, I would have dispensed with fulfilling this supposed obligation.

Disgusted with the man's designs on me, I was also disgusted with mine on Signora C. I thought I saw a plot; I thought I saw that I was being taken for an easy mark and, determined not to be one, I did not go to the Liston; but the next morning I went to his house. I thought that a polite call could have no consequences.

A servant having conducted me to his room, he embraced me and reproached me in a friendly way for having made them wait for me in vain on the Liston. Immediately bringing up his business again, he showed me a mass of papers which bored me. If I would honor the three bills of exchange, he said that he would make me his partner in the provisioning enterprise. By this mark of extraordinary friendship he was enriching me by five thousand florins a year. My only answer was to ask him not to mention the matter to me again. I was about to leave, when he said he wished to introduce his mother and his sister to me.

He goes out and a moment later returns with them. I see a woman who looks both ingenuous and respectable, and a very young girl who strikes me as a prodigy. A quarter of an hour later the mother all too trustfully asks me to excuse her, and the girl remains. It took her no more than half an hour to enchant me by her bearing, her face, and by all that I saw was budding in her. What chiefly struck me was a lively and perfectly unspoiled nature brimming over with candor and ingenuousness, a gay and innocent vivacity, simple and noble feelings—in short, a combination of qualities which showed my soul the venerable portrait of virtue, which always had the greatest power to make me the slave of the object in which I believed I saw it.

Signorina C. C.[21] never went out except with her mother, who was pious and indulgent. She had read only the books in the library of her father, a serious man who possessed no novels; she was longing to know Venice; no one visited the house; she had never been told that she was a miracle of nature. The short time I remained there, while her brother wrote, I spent entirely in answering questions which she asked me, and to which I could not fully reply except by adding to her primitive stock of ideas others which she had not known she could entertain; her soul was still in chaos. I told her neither that she was beautiful nor that she interested me in the highest degree, because it was only too true and having lied on the subject to so many other women, I feared she would distrust me.

I left the house sad and pensive, only too impressed by the rare qualities I had discovered in the girl. I promised myself that I would not see her again. I regretted that I was not the man to ask her father for her hand in marriage. I thought her uniquely endowed to make me happy.

Having not yet seen Signora Manzoni,[22] I called on her, and I found her the same as she had always been toward me. The news she told me was that Teresa Imer, the same Teresa on whose account old Senator Malipiero had given me a caning thirteen years earlier, had just arrived from Bayreuth, where the Margrave[23] had made her fortune. As she was staying in the house across the way, Signora Manzoni, wishing to enjoy her surprise, sent a message to ask her to come to call. She appeared a quarter of an hour later with a boy eight years of age and as handsome as could be. It was her only son,[24] whom she had had by the dancer Pompeati,[25] who had married her; he had remained in Bayreuth.

Our surprise at seeing each other again was equaled by the pleasure we took in recollecting what had happened to us when we were leaving childhood. So all that we could remember was childish trifling. I offered her my congratulations on her good fortune, and, judging by appearances, she thought she must congratulate me on mine; but hers would have been more durable than mine if she had behaved herself later. She indulged her impulses far more than I did, and my reader will hear something of it five years hence. She had become a great musician; but her good fortune had not depended entirely on her talent; her charms had contributed to it more than anything else. She narrated her adventures to me at length, of course passing over those which her self-esteem did not allow her to tell me. The interview ended two hours later, after she had invited me to breakfast with her the next morning. The Margrave, she said, was having her watched; but as I was an old acquaintance I could not be suspect. This is the aphorism of all light women. She told me to go that evening to her box at the opera, where Signor Papafava[26] would be glad to see me. I went. He was her godfather. Very early the next morning I went to breakfast with her.

I found her in bed with her son, the principles of whose education taught him to get up as soon as he saw me sitting at his mother's feet. I spent three hours with her, of which the last was the one which counted. My reader will see its consequences five years hence. During the two weeks she spent in Venice I was with her one more time, and on her departure I promised to visit her at Bayreuth, but I did not keep my promise.

During these first days of my return to my native country I had to attend to the affairs of my posthumous brother, who having, or so he said, a divine vocation to become a priest, could not do so because he had no patrimony.[27] Ignorant and completely uneducated, with nothing in his favor but a handsome face, he thought that he could succeed only in the priesthood, counting chiefly on preaching, for which the women he knew told me he had a marked talent. I made all the applications he asked me to, and I succeeded in forcing the Abate Grimani to furnish him with a patrimony. He could not avoid it, since he was in debt to us for all the furniture in our house and had never accounted to us for it. He gave him a life interest in a house he owned, and two years later my brother took holy orders by title of patrimony. But the patrimony was fictitious, for the house was already mortgaged; the transaction was a stellionate. I shall speak of my unfortunate brother's conduct when it becomes connected with my own vicissitudes.

Two days after my visit to P. C. I met him in the street. He told me that his sister did nothing but talk of me, that she had remembered many of the things I had said to her, and that his mother was delighted that she had made my acquaintance. He said that she would be a good match for me, since she would bring me a dowry of ten thousand ducati correnti.[28] He asked me to come and drink coffee with her and her mother the next day, and I went despite the fact that I had promised myself I would not go there again. It is always easy to break one's word to oneself.

On this second visit three hours of nothing but conversation, which passed very quickly, sent me away so much in love that I realized I was incurable. Saying to her, as I left, that I envied the lot of the man whom Heaven had destined for her, I saw a flame from her very soul spread over her face. No one had ever said as much to her before.

On my way home I examined the nature of my budding passion, and I found it cruel. I could proceed with C. C. neither as an honorable man nor as a libertine. I could not delude myself into believing that I could obtain her hand, and I thought that I would kill anyone who dared to suggest that I seduce her. To turn my thoughts elsewhere I went to a gambling casino. Gambling is often a great palliative for a man in love.

Leaving the gambling den the winner by some hundred zecchini, I was suddenly approached in a solitary street by a man bent under the weight of years, whom I at once recognized as Count Bonafede.[29] After a short preamble he said that he was in dire want and reduced to despair by his obligation to support his numerous family.

"I do not blush," he said, "to ask you for a zecchino, which will keep me alive for five or six days."

I quickly gave him ten, preventing him from groveling to me to show his gratitude, but I could not prevent him from shedding tears. He told me as he left that his crowning misfortune was the state of his elder daughter, who, having become a beauty, would rather die than sacrifice her virtue to necessity.

"I can," he said with a sigh, "neither support her in her feelings nor reward them."

Understanding what he wanted, I took his address and promised to call on him. I was curious to see what the ten years since I had lost sight of it might have done to a virtue of which I had no high opinion. I went the next day. He lived in the Biria.[30] The almost bare house in which I found the daughter, for the father was not at home, did not surprise me. The young Countess, having seen my arrival from a window, came to the stairs to meet me. She was quite well dressed. I found her beautiful and lively, as I had known her at the fortress of Sant'Andrea. Her father had told her that I would come. Transported with joy, she embraced me; she could not have welcomed an adored lover more fondly. She showed me to her room, where, after telling me that her mother was ill in bed and unable to receive a visitor, she surrendered to fresh transports caused, she said, by her pleasure at seeing me again. The storm of kisses, which were given and received under the merest guise of friendship, so affected our senses that the thing which propriety defers to the end of a visit happened in the first quarter of an hour. After that our role, whether genuine or assumed, was to show our surprise. In all decency I could not but assure the poor Countess that what I had done was only the forerunner of a constant attachment; she believed it, as I believed it myself at the moment. In the calm which followed she told me of her family's poverty, of her brothers roaming the streets of Venice in rags, of her father who literally had nothing to feed them.

"Then you have not a lover?"

"A lover! What man would have the courage to be a lover in a house like this? As for profiting by my person, do you think me a woman to give myself for thirty soldi? There is no one in Venice who would set a higher price on me, seeing me in this wretched house. Besides, I do not feel that I was born to be a prostitute."

She now began to shed tears—which brought me to a standstill, mind, body, and soul. The sad spectacle of misery revolts and frightens love. She would not let me go until I had promised I would come to see her often. I gave her twelve zecchini, and the amount astonished her; she had never had so much money.

The day after this encounter P. C. called on me early to tell me in most cordial tones that his mother had given his sister permission to go to the opera with him, that she was delighted because she had never seen a theater, and that if I wished I could meet them somewhere.

"Does your sister know that you are so kind as to include me in the party?"

"She knows it, and she is delighted."

"And does your mother know it?"

"No; but when she hears of it she will not take it amiss, for she thinks highly of you."

"In that case I will try to get a box."

"Then kindly meet us at twenty-one o'clock[31] in the Campo dei Santi Apostoli."[32]

The scoundrel said no more about his bills of exchange. Seeing that I was not interested in his mistress, and aware that his sister had attracted me, he conceived the pretty plan of selling her to me. I felt sorry for the mother, who entrusted her daughter to him, and for the girl, who thus put herself in the hands of such a brother; but I was not virtuous enough to refuse the invitation. On the contrary, I thought that, since I loved her, I should be present to guard her against other snares. If I had refused he would have found some other man; and the idea was poison to my soul. I thought that with me she ran no risk.

I took a box for the opera seria[33] which was being given at San Samuele,[34] and, not bothering to eat dinner, waited for them at the time and place agreed upon. I saw C. C., ravishingly beautiful and elegantly masked. I made them get into my gondola, for P. C. in his uniform might be recognized and someone might have guessed that the pretty masker was his sister. He asked to be let out at his mistress's house, saying that she was ill, and promised to join us in our box, the number of which I told him. What surprised me was that C. C. seemed neither afraid nor reluctant to be left alone with me in the gondola. As for her brother's abandoning her to me, it did not surprise me. It was obvious that he hoped to profit by it. I told C. C. that until the hour for the Liston we would have the gondoliers row us about, and that since the day was very hot she could unmask. She did so instantly. As I was bound to respect her by the strict principle of conduct I had adopted, and seeing a noble assurance in her countenance and pure confidence and joy of soul shining in her eyes, my love became immense.

Not knowing what to say to her, for I naturally could not talk to her of anything but love and the subject was dangerous, I only kept my eyes on her face, not daring to let them stray to her young bosom for fear I should frighten her modesty. Cut too low in front, her bodice let me see the buds of her breasts through the lace of her bautta.[35] I had seen them only for an instant, and, terrified, I did not dare look at them again.

"Do speak to me," she said; "you only look at me and say nothing. You have sacrificed yourself today, for I am sure that my brother would have taken you to call on his lady, who, he says, is as beautiful and intelligent as an angel."

"I know your brother's lady. I have never gone to her house, and I shall never go there; I am sacrificing nothing for you, and if I do not talk to you it is because my happiness and your beautiful confidence in me have me in ecstasies."

"I am delighted; but how could I fail to have confidence in you? I feel freer and safer than if I were with my brother. My mother herself says there is no mistaking it and that you are certainly one of the most honorable young men in Venice. Besides, you are not married. It's the first thing I asked my brother. Do you remember telling me that you envied the lot of the man who would marry me? At the very same moment I was saying to myself that the girl who gets you will be the happiest girl in Venice."

Hearing these words uttered with angelic sincerity, and not daring to print a kiss on the beautiful lips from which they had come, I pity the reader who does not know what sort of torment I endured at the same time that I felt the sweetest joy from knowing that I was loved by this angel incarnate.

"Our sentiments being the same," I said, "ought we not to be happy, my charming C., if we could be united forever? But I could be your father."

"You my father! What nonsense! Do you know that I am fourteen?"

"And I am twenty-eight."

"So there you are! What man of your age has a daughter like me? I laugh when I think that if my father were like you he would certainly never frighten me and I would hide nothing from him."

At the hour for the Liston we disembarked at the Piazzetta and the spectacle, which was new to her, occupied all her attention. Toward nightfall we ate ices, then went to the opera, where her brother joined us during the third act. I took them to supper at an inn,[36] where the pleasure of seeing the young lady in high spirits and eating with the greatest appetite made me forget that I had not dined. I scarcely spoke: I was sick with love and in a state of excitement which could not continue. When I said that I had a toothache they condoled with me and let me remain silent.

After supper P. told his sister that I was in love with her and that I would feel better if she would let me kiss her. Her only answer was to turn a smiling mouth to me. It would have been churlishness in me not to do my duty, but it was only a polite salute, a kiss on the cheek, and even a very cold one. What prevented me from kissing her otherwise was crime not daring to sully innocence.

"What a kiss!" said the scoundrel. "Come, give her a lover's kiss."

I did not stir, and the fellow's provocations annoyed me. Then his sister, turning her beautiful head away,

"Do not urge him," she said, "for I do not please him."

This conclusion startled me, pierced my soul, and determined me to act.

"What!" I said. "You do not attribute my reserve to my feeling for you? You think you do not please me? You are mistaken, heavenly C., and if a kiss is needed to tell you that I love you, this is how I must print it on your beautiful, smiling mouth."

With which, clasping her fondly to my bosom, I gave her the kiss which she deserved and which I was dying to give her. But the nature of my kiss showed the dove that she was in the talons of the hawk. She left my arms blushing crimson and as if stunned to have discovered my love in such a fashion. Her brother congratulated me, while she busied herself putting on her mask. I asked her whether she now doubted if she pleased me. She answered that I had convinced her, but that I need not have hurt her to undeceive her. This answer, which was dictated by the purity of her feeling, seemed nonsense to her wretched brother. After taking them home I went home myself, content, yet very sad.

CHAPTER XIV

Progress of my love affair with the beautiful C. C.

ON THE next day but one P. C. came to call and told ne triumphantly that his sister had told her mother that we loved each other and that, if she must marry, she could not be happy with anyone but me.

"I adore her," I answered; "but will your father give her to me?"

"I do not think so; but he is old. In the meanwhile, ove. My mother is willing that she should go to the opera buffa with you today."

"Then we will go, my friend."

"I am obliged to ask you to do me a small favor."

"Command me."

"At the moment there is some excellent Cyprus wine for sale cheap. I can have a cask of it against a note payable in six months. I am sure I can resell it at once, nd make a profit; but the merchant requires a guarantee, nd is willing to accept yours. Will you sign my note?"

"With pleasure."

I signed without hesitation. Who is the man in love who at that moment could have refused such a favor to one who, to revenge himself, could have made him miserable? After arranging to meet him at the same place at twenty o'clock,[1] I went to the Piazza San Marco to engage a box.[2] A quarter of an hour later I see P. C. masked and in a brand-new suit of clothes. I tell him he has done well to give up wearing his uniform and I show him the number of my box. We part. I go to the fair, I buy a dozen pairs of white gloves, a dozen pairs of silk stockings, and embroidered garters with gold clasps, which I at once put at the top of my own stockings. I am delighted to be giving this first present to my angel. After that, the hour being at hand, I hurry to the Campo dei Santi Apostoli, and I see them standing still and looking about for me; P. C. says that he has business which obliges him to leave us and that since he already knows the number of my box he will join us at the opera. I thereupon tell his sister that there is nothing for us to do but row about in a gondola until time for the Liston. She answers that she would like to go for a walk in a garden on La Giudecca,[3] I second her idea. Not having dined, as I found she had not, I tell her that we can get something to eat in the garden, and we go there in a ferry-gondola.

We go to a garden I know in San Biagio,[4] where a zecchino makes me lord and master of the place for the whole day. No one else was permitted to enter. We order what we want to eat, we go upstairs to the apartment, leave our disguises there, and go down to the garden for a walk. C. C. had on only a short taffeta bodice and a skirt of the same material; it was her entire costume. My amorous soul saw her naked, I sighed, I cursed duty and all feelings contrary to the nature which triumphed in the Golden Age.

As soon as we reached the long walk, C. C., like a young greyhound released from days of tedious confinement in its master's room and given the freedom of the fields at last—joyously obeying its instincts, it runs at top speed left and right, back and forth, returning every moment to its master's feet as if to thank him for allowing it to play so wildly—even so did C. C., who had never been granted the untrammeled freedom she was enjoying that day; she ran and ran until she was out of breath, and then laughed at the astonishment which kept me motionless and staring at her. After catching her breath and wiping her forehead she takes it into her head to challenge me to a race. The notion pleases me, I accept; but I insist on a wager.

"Agreed."

We set the goal of the race at the gate which gives on the Lagoon. The first to touch it will be the winner. I was certain to win; but I meant to lose to see what she would order me to do. We start. She uses all her strength, but I spare mine so that she touches the gate five or six paces ahead of me. She catches her breath, thinking up some pretty penalty to inflict on me, then she goes behind the trees and a minute later comes and says that she sentences me to find her ring, which she had hidden somewhere on her person, that I am free to look for it, and that she will think very little of me if I do not find it.

It was charming: there was mischief in it, but she was enchanting; and I must not take advantage of her, for her ingenuous confidence was something to be encouraged. We sit down on the grass. I search her pockets, the folds of her short bodice and her skirt, then her shoes, and I turn up her skirt, slowly and circumspectly, as high as her garters, which she was wearing above the knee; I unfasten them and I find nothing. I fasten them again, I draw down her skirt, and, since I am free to do anything, grope under her armpits. The tickling makes her laugh; but I feel the ring, and if she wants me to get it she has to let me unlace her bodice and touch the pretty breast over which my hand must pass to reach it; but just in time the ring drops lower, so that I had to take it from the waist of her skirt, thereby blessing both my hungry eyes and my hand, which she was surprised to see shaking.

"Why are you shaking?"

"With pleasure at finding the ring; but you owe me a revenge. You shall not beat me this time."

"We'll see."

At the beginning of the race the charming runner did not make much speed, and I was in no hurry to get ahead of her. I felt certain that I could gain the lead toward the finish and touch the gate before her. I could not suppose that she was up to the same trick; but she was. When she was thirty paces from the goal, she ran her best, and, realizing that I must lose, I fell back on an unfailing ruse. I let myself fall, crying:

"Oh, my God!"

She turns, she thinks I have hurt myself, and she comes to me. With her help I get up, groaning, and pretending that I could not stand on one foot, and she is perturbed. But as soon as I see that I am one step ahead of her, I look at her, I laugh, I run to the gate, I touch it, and I cry victory.

The charming girl was too amazed to understand what had happened.

"Then you didn't hurt yourself?"

"No—I fell on purpose."

"On purpose to fool me, counting on the kindness of my heart. I would not have believed you capable of it. It's against the rules to win by a trick, and you have not won."

"I won, because I got to the gate ahead of you, and, trick for trick, you must admit that you tried to trick me when you began running your best."

"But that's fair. Your trick, my dear friend, was outrageous."

"But it got me the victory.

> "'Vincasi per fortuna o per inganno
> Il vincer sempre fu laudabil cosa.'"[5]
> ("Whether victory be gained by luck or by ruse, winning has always been praiseworthy.")

"That's a maxim I have more than once heard from my brother but never from my father. But to cut it short, I admit that I lost. Pronounce my sentence, I will obey you."

"Wait. Let us sit down. I must think about it.

"I sentence you," I said thoughtfully, "to change garters with me."

"Garters? You saw mine. They're old and ugly, they're worth nothing."

"Never mind. I shall think of the object of my love twice a day, at the moment when it is always in the mind of a devoted lover."

"It is a pretty idea and it flatters me. I forgive you now for having tricked me. Here are my ugly garters."

"And here are mine."

"Oh, my dear deceiver, how beautiful they are! What a pretty present! How my dear mother will like them! They must be a present you have just received, for they are brand-new."

"No. They're not a present. I bought them for you, and I have racked my brains to find a way of persuading you to accept them. Love suggested making them serve as the forfeit for our race. Imagine my disappointment when I saw you on the verge of winning. It was love itself which suggested a trick based on what does you honor, for admit that if you had not come running to me at once it would have shown you were hardhearted."

"And I'm sure you wouldn't have played such a trick on me if you could have guessed how much it made me suffer."

"Then you feel a deep interest in me?"

"I would do anything on earth to convince you of it. As for these garters, I assure you I'll never wear any others and my brother shall never steal them from me."

"Is he capable of it?"

"Perfectly so, if this is gold."

"It is gold; but you shall tell him it is gilded copper."

"But you must show me how to fasten these pretty clasps, because my legs are thin there."

"Let us go and eat our omelette."

We needed the light repast. She became gayer, and I more in love and hence more to be pitied because of the restraint I had laid on myself. Impatient to put on her garters, she asked me to help her in perfect good faith, with no thought of evil and not a grain of coquetry. An innocent girl who, though she is fourteen years old, has never loved and never mingled with other girls knows neither the violence of desire nor exactly what excites it nor the dangers of being alone with a lover. When instinct makes her fall in love with a man she believes him worthy of all her trust, and she thinks she can only make him love her by showing him that she trusts him with no reservations. C. C. pulled her skirt up to her thighs and finding that her stockings were too short for her to put the garters on above the knee, she said that she would put them on with longer stockings; but I at once gave her the dozen pairs of pearl-gray stockings I had bought. In an ecstasy of gratitude, she sat on my lap, giving me the same sort of kisses she would have given her father when he made her such a present. I returned them, quelling the violence of my desires with a strength more than human. However, I told her that a single one of her kisses was worth more than a kingdom. C. C. took off her shoes and put on a pair of my stockings, which reached halfway up her thigh; and, supposing that I was in love with her, she thought not only that the sight would please me but that, since it was of no consequence, I would think her a fool if she attached any importance to it. The more innocent I found her to be, the less I could make up my mind to possess her.

We went downstairs again, and after strolling until nightfall we went to the opera wearing our masks, for, the theater being small, we might have been recognized. C. C. was certain that she would no longer be allowed to go out if her father discovered that she was given the privilege.

We were surprised not to see P. C. At our left was the Marchese di Montealegre,[6] the Spanish Ambassador, with his mistress Signorina Bola, and at our right a masked man and woman who, like ourselves, had never taken off their masks. They watched us constantly, but C. C., whose back was toward them, could not be aware of it. During the ballet she put the libretto of the opera on the ledge of the box, and I saw the masked man reach out and take it. Judging from this that it could only be a person whom one of us knew, I mentioned it to C. C., who at once recognized her brother. The lady could be none other than his C. Knowing the number of my box, he had taken the one beside it, and I foresaw that he intended to have his sister to supper with the woman. I did not like it; but I could not avoid it except by a direct challenge; and I was in love.

After the second ballet he came to our box with his lady, and after the usual compliments the introduction was made; and we had to go to supper at his casino. After taking off their disguises the ladies embraced, and C. fulsomely praised the beauties of my angel. At table she affected to shower her with attentions, and she, having no knowledge of the world, treated her with the utmost respect. Yet I saw that C., despite all her art, was very jealous of the budding charms which I had preferred to hers. P. C., boisterously gay, minced no words in his stupid jokes, at which only his lady laughed; my annoyance made me serious, and C. C., who understood nothing of the situation, remained silent. Our supper party was as depressing as possible.

At dessert, by which time he was drunk, he embraced his lady, challenging me to do as much to mine; I answered calmly that since I loved the Signorina I would not go so far until I had won rights over her heart. C. C. thanked me, her brother said that he did not believe us, and his lady told him to be still. At that I took from my pocket the gloves I had bought and gave her six pairs of them, presenting the other six to C. C. As I put them on for her, I kissed her beautiful arm again and again as if it were the first favor I had secured. Her brother laughed derisively and got up from the table.

He threw himself on a sofa, bringing C., who had also drunk too much, down with him and exposing her bosom to our view, while she only pretended to resist; but when he saw that his sister had turned her back on him and gone to a mirror and that his lewd behavior disgusted me, he pulled up her skirts to display for my admiration what I had already seen when she fell beside the Brenta and had handled since. For her part she slapped him in pretended punishment, but she was laughing. She wanted me to believe that her laughter deprived her of the power to defend herself; but her efforts had the contrary effect of revealing her completely. An accursed hypocrisy forced me to praise the shameless creature's charms.

But now the libertine, apparently calmed, asks her to forgive him, rearranges her dress, and changes her position; then, without changing his, he displays his bestial condition and adjusts the lady to himself, holding her astride him while she, still pretending that she was powerless in his hands, lets him perform, and performs. At that I go and talk to C. C., standing between her and them to hide the horror which she must already have seen in the mirror. Red as fire, she spoke to me of her beautiful gloves, which she folded on the mantelpiece.

After his brutal performance the scoundrel came and embraced me, and the lady embraced his sister, saying she was sure she had seen nothing. C. C. modestly answered that she did not know what there had been for her to see. But I saw that her beautiful soul was in the greatest perturbation. As for my own state, I leave it to the reader who knows the human heart to divine it. How could I bear this scene in the presence of an innocent girl whom I adored; and at the very moment when my soul was struggling between crime and virtue to defend her from myself? What torture! Anger and indignation set me trembling from head to foot. The infamous scoundrel believed that he had given me a great proof of his friendship. Reckoning as nothing the fact that he was dishonoring his lady and debauching and prostituting his sister, he was so blinded and infatuated that he did not understand that what he had done must have aggravated me to the point of very nearly drenching the scene in blood. I do not know how I restrained myself from cutting his throat. The only reasonable excuse he offered me two days later was that he could not imagine that when I had been alone with his sister I had not treated her just as he had treated C. After taking them home, I went to bed, hoping that sleep would calm my anger.

Upon awaking and finding that I was only indignant, my love became unconquerable. I thought C. C. was to be pitied only because I could not myself make her happy, for I was determined to do anything necessary to prevent the scoundrel from profiting in any way by her charms if I were forced to give her up. I felt I must lose no time. How horrible! What an unparalleled sort of seduction! What a strange way of winning my friendship! I seemed to be under the dire necessity of pretending to accept as tokens of friendship what could spring only from the baseness of an unbridled libertinism ready to sacrifice everything for the sake of its own continuance. I had been told that he was deeply in debt, that he had gone bankrupt in Vienna, where he had a wife and children, and he had done the same in Venice, compromising his father, who had turned him out of the house and who pretended not to know that he was still living there. He had seduced C., whom her husband refused to see, and after running through what money she had, he wanted to keep her as his mistress despite the fact that he did not know where to turn for a single zecchino. His mother, who adored him, had given him everything she possessed, even to her clothes. I expected to see him come to ask me for money again or to stand surety for him; but I was resolved to refuse him. I could not bear either the thought that C. C. was to become the cause of my ruin or the thought that she must serve as her brother's tool in supporting his debauchery.

Guided by love, I called on him the next day and after telling him that I adored his sister with the purest intentions, I made him realize what pain he had made me feel during that infamous supper. I told him that I had resolved to associate with him no longer, even if I had to renounce the pleasure of seeing his sister; but that I would find means to keep her from going out with him if he flattered himself that he could sell her to someone else.

He answered only that I must forgive him because he had been drunk and that he did not believe I loved his sister with a love which excluded possessing her. He embraced me with tears in his eyes, and just then his mother came in with her daughter to thank me for the pretty presents I had given her. I told her that I loved her only in the hope that she would grant me her hand and that to that end I would send someone to speak with her husband after I had secured a sufficient income to make her happy. So saying, I kissed her hand, unable to hold back my tears, which set hers flowing. After thanking me for the sentiments I had expressed to her, she withdrew, leaving me with her daughter and her son, who seemed turned to stone.

The world is full of mothers of this stamp, every one of them honest and endowed with all the virtues, the first of which being good faith they are nearly always the victims of the trust they repose in those whom they take to be people of probity.

My speech to the Signora astonished her daughter. But she was even more astonished when I repeated to her what I had said to her brother. After reflecting for a very short time, she told him that with any other man but myself she would have been ruined, and that she would not have forgiven him if she had been in the place of the lady he had dishonored even if she had been his wife.

P. C. wept. But the scoundrel could command his tears. The day being Whitsunday and the theaters not open, he asked me to meet him on the next day at the usual place, where he would bring his sister to me. He added, addressing us both, that since honor and love obliged him not to leave Signora C. alone, he would leave us in perfect freedom.

"I will give you my key," he said to me, "and you shall bring my sister back here after you have supped wherever you please."

He left us after giving me the key, which I had not strength of mind to refuse, and I left a moment later, telling C. C. that we would talk the next day in the garden on La Giudecca. She said that what her brother had now done was the most honorable decision he could take.

It was fulfilled the next morning; he left her with me and, burning with love, I foresaw what must happen. After engaging a box we went to our garden, where, it being Whitmonday, we found many people; but as the casino was unoccupied we asked nothing more.

We go upstairs and, certain that we should not dare take a walk, since ten or twelve parties were sitting at a number of tables in the garden, we decide to sup in the casino, not caring to go to the opera until the second ballet. So we ordered supper for later. We had seven hours before us; she said she was sure we would not be bored and, having taken off her disguise, she threw herself in my arms, saying that I had finally won her heart and soul during that terrible supper where I had been so considerate toward her. What we said was always accompanied by kisses, with which we deluged each other's faces. But love kisses the face only to thank it for the desires it inspires; and since its desires have a different goal, love becomes irritated if that is not attained.

"Did you see," she asked, "what my brother did to his lady when she got astride him as one rides a horse? I hurried to the mirror; but I could well imagine what was happening."

"Were you afraid I would do the same to you?"

"No, I assure you. How could I have feared such a thing, knowing how much you love me? You would have humiliated me so greatly that I could no longer have loved you. We will keep ourselves until we are married. Shall we not? You cannot imagine the joy of my soul when you spoke out to my mother. We will love each other forever. But, while I think of it, please explain the two verses on my garters."

"Are there two verses on them? I didn't know it."

"Please read them. They are in French."

As she was sitting on my lap, she unfastens one garter while I take off the other. Here are the two verses, which I ought to have read before I gave her the garters:

En voyant tous les jours le bijou de ma belle
Vous lui direz qu'amour veut qu'il lui soit fidèle.

("You who see my beauty's jewel every day, tell it that Love bids it be true.")

The verses which, though naughty, I thought were perfect, both funny and witty, made me burst out laughing and then laugh even more when I had to explain them word by word to satisfy her. Since they depended on two ideas both of which were new to her, she needed a commentary which set us both on fire. The first thing I had to tell her was that the "jewel" stood for her little such-and-such, of which I could only obtain possession by marrying her, and the second was that her garters would have the privilege of seeing it constantly if they had eyes. Blushing furiously, C. C. embraced me with all her heart and said that her jewel did not need any such flattering advice from her garters, since it knew very well that it was only for her husband.

"I am only sorry," she said after thinking a moment, "that I shall not dare show anyone my garters now. Tell me what you are thinking."

"I am thinking that those lucky garters have a privilege which I may never enjoy. Why am I not where they are! I may die of the desire I feel, and I shall die unhappy."

"No, my dear. I am in the same state as you, for you must have jewels to interest me, too, and I am sure I shall live. Besides, we can hasten our marriage. For my part, I am ready to pledge you my faith tomorrow if you wish. We are free, and my father will be obliged to consent."

"Your reasoning is sound, for his honor would demand that of him; yet I wish first to show him my respect by making an application for your hand, and our household will soon be set up. It will be a matter of a week or ten days."

"So soon? You'll see that he will say I am too young."

"And perhaps he will be right."

"No; for I am young, but not too young. I am certain, my dear, that I could be your wife."

I was burning; I could no longer resist the compelling force of nature.

"My dear one," I said, holding her clasped in my arms, "are you sure that I love you? Do you think I could fail you? Are you certain you will never repent of marrying me?"

"I am more than certain of it, dear heart; I shall never believe you capable of making me unhappy."

"Then let us marry now before God, in his presence; we cannot have a truer and more worthy witness than our Creator, who knows our consciences and the purity of our intentions. We have no need of documents. Let us pledge our faith to each other; let us unite our destinies here and now and be happy. We will have a church ceremony when we can do everything publicly."

"So be it, my dear. I promise God and you that from this moment until my death I will be your faithful wife, and that I will say the same to my father, to the priest who will bless us in church, and to the whole world."

"I make you, my dear, the same vow, and I assure you that we are truly married and belong to each other. Now come to my arms. We will complete our marriage in bed."

"Now? Is it possible that I am so near to my happiness?"

Thereupon I went out and told the hostess not to bring us supper until we called and to leave us undisturbed, for we wanted to sleep until nightfall. C. C. had thrown herself on the bed with all her clothes on; but I laughed and told her that Love and Hymen went naked.

"Naked? And you too?"

"Of course. Leave it to me."

In less than a minute I had her before my avid and covetous eyes with no veil to hide the least of her charms from me. In an ecstasy of admiration which put me beside myself I devoured all that I saw with fiery kisses, hurrying from one spot to another and unable to stop anywhere, possessed as I was by the desire to be everywhere, regretting that my mouth must move less swiftly than my eyes.

"Your beauty," I said, "is divine; it will not let me believe at this moment that I am mortal."

C. C., white as alabaster, had black hair, and her puberty was apparent only in the down which, divided into little curls, formed a transparent fringe above the little entrance to the temple of love. Tall and slender, she was ashamed to let me see her hips, which the junction of her thighs set off to perfection and whose proportions she thought faulty, whereas if they had been less full and less prominent they would have been less beautiful. Her belly scarcely showed its contours, and her breasts left nothing for either my eyes or my hands to desire. Her large black eyes, under brows not given to anger,[7] bore witness to the joy of her soul in its delight at seeing the effect of her wonderful beauty in my admiration. Her rosy cheeks, which contrasted with her whiteness, showed only two small dimples except when a sweet smile added a fraction of an inch to the length of her coral lips, which at the same time showed teeth whose whiteness surpassed that of her bosom only because it was brightened by the sheen of their enamel.

Beside myself, I began to fear either that my happiness was not real or that it could not be made perfect by an even greater enjoyment. But at that most serious moment mischievous Love gave me occasion to laugh.

"Can it be the law," said C. C., "that the husband must not undress?"

"No, my angel. And even if such a barbarous law existed I would not submit to it."

Never have I undressed more quickly. Then it was her turn blindly to obey the promptings of instinct. She did not interrupt her transports and her ardors except to ask me if it was really true that I belonged to her. She said that the statue of Beauty her father possessed proved that the first sculptor had been a man, for a woman would have made it of the opposite sex from hers.

"Great power of love!" she cried. "I feel no shame. Would I have believed it ten days ago? Please don't tickle me there, it's too sensitive."

"Dear heart, I am going to hurt you more than that."

"I am sure of it; but let nothing stop you. What a difference between you and my pillow."

"Your pillow? Are you joking? Tell me what you mean."

"It's just silliness. These last four or five nights I couldn't get to sleep unless I held a big pillow in my arms and kissed it over and over and imagined it was you. I only touched myself there, dear, just for a moment at the end and very lightly. Then a pleasure for which there are no words left me motionless and as if dead; I fell asleep and when I woke eight or nine hours later I laughed to find the big pillow in my arms."

C. C. became my wife like a heroine, as every girl in love must do, for pleasure and the assuagement of desire make even pain delicious. I spent two whole hours without ever separating from her. Her continual swoons made me immortal. Nightfall bade me resolve to suspend our pleasures. We dressed and I called for lights and supper.

What a delicious repast, even though there was not much of it! We ate gazing at each other, and we did not speak because we did not know what more to say. We found our supreme happiness in the thought that it was we who had created it and that we would renew it whenever we wished.

The hostess came up to see if we wanted anything else, and she asked us if we were going to the opera and if it was true that it was such a fine spectacle.

"Have you never gone?" C. C. asked her.

"Never—it's too expensive for people like us. My daughter is so curious about it that she would give—God forgive me!—her maidenhead to go just once."

C. C. burst out laughing and replied that she would be paying too dearly to satisfy her curiosity, and just as I was thinking of offering the woman the box I had taken she said to me that we could make the girl happy by giving her our key. I give it to her, swearing that I had had the same idea.

"Here," she said to the hostess, "is the key to a box at San Moisè, which cost two zecchini. Go to the opera at once with your daughter, and tell her to keep her maidenhead for something better."

"And here are two more zecchini," I added, "to do as you please with."

Amazed at such a liberal present, the good woman ran to take it to her daughter, while we congratulated ourselves on having made it necessary for us to go back to bed. The hostess comes back upstairs with her daughter, a beautiful and quite savory blonde, who insists on kissing the hands of her benefactors.

"She will be off at once," said her mother, "with her lover, who is downstairs, but I won't let her go alone because he's a strapping fellow. I shall go with them."

I told her to keep the gondola in which they came back, and we would take it to return to Venice.

"Really? You mean to stay here until four o'clock?" [8]

"Yes, for we were married this morning."

"This morning? God bless you!"

She goes to the bed and, seeing signs worthy of veneration, she embraces my charming initiate, congratulating her on her virtue; but what amused us extremely was a sermon the woman preached to her daughter while she pointed out what, according to her, did immortal honor to C. C. and what Hymen very seldom saw on his altar. The daughter replied, casting down her blue eyes, that she was certain the same thing would happen when she was married.

"I'm sure of it too, because I never let you out of my sight. Take the basin and get some water and bring it here, for the bride must need it."

She brought up water, then they left, and the comical scene diverted my angel exceedingly. After refreshing ourselves all over, we locked ourselves in and went back to bed, where four hours passed very quickly. The last combat would have gone on longer if my wife, already grown curious, had not taken it into her head to put herself in my place and me in hers. When she thus displayed herself before my soul in a state of obsession which pronounced her ravaged by Venus, the supreme degree of pleasure seized on my senses. Left as if dead, we fell asleep; but a moment later the hostess knocked to say that the gondola was at our service. I hurried to open the door, eager to laugh at what she would have to tell us about the opera; but she left it to her daughter while she went to make us coffee. The blonde helped C. C. to dress, occasionally giving me glances which showed me beyond doubt that her mother was greatly mistaken if she thought her inexperienced.

Nothing was more telltale than my angel's eyes, which had such dark circles that they looked as if they had been bruised. The poor child had sustained a combat which had literally left her another person. After drinking some very hot coffee we told the hostess that we wanted a choice dinner for the following day. By the light of early dawn we disembarked at the Campo di Santa Sofia[9] to evade the curiosity of the gondoliers. We parted content, happy, and certain that we were well and duly married. I went to bed resolved that, by an infallible oracle, I would compel Signor Bragadin to obtain the girl's hand for me. I slept until noon; I ate dinner in bed, and I spent the rest of the day gambling and losing.

CHAPTER XV

Continuation of my love affair with C. C. Signor Bragadin asks for the young lady's hand for me. Her father refuses and puts her in a convent. De La Haye. I lose at cards. Association with Croce, which replenishes my purse. Various incidents.

THE NEXT day I saw P. C. in my room in high spirits and taking an entirely new tone with me. He told me in so many words that he was sure I had slept with his sister and that he was delighted.

"She refuses to admit it," he said, "but that makes no difference. I will bring her to you today."

"You will be doing me a kindness, for I love her, and I shall arrange to have her father asked for her hand for me in such a way that he will not refuse."

"I should like nothing better, but I doubt it. Meanwhile, I am under the necessity of asking you to do me another favor. In exchange for a note payable in six months, I can have a ring worth two hundred zecchini which I am sure I can sell today for the same price; but unless you will stand surety, the merchant, who knows you, will not let me have it. Will you do me this favor? I know that you lost three hundred zecchini yesterday; I offer you a hundred, which you will repay me when the note falls due."

How could I refuse the wretch what he asked of me? I answered that I was ready; but that he was wrong in thus abusing the affection which bound me to his sister. We went to the merchant who had the ring and we completed the transaction. The man, whom I did not know, thought he was paying me a great compliment when he said that he was ready to give P. C. everything he had on my surety. Such was the fashion in which the scoundrel went about Venice looking for the one man in a hundred ill advised enough to grant me credit against all reason, for I had nothing. And so C. C., who should have brought me nothing but happiness, became the cause of my ruin.

C. C.'s father having gone to Treviso on business, her brother brought her to me at noon. To convince me that he was honest he gave me back the note for the Cyprus wine for which I had stood surety, insisting at the same time that when next we met he would give me the hundred zecchini he had promised me.

On La Giudecca, where I at once had the garden closed, we dined in a grape arbor. I thought C. C. had become more beautiful. Friendship had been added to love, so that our perfect contentment shone in our faces. The hostess, who had found me generous, gave me game and sturgeon. The blonde waited on us at table and came to wait on us in our room when she learned that we were going to bed. After helping my wife undress she offered to take off my shoes; but I waved her away, pretending not to see her bosom, which on the excuse of the hot weather she displayed too lavishly. But could I have eyes for anyone else when I was with C. C.?

She at once asked me what was the meaning of the hundred zecchini her brother was to bring me, and I told her the whole story. She said that in future I must absolutely refuse him my signature, for, since the wretch was sunk in debt, he would involve me in his ruin, which was inevitable.

On this second occasion we found our amorous pleasures more substantial; we thought we relished them with more delicacy, we discussed them. She begged me to do everything possible to make her pregnant, for in case her father obstinately refused to let her marry so young he would change his mind when he saw her with a big belly. I had to give her a lecture on the rudiments to make her understand that her becoming a mother depended upon us only in part, but that it was likely it would happen on one occasion or another, especially when we reached the sweet ecstasy at the same time.

So, both applying ourselves sedulously and single-mindedly after two attempts which she said went very well, we spent four good hours sleeping. I called; candles were brought, and after drinking coffee we resumed our amorous labors in order to arrive together at that life-engendering death which was to ensure our happiness. But dawn having come to warn us that we must go back to Venice, we dressed in haste and left.

We did the same on Friday, but I think I should spare the reader the details of our communion, which, though always new to those who are in love, often does not seem so to those who hear it recounted. We arranged to go to the garden for the last time on Monday, the last day for masks. Death alone could prevent me from going, for it might be the last day of our amorous enjoyments.

So, having seen P. C. on Monday morning, when he confirmed the appointment for the same hour at the same place, I did not fail to be there. The first hour passes quickly, despite the impatience of him who waits; but after the first another passed, then a third, a fourth, and a fifth, and the couple for whom I was waiting did not appear. I could imagine only the most terrible disasters. But if C. C. had been unable to leave, her brother should have come to tell me so; but it was possible that some insurmountable obstacle had prevented him from going to fetch his sister. I could not go to their house for fear of missing them on the way.

It was finally on the stroke of the Angelus that I saw C. C. coming toward me, masked, but alone.

"I was sure," she said, "that you were here, and I let my mother say what she would. Here I am. You must be dying of hunger. My brother has not shown his face all day. Let us go to our garden quickly. I need to eat, and to have love console me for all that I have suffered today."

As she had told me everything I did not need to ask her any questions. We went to our garden, despite a very violent storm which, our gondola having only one oar, terrified me. C. C., who was unaware of the danger, frisked about, and the movement she imparted to the gondola put the gondolier in danger of falling into the water, which would have meant our death. I told her to keep quiet, though I did not tell her the danger we were in for fear of frightening her. It was the gondolier who shouted that if we did not sit still we were lost. We arrived at last, and the gondolier smiled when I paid him four times the fare.

We spent six hours there in a state of happiness which the reader can imagine. Sleep was not of our company. The only thought which clouded our joy was that, the season of masks[1] being over, we did not see how we could continue our amorous meetings. I promised that I would call on her brother on Wednesday morning, when she would join us as usual.

After taking leave of the kind hostess of the garden, who could not hope to see us again, we went to Venice and, after leaving C. C. at her door, I went home. The news with which I was greeted when I woke at noon was the return of De La Haye with his pupil Calvi. He was a very handsome boy, as I think I have said, but I laughed heartily at table when, encouraging him to speak, I found him a young De La Haye in miniature even to his gestures. He walked, he laughed, he looked about like him, he spoke De La Haye's French, which was correct but harsh. I thought this was going much too far. I considered it my duty to tell his tutor publicly that he must certainly rid his pupil of his affectations, for his aping him would expose him to bitter raillery. Baron Bavois came in, and after spending an hour with the boy he thought as I did. The promising boy died two or three years later. Two or three months after Calvi's death De La Haye, whose passion was forming pupils, became tutor to a young Cavaliere Morosini,[2] the nephew of the Morosini who had set Baron Bavois on the road to fortune and who was then Border Commissioner for the Republic to settle its boundary with the House of Austria, whose commissioner was Count Cristiani.[3]

In love as I was, I could no longer put off taking the step on which, as I thought, my happiness depended. After the company left I asked Signor Bragadin and his two faithful friends to grant me a hearing for two hours in our withdrawing room, where we were inaccessible. It was there that, making no exordium but ex abrupto, I told them that I was in love with C. C. and determined to elope with her if they could not induce her father to grant me her hand.

"It will be necessary," I said to Signor Bragadin, "to provide me with an income on which I can live and to guarantee the ten thousand ducats which the girl will bring me as her dowry."

Their answer was that if Paralis would give them all the necessary instructions they would obey. I asked nothing better. I thereupon spent two hours constructing all the pyramids they wished, and the upshot was that the intermediary who was to ask her father for the girl would be Signor Bragadin in person, because it was he who would have to guarantee the dowry by all his present and future possessions. As C. C.'s father was then in the country I told them that I would inform all three of them when he returned, since the three of them must be together when he was asked for her hand.

Well satisfied with what I had done in the matter, I called the next morning on P. C. An old woman told me that he was not at home but that the Signora would come to me at once. I see her a moment later with her daughter, both looking sad. C. C. tells me that her brother is in prison for debt and that it would be difficult to get him out since the amounts he owed were too great. Her mother weeps as she says she is in despair because she cannot support him in prison and shows me the letter he had written in which he asked her to give an enclosed letter to his sister. I ask her if I may read the letter he had written her, she hands it to me, and I find that he begs her to recommend him to me. I say, handing it back to her, that she can only write him that I can do nothing for him and at the same time I ask the mother to accept twenty zecchini, with which she could help him, sending him one or two at a time. She took them only at her daughter's urging.

After this mournful scene I tell them what I have done toward obtaining C. C. as my wife. The Signora said that my measures did them much honor and were well planned; but she added that I must not hope for anything, since her husband would not give her in marriage until she was eighteen, and then only to a merchant. He was to arrive that day. As I was going, C. C. slipped a note into my hand. She wrote me that, since I had the key to the small door, I could safely come to her at midnight, sure that I would find her in her brother's room. My joy was complete, for, despite their doubts, I hoped for everything. I go home and inform Signor Bragadin that Signor Ch.,[4] C. C.'s father, is expected at any moment. He writes the note in my presence. He asked him to appoint an hour at which he could come to discuss an important matter with him. I told him to wait until the next day to send it.

Having gone to C. C.'s house at midnight, I found her waiting for me with open arms in her brother's room. After she had assured me that I had nothing to fear, that her father had returned in perfect health, and that everyone was asleep, we gave ourselves up to love; but she trembled when I told her that her father would receive the fatal note the next day. She told me what she feared, and her reasoning was sound.

"My father," she said, "who now thinks of me only as a child, will look at me with new eyes and, once he begins examining my conduct, God knows what he will do. We are even happier now than we were when we were going to La Giudecca, for we can spend every night here together; but what will my father do when he finds out that I have a lover?"

"What can he do? If he refuses me I will carry you off, and the Patriarch[5] cannot refuse us the nuptial benediction. We shall belong to each other for the rest of our lives."

"It is all that I ask, and I am ready for anything; but I know my father and I am afraid."

Two hours later I left her, promising that I would return the next night. Signor Bragadin sent his note to her father about noon. He replied that he would himself go to his palace the following day to receive his orders. About midnight I told all this to my dear C. C., who said that her father was most curious to know what Signor Bragadin, to whom he had never spoken, could want with him. Uncertainty, fear, and delusive hope made the pleasures of love much less keen during these last two hours we spent together. I was certain that when Signor Ch. returned home after hearing Signor Bragadin's proposal he would have a long talk with his daughter, and, since she must expect it, I saw that she was terrified; the pity she aroused in me pierced my heart, I could think of no advice to give her, for I could not know how her father would take the matter; she must hide from him whatever circumstances might be injurious to her virtue, at the same time she must in general tell him the truth and show herself more than ready to obey his will. In the course of these reflections I repented that I had taken the great step, precisely because its consequences would be too decisive. I could not wait to escape from the cruel uncertainty which weighed on my soul, and I was surprised to see C. C. less anxious than I was. I felt certain that I would see her the next night. The contrary seemed to me impossible.

The next day after dinner Signor Ch. called on Signor Bragadin, and I did not show myself. He left after spending two hours with him and his two friends, and I learned at once that he had said what his wife had already told me, but with an addition which was most painful for me. He said that he would send his daughter to a convent for the four years which must pass before she married. He had ended by saying that if, at the expiration of that time, I had a well-established position, he might grant me her hand. I found his answer devastating, and in the despair with which it filled my soul I was not surprised at midnight to find the small door of C. C.'s house locked from inside. I went home neither dead nor alive. I spent twenty-four hours in the cruel indecision of one who must adopt a course and does not know what course to adopt. I thought that carrying her off would now be difficult, even as, with P. C. in prison, it would be difficult to correspond with my wife, for I considered her such by a far stronger bond than one we might have contracted before the Church and a notary.

It was about noon on the next day but one that I resolved to visit Signora C., ringing at the main door of the house. A maid came down and told me that the Signora had gone to the country and it was not known when she would return. At that moment I almost gave up hope. All ways of obtaining any information were closed to me. I tried to appear indifferent when I was with my three friends; but I was the most unhappy of men. Hoping to hear something, I was reduced to visiting P. C. in prison.

Surprised to see me, he expresses the greatest gratitude. He explains the state of his debts, he tells me any number of lies, which I pretend to believe; he assures me that he will be out of prison in ten or twelve days, and he asks me to forgive him for not having given me the hundred zecchini he had promised me; but he assures me that when the time comes he will honor the note for two hundred for which I had stood surety. After letting him talk I coldly ask him for news of the family. He knows nothing, and believes there is nothing new; he says that it will be my own fault if I do not call on his mother occasionally, where I will see his sister. I promised to go, and after giving him two zecchini I left.

I racked my brains for a way to find out what C. C.'s situation was. I imagined that she was unhappy, and aware that I was the cause of it I was in despair, I loathed myself. Soon I could neither eat nor sleep.

Two days after Signor Ch.'s refusal, Signor Bragadin and his two friends went to Padua for a month on the occasion of the Fair of St. Anthony. The state of my soul and my uncertain situation did not allow me to go with them. I was left alone in the palace; but I went there only to sleep. I spent the whole day at cards, I lost constantly, I had sold or pawned everything I owned, and I owed money everywhere; I could hope for help only from my faithful friends, who were in Padua, and shame kept me from writing to them.

In this situation, which was enough to bring thoughts of suicide (it was June 13th,[6] St. Anthony's Day), while I was shaving my valet announces a woman. She enters with a basket and a letter. She asks me if I am the person whose name I saw written in the address. I see the imprint of a seal which I had given to C. C. I thought I should drop dead. To calm myself, I told the woman to wait, thinking that I would finish shaving, but my hand was shaking. I put down the razor, turn my back on the woman, unseal the letter, and read the following:

"Before writing you at length, I must be sure of this woman. I am boarding in this convent, and very well treated; and I am in perfect health, despite the anxiety of my mind. The Mother Superior has orders not to let me see anyone and not to allow me to correspond with anyone; but I am already sure that I can write to you despite her prohibition. I do not doubt your constancy, my dear husband, and I am sure that you do not doubt and will never doubt mine or my readiness to do whatever you command me to do; for I am yours. Answer only a few words, until we are sure of the messenger. Murano, June 12th."

All the letters I quote are faithful translations of the originals, which I have always kept.

In less than three weeks the girl had become an expert in moral science; but her teacher must have been love, which alone performs miracles. The moment during which a man returns from death to life can only be a moment of crisis; so I needed to sit down and spend four or five minutes returning to myself.

I asked the woman if she could read.

"Oh, Signore, if I couldn't read I'd be in a bad way. There are seven of us appointed to serve the blessed nuns of XXX [7] in Murano. Each of us takes her turn coming to Venice on her day of the week; my day is Wednesday. So a week from today I can come back and bring you the answer to the letter which, if you wish, you can write now. You can see that, since our principal errands are the letters we're given to carry, we shouldn't be wanted unless we could read the addresses on those we're entrusted with. The nuns want to be sure—and they're right—that we won't give Peter a letter they write to Paul. They are always afraid we'll make that very blunder. So you'll see me a week from today at the same hour, but give orders that you're to be waked if you're asleep, for our time is measured out like gold. Above all, when you deal with me you need fear no indiscretion. If I didn't know how to hold my tongue, I'd lose my employment, and what would I do then, being a widow with a son eight years old and three pretty daughters, the eldest sixteen and the youngest thirteen? You're welcome to come and see them if you come to Murano. I live on the ground floor ten paces from the bridge nearest the church, on the garden side in the alley, and the door has four steps outside and I'm always home or at the convent gate or in the visiting room or running errands, of which there are plenty. The Signorina, whose name I don't know, for she's only been with us for a week and who—God keep her in health!—is really a perfect beauty, gave me this letter, but so cleverly! . . . Oh, she must be a sly one, for three nuns who were there certainly never noticed it. She gave it to me with this note for me, which I leave you too. She tells me to be discreet. The poor child! I beg you to write her that she can be sure of it and don't be afraid to vouch for me, but not for the others, though I believe they're all honest women, for God preserve me from thinking ill of anyone; but, you see, they're all ignorant, and they certainly chatter away at least to their confessors. As for me—thank God!—I know I need account to him only for my sins, and carrying a letter from a Christian woman to a Christian man isn't one; and besides, my confessor is an old monk who—God forgive me!—I think must be deaf, because he never answers me at all; but if he's deaf, that's his business, not mine."

So it was that the woman, whom I had not intended to question, kindly saved me the trouble by telling me everything I could wish to know, simply to persuade me to use no one but herself in the intrigue. It would appear that her very chatter, which sticks in the mind, contains a sublime eloquence which persuades and instills perfect confidence.

I at once answered my dear captive, intending to write only a few lines as she told me to do; but I did not have time enough to write her a short letter; it filled four pages and it perhaps said less than she had said to me in one. I told her that her letter had saved my life, since I knew neither where she was nor if she was alive or dead. I asked her if I could hope, if not to speak with her, at least to see her. I told her that I had given the bearer a zecchino, that she must have found one herself under the seal of my letter, and that I would send her as much money as she wished if she thought it might be necessary or useful to her. I begged her not to fail to write to me every Wednesday and never to fear that she was writing at too great length, telling me not only every detail of the life she was being forced to lead but also all her ideas on the subject of breaking all the chains and destroying all the obstacles which could stand in the way of our reunion, for I belonged to her just as she told me that she belonged to me. I impressed it upon her that she must use all her ingenuity to make herself loved not only by all the nuns but also by her fellow boarders, yet without confiding anything to them or showing any resentment at having been put where she was. After praising her ingenuity in finding a way to write to me despite the Mother Superior's prohibition, I impressed it upon her that she must take the greatest care never to be caught writing to me, for then her room and her chest of drawers and even her pockets would be searched and any papers she had would be confiscated. On this account I asked her to burn all my letters. I told her to apply all the powers of her mind to the consideration that she was obliged to go to confession frequently; being certain that she would well understand what I was trying to say to her. I ended by imploring her to tell me all her sufferings, assuring her that her sorrows were of even greater concern to me than her joys.

After sealing my letter in such a fashion that the zecchino under the wax would be neither seen nor felt, I gave another to the woman, assuring her that I would reward her in the same way each time she brought me a letter from the same young lady. She wept with gratitude. She said that, since she was free to come and go there, she would give my letter to the Signorina at a time when she found her alone. Here is the note which my dear C. C. had given the woman when she entrusted the letter to her:

"It is God, my good woman, who prompts me to rely on you rather than on any of the others. Take this letter to its address and, if the person is not in Venice, bring it back to me. You must deliver it into his own hands. I am sure that you will at once be given the answer, which you will deliver to me only when you are sure that no one sees you."

Love becomes imprudent only when it is impatient to enjoy; but when it is a matter of procuring the return of a happiness to which a baleful combination of circumstances has raised impediments, love sees and foresees all that the most subtle perspicacity can discover. My wife's letter filled my soul with joy, and in an instant I had passed from one extreme to the other. I felt certain that I could carry her off even if the walls of her convent were guarded with artillery. My first thought was to find some way of quickly passing the week at the end of which I was to receive her second letter. Only gambling could distract me, and everyone was in Padua. I quickly order my valet to pack my trunk and take it to the burchiello[8] which was about to leave, and I instantly set off for Padua, from where, at full gallop, in less than three hours I am at the door of the Palazzo Bragadin,[9] where I see its master going in to eat dinner. He embraced me and, seeing me covered with sweat, said with a laugh that he was sure I was in no hurry. I answered that I was dying of hunger.

I brought joy to the company and it increased when I told them that I would spend six days with them. After dinner I saw Signor Dandolo shut himself up in his room with De La Haye. They spent two whole hours there. Signor Dandolo came to my bedside to tell me that I had arrived just in time to consult my oracle about an important matter which concerned him, and he gave me his question. He asked if he would do well to accept the proposal which De La Haye had just made to him. I produce the answer that he should reject it. Signor Dandolo is surprised and returns with another question. He asks what reasons he shall give him for his refusal. I suggest that he answer that he had thought he should ask my advice and, finding me opposed to the plan, wished to hear no more of it. Pleased that he could put all the odium of his refusal upon me, Signor Dandolo left. I did not know what it was all about, but I did not care to know. My satisfaction consisted in the fact that Signor Dandolo's curt refusal should teach De La Haye that he must not try to make my friends do anything except through me.

I quickly masked and went to the opera. I sat down at a faro bank, I played, and I lost all my money. Fortune showed me that she was not always on love's side. After this ill-considered performance I went to bury my sorrow in sleep.

On waking in the morning I see De La Haye, all smiles. After professing the most exaggerated regard for me, he asks me why I had dissuaded Signor Dandolo from accepting the proposal he had made to him.

"What proposal?"

"You know."

"I know nothing about it."

"He told me himself that you advised him against it."

"Very well, I advised him against it; but I did not dissuade him, for if he had been persuaded he would have had no need to ask my advice."

"As you please. May I ask your reasons?"

"First tell me what the proposal is."

"Did he not tell you himself?"

"Possibly. But if you want me to tell you my reasons I must hear the whole thing from you, for he spoke to me under my promise of secrecy. You would do the same in my place. I have always heard you say that in matters of secrecy one must always be on guard against being taken unawares."

"I am incapable of taking a friend unawares; but in general your maxim is sound. I like circumspection. Here is the story. You know that Signora Tiepolo[10] has been left a widow and that Signor Dandolo continues to court her assiduously after having courted her for ten whole years during the lifetime of her husband. The lady, who is still young, beautiful, and fresh, who has very good sense and is sweetness itself, wishes to become his wife. She chose me to confide in, and, seeing nothing that is not praiseworthy in the union, either temporally or spiritually, for you know that we are all human, I was much pleased to take the matter in hand. I even thought I saw that Signor Dandolo was inclined toward it when he said he would give me his answer today. I will tell you sincerely that I was not surprised that he should ask your advice, for it is the part of a sensible man to ask the advice of a prudent friend before he resolves upon an important and decisive step; but I was greatly astonished that such a marriage did not have your approval. Forgive me if, to improve my mind, I ask you to tell me the reasons which make your opinion so different from mine."

Delighted to have discovered everything and to have arrived in time to prevent my friend, who was goodness itself, from contracting a ridiculous marriage, I answered De La Haye that I loved Signor Dandolo and that, knowing his constitution, I was certain that marriage with a woman like Signora Tiepolo would shorten his life.

"That being so," I said, "you must admit that, as a true friend, I was bound to advise him against it. Do you remember telling me that you had never married for the same reason? Do you remember talking to me at great length in Parma in defense of bachelors? Consider too, if you please, that every man is something of an egoist, and that I am entitled to be one when I think that if Signor Dandolo should take a wife his wife's credit with him must have some weight and that whatever influence she gained over him would be at the expense of mine. So you see it would be going against nature if I should advise him to take a step which he could take only to my disadvantage. If you can show me that my arguments are beside the point or are sophistries, speak, and I will yield and make my recantation to Signor Dandolo. Signora Tiepolo will become his wife upon our return to Venice; but I warn you that I will not yield unless I am thoroughly convinced."

"I do not believe I have the power to convince you. I will write to Signora Tiepolo that it is to you that she must apply."

"Do not write that, for she will think you are making a fool of her. Do you think she is stupid enough to expect that I would consent? She knows that I do not like her."

"How can she know that you do not like her?"

"From seeing that I would never let Signor Dandolo take me to call on her. In short, as long as I live with my three friends they shall never have any wife but me. As for you, marry if you please, and I will raise no objection; but if you want us to remain friends give up your scheme of seducing them away from me."

"You are caustic this morning."

"I lost all my money last night."

"Then I chose a bad time. Good-by."

From that day De La Haye became my secret enemy; and he played no small part in my being imprisoned under the Leads two years later, not by calumniating me, for he was incapable of that, but by pious discourses to pious people. If my reader is fond of bigots, I advise him not to read these memoirs. There was no more talk of the marriage after we returned to Venice. Signor Dandolo continued to pay his court to the widow every day, and I made my oracle forbid me ever to set foot in her house.

Don Antonio Croce,[11] a young Milanese whose acquaintance I had made in Reggio, a great gambler and an old hand at rectifying bad luck, came to call on me just as De La Haye was leaving. He said that, having seen me lose my money, he had come to offer me a way of recouping if I would go halves with him in a faro bank which he would open in his house and at which the punters would be seven or eight rich foreigners, all of whom were paying court to his wife.

"You shall put three hundred zecchini in my bank," he said, "and you shall be my croupier. I have three hundred myself; but it is not enough, for the punters play high. Come to dinner at my house today and you shall meet them all. We can play tomorrow, because it being Friday there is no opera. Be sure that we shall win very large sums, for a Swede named Gillenspetz[12] can lose twenty thousand zecchini all by himself."

Certain that the celebrated swindler did not have designs on me and sure that he knew the secret of winning, I found that I was not conscientious enough to deny him my assistance as his partner and to refuse a half share in his winnings.

CHAPTER XVI

I come into money again. My adventure at Dolo. Analysis of a long letter from my mistress. P. C. plays me a scurvy trick in Vicenza. My tragicomic scene at the inn.

THE DIFFICULTY was to find the money; but in the meanwhile I wanted to make the acquaintance of the gulls and of the idol to whom they did homage. So we went to the Prato della Valle[1] where we found Signora Croce at the coffeehouse, surrounded by foreigners. She was pretty. A secretary to Count Rosenberg,[2] the Imperial Ambassador, who was with her, was the reason why no Venetian nobleman dared to appear in her train. The ones who interested me were the Swede Gillenspetz, a man from Hamburg, an English Jew named Mendex,[3] whom I have already mentioned, and three or four others whom Croce called to my attention. We went to dine and afterwards everyone asked him to make a bank; but he excused himself, which surprised me, for the three hundred zecchini he said he had should have been enough for the skillful player he was; but he cleared my doubt when, taking me to a private room, he showed me fifty fine doblones de a ocho,[4] which amounted to exactly five hundred zecchini. On my promise that I would secure the same amount, he invited them all to supper the next day. Our agreement was that we would divide the winnings before we parted, and that he would let no one play on his word.

It was to Signor Bragadin that I turned to procure the amount, for his money box was always empty. He found a Jewish usurer who, against a note which my benefactor signed, gave me a thousand Venetian ducati[5] at five percent per month, payable at the end of a month and with the interest deducted in advance. It was the amount I needed. I went to supper, he dealt until dawn, and our shares were eight hundred zecchini each. On Saturday Gillenspetz alone lost two thousand zecchini and the Jew Mendex a thousand. On Sunday we did not play and on Monday the bank won four thousand. On Tuesday he had the company to dinner, because I had told him I must go to Venice. He made a bank after dinner, and here is what happened at the end of the afternoon.

An adjutant of the Podestà[6] entered and told him that he had orders from His Excellency to speak to him in private. They went out together and two minutes later my associate came back looking rather embarrassed and told the company that he had just received an order forbidding him to deal in his house. His lady said she felt ill and withdrew, and all the players filed out. After taking half of the money on the table, I left too. He said we would meet again in Venice,[7] for he had been ordered to leave within twenty-four hours. I expected as much, for the young man was too well known, but also for the still stronger reason that the authorities wanted people to lose their money at the gaming room in the theater, where most of the bankers were Venetian noblemen.[8]

I set off at full gallop at nightfall in very bad weather; but nothing could have held me back. I was to receive C. C.'s letter early the next morning.

Six miles from Padua my horse fell on its side, so that I was caught with my left leg under its belly. As my boots were soft, I feared that I had broken it. The postilion, who was riding ahead of me, comes running up, pulls me out, and I am delighted that I have suffered no injury; but my horse was lamed. I make use of my privilege and mount the postilion's horse, but the insolent fellow takes it by the bit and will not let me go. I prove to him that he is in the wrong; but it makes no difference; he holds me back, giving me a quantity of spurious arguments, and I have no time to lose. I fire my pistol at him point-blank, at which he makes off and I pursue my journey. At Dolo[9] I go into the stable and myself saddle a horse which the postilion, to whom I immediately gave a scudo, tells me is excellent. No one is surprised that my postilion has remained behind. It was an hour after midnight, a storm had damaged the road, and, the night being very dark, when I reached Fusina I saw the first light of dawn.

I was told that there would be another storm, but I made light of it, a four-oared boat dared the elements, and I reached home safe and sound, though roughly handled by the rain and the wind. A quarter of an hour later the woman from Murano brought me a letter from C. C., saying that she would come back in two hours for my answer.

The letter was a journal seven pages long, a translation of which would bore my reader; but here is the gist of it. Her father, returned home after talking with Signor Bragadin, had summoned her to his room with her mother and had gently asked her where she had made my acquaintance. She answered that she had talked with me five or six times in her brother's room, where I had asked her if she would consent to become my wife, to which she had replied that she was governed by her father and mother. He had then told her that she was too young to think of marrying and that in any case I had as yet no established position. After that he had gone to the room in which his son was living and had himself bolted the small door opening onto the alley and the door which gave access to his mother's room, ordering him to have me told that she had gone to the country if I came to call on her.

Two days later he told her at the bedside of her mother, who was ill, that her aunt would take her to a convent where she would remain as a boarder until she should receive a husband from the hands of her father and mother. She had answered that, being perfectly obedient to his will, she was very glad to go. He had then promised to visit her there and that when her mother was well she would go too. A quarter of an hour after this conversation she got into a gondola with her aunt, who was her father's sister and who took her to the convent in which she now was. Her bed and all her clothes had been brought the same day, and she was well pleased with her room and with the nun to whom the Abbess had entrusted her and under whose supervision she was. It was this nun who had told her that she was forbidden to receive visits and letters and to write letters, under pain of excommunication. However, the same nun had given her books and everything she needed to copy out the passages she liked; it was at night that she abused this favor by writing to me, having no fear of an excommunication which she considered unreasonable. She said that she thought the woman who carried her letters was discreet and trustworthy, and that she would remain so since, being poor, four zecchini a month would make her rich. She thanked me for the zecchino I had sent her, saying that she would let me know when she needed another from me. She told me, in a very amusing style, that the most beautiful nun in the convent loved her to distraction, that she gave her French lessons twice a day, and had forbidden her to make the acquaintance of her fellow boarders. The nun was only twenty-two years old and, as she was rich and generous, all the other nuns treated her with deference. She said that when they were alone she gave her kisses of which I could rightly be jealous if she were of a different sex. As for my plan of eloping with her, she said she did not think it would be difficult to execute it, but that it would be wiser to wait until she could tell me all about the convent building. She urged me to be true to her, saying that constancy depended upon fidelity; and she ended her letter by asking me for my portrait in a ring, but with a secret device so that no one could see it. She said that I could easily send it to her by her mother, who was well again and went alone every day to the first mass at the church of the P. S.[10] She assured me that her mother would be delighted if I would go there and speak with her. She hoped, she said, that in five or six months she would be in a condition which would scandalize and dishonor the convent if she remained there.

I answered at once, not finishing my letter until I saw the woman. Her name was Laura. After giving her her zecchino I entrusted her with a package in which were fine paper, sealing wax, and a tinderbox. She left, assuring me that my cousin was growing more beautiful every day. C. C. had told her that I was her cousin, and Laura pretended to believe it. Not knowing what to do in Venice, and my honor demanding that I go to Parma, my hurried departure from which might have given rise to such unfavorable conjectures as Croce's had done, I drank a bouillon and set off, going myself to the Roman post for a bollettone.[11] It was easy to foresee that my pistol shot near Fiesso[12] and the lamed horse could have put the post masters in a bad humor to the point of refusing me horses; but they had to obey when they saw what is called a bollettone in Italy. As for the pistol shot, I had no fear because I knew I had missed the insolent fellow on purpose. But even if I had killed him nothing would have happened to me.

At Fusina I took a two-wheeled barella, being extremely tired and even in no condition to ride a horse. I reach Dolo, I am recognized at once, and I am refused horses. The post master comes out and threatens to have me arrested if I do not pay for the horse I had killed. I answer that if the horse is dead I will account for it to the post master in Padua, and I hand him my bollettone to read. He says that since I had nearly killed my postilion none of his will serve me. I say that in that case he shall serve me himself. He laughs in my face and goes off. I then go to a notary with two witnesses, I draw up a complaint, and I threaten him with a fine of ten zecchini an hour if he persists in refusing me horses.

At that he sends out a postilion with two rampaging horses; I clearly see that the plan is to have me upset, perhaps into the river. I coldly tell the postilion that the instant he overturns me I will blow out his brains. He goes back with the horses and tells the post master that he will not serve me. Just then a courier arrives at full gallop from Padua and orders six horses for a berlin and two saddle horses. I thereupon tell the post master that he shall give no one horses before me and that if an attempt should be made to use force blood will be shed, and so saying I show him my pistols. He curses and goes off; everyone around me says he is in the wrong.

Five or six minutes later who should appear but Croce in a fine six-horse berlin with his wife, a chambermaid, and footmen in his livery! He had on an imposing uniform. He gets out, we embrace, and I pull a long face and tell him that he will not leave before I do; I explain the reason, and he says I am right. He raises a row, everybody trembles, the post master had taken to his heels, his wife comes down and orders that I be served. Croce says that I am doing well to show myself in Padua, for people were saying that I too had left it by order. He tells me that Signor Gondoin,[13] a colonel in the service of the Duke of Modena, who also made a bank in his house, had likewise been compelled to leave. I promised that I would go to see him in Venice the following week. This man, who had come into my life as if he had dropped from the sky, had won ten thousand zecchini in four sessions, of which I received four thousand nine hundred. I paid all my debts and redeemed all the possessions I had pawned; but what is more, he filled my purse.

On arriving in Padua I found all my friends greatly alarmed except Signor Bragadin, to whose custody I had entrusted my money box the day before. They believed a rumor which was going the rounds that the Podestà had also sent me an order to leave. As I was a Venetian, such an order could not be sent me. Instead of going to bed I dressed in my best to go to the opera unmasked. I told them that I must go to give the lie to everything that evil tongues had been saying about me.

"I am delighted," said De La Haye, "if everything that is being said is false, but you have only yourself to blame. Your hurried departure did you this injustice. People want to know the reason for everything, and when they do not know it they invent one. However, it is certain that you tried to kill the postilion; give thanks to God that you missed him."

"Another slander. Do you think that a pistol fired point-blank can miss?"

"But the horse is dead, and you must pay for it."

"I will not pay for it, for the postilion was ahead of me. Do you know the rules of the post? Besides, I was in a hurry. I had promised a lady to breakfast with her that morning."

He seemed annoyed when, after this dialogue, I returned to him all the money he had lent me in Vienna. A man can reason well only when he has money, unless a tumultuous passion makes him lose patience. Signor Bragadin said that I would do well to go to the opera unmasked.

On my appearance in the parterre I saw that everyone was astonished, and whoever spoke to me congratulated me, whether sincerely or not. After the first ballet I went to the gaming room and in three or four deals I won five hundred zecchini. Dying with sleep and hunger, I went home to boast of my victories. My dear Bavois borrowed fifty zecchini from me, which he never returned; but it is true that I never asked him for them.

Still thinking of C. C., I spent the whole next day having my portrait painted in miniature by a skillful Piedmontese who had come to the fair and who later made a great deal of money in Venice; he also painted me a St. Catherine[14] of the same size. A Venetian who was an excellent jeweler made the ring for me surpassingly well. The figure one saw was the saint. An almost invisible blue dot on the white enamel which surrounded her was to be pushed with the point of a pin. The saint sprang up and my portrait appeared, a very good likeness. He delivered it to me four days later, as he had promised.

On Friday, just as we were getting up from table, a letter was brought for me. I was surprised to see that it was P. C. asking me to come to him at once at the "Star" (this was the posthouse inn). He said that he had news to tell me which would interest me greatly. I thought it was something which concerned his sister and I went at once.

I found him, as I expected, with his mistress C. After congratulating him on being out of prison, I asked him what the interesting news was. He said he was certain that his sister was being boarded in a convent and assured me that he would be able to tell me the name of the convent as soon as he returned to Venice. I answered that he would be doing me a favor. But the news was only a means to get me to come and talk with him. The reason for his zeal was something else. He told me exultantly that he had sold a three-year lease on his right to supply cattle for fifteen thousand florins, and that the contracting party with whom he had made the transaction had got him out of prison by standing surety for him and had advanced him six thousand florins in the form of four bills of exchange. He at once showed them to me, all four of them honored by a name which I did not know but of whose excellent reputation he assured me.

"I want to buy," he went on, "six thousand florins' worth of silks from the manufactories in Vicenza, paying the makers by these notes, which are to my order and which I will make over to theirs. I am certain to sell the silks and make a profit of ten percent. Come with us, and I will give you silks to the value of two hundred zecchini; and thus you will be covered for the two hundred zecchini you guaranteed for me on the ring. It will take us only twenty-four hours to finish the whole business."

I should not have gone; but my wish to have the value of my guarantee in my hands overcame my judgment. I consented. "If I do not go," I said to myself, "he will sell the goods at once at a loss of twenty-five percent, and my money will be gone." So I promised to leave with them early the next day. He showed me letters of recommendation to the leading houses in Vicenza. An avariciousness which was not in my character made me fall into the trap.

So very early the next morning I am at the "Star." Four horses are harnessed. The innkeeper comes upstairs with the account and P. C. asks me to pay it; I see a bill for five zecchini, four of which had been paid out by the innkeeper, for the Signore owed them to the vetturino he had engaged at Fusina. I paid, with a little laugh. The scoundrel had left Venice without a soldo. We got into the carriage, we reach Vicenza in three hours and put up at the "Sign of the Hat."[15] He orders a choice dinner, then leaves me with his lady while he goes to talk with the cloth manufacturers.

Signora C. begins by treating me to reproaches which I disdain. She says that it is eighteen years since she began to love me, that we were both nine years old when we saw each other for the first time in Padua. She brings it back to me. She was the daughter of the Abate Grimani's antiquarian friend who had put me to board with the Slavonian woman. Her story makes me smile, for I recollect that her mother was fond of me.[16]

But in come some shopboys, already bringing lengths of goods. Signora C. is delighted. In less than two hours the room is full of silks. P. C. arrives with two manufacturers whom he has invited to dinner. C. flirts with them, we dine, there is a great plenty of fine wines. After dinner more goods are brought; P. C. lists them, with their prices; but he wants still more. He is promised that he shall have more the next day, though it is a Sunday.

Toward nightfall several Counts arrive; for in Vicenza all noblemen are Counts.[17] P. C. had left his letters of introduction at their houses. There were a Count Velo, a Count Sesso, and a very pleasant Count Trento; they invite us to the casino which the nobility frequented. C. is admired there. After spending two hours at the casino, P. C. invites them to sup with us. Gaiety and profusion. I was bored to death; I said nothing; no one spoke to me. I go to bed in a room on the third floor, leaving them at the table. In the morning I come down for breakfast, and until noon I see so many lengths of goods that there must be enough. P. C. tells me that the whole transaction will be completed during the course of the next day and that we are invited to a ball at which all the nobility will be present. The manufacturers with whom he had been dealing all came to dinner with us. The same profusion.

At the ball that evening I really lost my patience. Everyone talked with C. and with P. C., who said nothing worth hearing, and when I said anything no one listened. I take a lady out to dance a minuet, she dances it, but looking this way and that. A quadrille is made up, and I find I am left out and that the same lady who refused me is dancing with another man. If I had been in good spirits I would not have put up with it; but I preferred to return to the inn at once and go to bed, at a loss to understand what reason the nobility of Vicenza could have to treat me in such a fashion. Perhaps I was neglected because I was not named in the letters which P. C. had presented; but the rules of politeness could not be unknown to them. I possess my soul in patience. We were to leave the next day.

The next day the tired couple slept until noon. After dinner P. C. went out to pay for the goods he had chosen. We were to leave the next day, Tuesday, early in the morning. The Counts, whom C. had enchanted, came to supper. I left them still at table, impatient for the next day to come, for I must be in Venice early on Wednesday.

In the morning the inn boy comes up and tells me that breakfast is ready in the room downstairs; I delay a little. He comes up again and tells me that my wife asks me to hurry. At the word "wife" my hand strikes the poor innocent's face while my feet kicking his belly show him to the stairs, which he descends headlong at the risk of breaking his neck.

I go down furious, I enter the room in which I am awaited, and I ask P. C. who is the blackguard who has announced me at the inn as the Signora's husband; and just as he is answering that he knows nothing about it, in comes the innkeeper with a knife in his hand and asks me why I had kicked his nephew downstairs. I ask him, pistol in hand, who had told him that I was the woman's husband. He replies that it was Captain P. C. himself who had registered the party. I thereupon seize the Captain by his coat collar, I push him against the wall, and it is the innkeeper who, dropping the knife, prevents me from breaking his head open with the butt of my pistol. The Signora, as always, appeared to be in a faint. The scoundrel did nothing but shout, "It is not true, it is not true." The innkeeper goes downstairs and quickly comes back with the register, and, with a murderous look, holds it under the villain's eyes, defying him to repeat that it was not he who had dictated: "P. C., Captain in the Imperial Army, with Signor and Signora Casanova." He answers that he had misunderstood him, at which the innkeeper hits him in the face with the book. When I see the coward swallow this insult without remembering that he had a sword and was wearing a uniform, I left the room and, going upstairs, told the innkeeper's nephew to order me a barella and two horses for Padua at once. Frothing with rage, I put my possessions in a traveling bag, realizing too late the unpardonable error a decent man commits when he associates with scoundrels. But in comes Signora C.

"Leave this room, for I am furious, and I should not respect your sex."

She drops into an armchair and, bursting into tears, says that she is innocent; she swears that when the shameless knave dictated the registration she was not present. The innkeeper's wife comes in and tells me the same. At that my anger begins to evaporate in words; and from my window I see the barella I had ordered standing ready at the door. I send for the innkeeper, to pay him whatever my share may be. He replies that, since I had ordered nothing, I owed him nothing. At this juncture in comes Count Velo.

"I wager, Signor Conte, that you thought this woman is my wife."

"The whole town knows it."

"Hell and damnation! I am astonished that you should have thought so when you know that I lodge alone in this room and when you saw me retire last night leaving her with you all."

"There are accommodating husbands."

"I am not one of them, and you are no judge of men of honor. Let us go outside and I will prove it to you."

The Count quickly made for the stairs and left the inn. C. was choking, and I felt no pity for her. But then it occurs to me that if I leave without paying anything people would laugh at the scene I had made and say I had had a share in the swindle. I order the innkeeper to bring me the bill, as I insisted on paying half of it. He goes for it at once, whereupon I am treated to a fresh surprise. Signora C., falling to her knees and weeping, says that if I abandon her she is lost, for she has neither money nor anything to pawn.

"What! Have you not four thousand scudi worth of goods?"

"They have all been taken away. Did you not know it? The bills of exchange which you saw and which we thought were as good as ready money only made the gentlemen laugh; they took back all the lengths of goods we had chosen. Is it possible?"

"The scoundrel foresaw everything, and that is why he got me to come here. But I am ashamed to complain. I did a stupid thing, and I must pay the penalty."

The bill which the innkeeper brought me came to forty zecchini, an enormous amount for three days; but the money he had paid out was included. I instantly realized that my honor demanded that I pay the whole of it, and I fulfilled the obligation on the spot, taking a receipt signed by two witnesses. I gave the innkeeper's nephew two zecchini to forgive me for having mistreated him, and I refused two to C., who sent the innkeeper's wife to ask me for them.

So ended this ugly affair, which taught me a lesson, but one which I should not have needed. Two or three weeks later I learned that Count Trento had packed off the two wretches, with whom I refused to have any further dealings. A month later P. C. was back in prison, the man who had stood surety for him having gone bankrupt. He had the effrontery to send me a long letter asking me to come to see him; but I did not even answer it. I did the same to Signora C., who was reduced to poverty.

I stopped in Padua only to get my ring and to dine with Signor Bragadin, who returned to Venice a few days afterward.

C. C.'s letter, which Laura brought me punctually the next morning, told me nothing new. In my answer I gave her a detailed account of the trick her brother had played on me, and I told her to expect her ring, explaining its secret to her.

So, following the instructions she had given me, at dawn one morning I stationed myself at a place from which I saw her mother enter the church. Kneeling down beside her I said I must speak with her, and she came to the cloister. After trying to console her and assuring her that I would remain constant in my love for her daughter until the day of my death, I asked her if she went to visit her. She answered that she expected to go on Sunday and that she was sorry she could not tell me in what convent she was. I said there was no use in my knowing and that I only begged her to tell her that my heart was hers alone and to give her the ring, which I showed her.

"It is the likeness," I said, "of her patron saint, without whose protection she will never become my wife."

She was to keep it on her finger day and night, and say a Paternoster and an Ave Maria to it every day. I said that I did the same with my patron San Giacomo, reciting a Credo to him every day.

Delighted that she could teach her daughter this new devotion, she took the ring and promised to deliver it to her. I left her, giving her two zecchini which her daughter might be glad to have to satisfy her small needs. She accepted them, at the same time assuring me that she did not lack anything she needed.

In the letter she wrote me the following Wednesday I found the quintessence of true love. She said that as soon as she was alone nothing was quicker than the point of the pin with which she made St. Catherine spring up. She then kissed my portrait a hundred times and did not leave off if someone came in, for she instantly made the cover drop over it. The nuns were all edified by her confidence in the protection of her blessed patron, whose features by some chance, all the convent said, resembled hers. She said that for that reason the nun who taught her French had offered her fifty zecchini for her ring—not for love of the saint, at whom she had laughed when she read her life, but because she looked like her. The two zecchini I had sent her were very precious to her for, since her mother had given them to her publicly, she could use them as she pleased without arousing idle speculation in those who, seeing her spending money, might wonder from where she could have received it. She liked to make "little presents" to her fellow boarders. She said that her mother had praised my Christian piety, and she ended her very long letter by asking me not to tell her any more news of her brother.

For three or four weeks her letters were about nothing but her St. Catherine, which made her shake with fear when it was in the hands of some nun who, being shortsighted, rubbed the enamel. "Where would I be," she wrote me, "if at such a moment the spring worked and the nun suddenly saw a face which certainly does not look like a saint's? Tell me what I should do."

A month after P. C. was put in prison the merchant who had sold him the ring for two hundred zecchini gave me the note, reconciling himself to losing twenty. I sent it to the wretch in his prison, who kept writing me asking for money.

Croce was the talk of Venice. He kept a fine house; he dealt at faro and cleaned out the punters. Foreseeing what would happen sooner or later, I never set foot there; but his wife having given birth to a boy[18] and asking me to stand godfather to him, I went there and stayed for supper. From then on I never set foot in his house again.

CHAPTER I

Croce expelled from Venice. Sgombro. His disgrace and death. Misfortune which befalls my dear C. C. I receive an anonymous letter from a nun and I answer it. Love intrigue.

WHAT BROUGHT my dear partner the order to leave the States of the Republic was not gaming, for the State Inquisitors would have had too much to do if they had tried to purge the State of swindling gamesters. The cause of his exile was something very different and very extraordinary.

A Venetian nobleman of the Gritti[1] family, surnamed Sgombro,[2] fell in love with the man, contrary to nature, and he, either for the fun of it or because it was his taste, did not reject his advances. The great trouble was that they did not conceal their monstrous love. The scandal reached such a point that the wise government was forced to order the young man to live elsewhere.

But soon afterward what happened to Sgombro had even more serious consequences. Having fallen in love with his two sons,[3] he reduced the handsomer of them to needing the services of a surgeon. The poor boy confessed that he had not had the courage to disobey the author of his existence. This submission to paternal affection rightly seemed of a sort which Nature must abhor. The State Inquisitors sent the tyrannical father to the citadel of Cattaro,[4] where he died at the end of the year,[5] poisoned by breathing the air of the place. The deadly effect of its air is so well known to the Tribunal that it sentences no one to breathe it except citizens who have deserved death by committing crimes which policy does not permit to be tried in public.

It was to Cattaro that the Council of Ten[6] some fifteen years ago sent the celebrated advocate Contarini,[7] a Venetian nobleman whose eloquence had given him control over the Great Council [8] and who was about to alter the constitution. He died there at the end of a year. As for his accomplices, it was thought the part of wisdom to punish only the four or five leaders.

This noble Sgombro whom I have mentioned had a charming wife, who, I believe, is still alive. She is Signora Cornelia Gritti,[9] even more celebrated for her wit than for a beauty superior to the ravages of age. Finding herself her own mistress on her husband's death, she laughed at all the men who came forward to persuade her to sacrifice her freedom to them; but having never been a resolute enemy of love she always accepted their homage.

One Monday toward the end of July my valet woke me at daybreak, saying that the woman who came every Wednesday wished to speak with me. Here is the letter which she gave me with a very sad countenance:

"Sunday evening. A misfortune which befell me this morning is making me miserable because I have to hide it from the whole convent. I am losing my blood, I do not know how to stop the flow, and I have very little linen. Laura told me that I need a great deal of it in case the hemorrhage should continue, and I can trust no one. So send me some linen, my only friend. You see that I have had to confide in Laura, who can come to my room at any hour. If the hemorrhage kills me the whole convent will know what I died of; but I think of you; and I tremble. What will you do in your grief? Ah, my dear! What a pity!"

I dress quickly, using the time to think the matter over. I ask Laura what kind of hemorrhage it is, and she says plainly that it is the result of a miscarriage, and that we must act with the greatest secrecy for the sake of the Signorina's reputation. She tells me that she needs only linen and that it will not come to anything. This is what such women always say. I am scarcely dressed before I have another oar put to my gondola, and I go with Laura to the Ghetto,[10] where I buy a Jew's whole stock of sheets and more than two hundred napkins, and after putting them in a bag I go to Murano with her. On the way I write to my dear one in pencil that she must have perfect confidence in Laura and I assure her that I will not leave Murano until her bleeding has stopped. As she got out of the gondola Laura persuaded me that, since I did not wish to be seen, I would do well to hide in her house. She left me in a room on the ground floor littered with rags and in which I saw two beds. After putting all the linen she could under her skirt she went off to the patient, whom she had seen at nightfall the day before. I hoped she would find her out of danger and I could not wait to hear it.

She came back an hour later and told me that, having lost much blood all night, she was in bed and very weak, and that we must commend her to God, for if the hemorrhage did not stop she would succumb within twenty-four hours. When I saw the linen which she took out from under her skirt I very nearly dropped dead. It was sheer butchery. She assures me that there is no fear that the secret will not be kept, but says there is everything to fear for the poor child's life. A strange sort of consolation! But at the moment her stupidity could not make me laugh. She told me that when she had read my note she had smiled and that after kissing it she had said that since I was so near her she was sure she would not die.

I shuddered when the woman showed me a little shapeless lump in among the blood. She said that she was going out to wash everything and that she would come back and go to the convent with linen for the patient when everyone there was at dinner.

"Has she had visitors?"

"Everyone in the convent; but no one has any idea what brought on her illness."

"But with the heat this time of year she can only be using a very light coverlet, and it is impossible that the great mound her napkins must make will not be noticed."

"There is no fear of that, for she is sitting up."

"What does she eat?"

"Nothing. She must not eat."

She then left, and so did I. I went to see a physician named Payton, where I wasted my time and the money I gave him for a long prescription which I did not use. It would have told the whole convent what my angel's trouble was, and the convent physician would himself have made it public, perhaps in revenge. After going home for a few things I needed I returned to my hiding place, where a half hour later I saw Laura looking very sad as she gave me a note in which C. C. wrote me:

"My dear, I have not the strength to write to you. I am still bleeding, and there is no remedy. God disposes; but my honor is safe. My only consolation is knowing that you are here."

Laura terrified me by showing me ten or twelve more napkins soaked with blood. She thought it would comfort me to tell me that a pound of it would soak a hundred napkins; but I was beyond comforting. I was really in despair. Seeing myself the murderer of this innocent girl, I did not feel that I could survive her. Overwhelmed, I stayed in bed for six whole hours, never saying a word until Laura came back from the convent with twenty soaked napkins. It was night, so she could not go back. She had to wait for the next morning. I waited for it too, without sleeping or eating or even letting Laura's daughters undress me, for, though they were pretty, they filled me with loathing. I saw them as the instruments of my horrible incontinence, which had made me the executioner of an angel incarnate.

The sun was appearing above the horizon when Laura entered and dolefully gave me the news that the poor girl was no longer bleeding. She thought she was thus preparing me to hear the news of her death the same day.

"She is exhausted," she said, "she has only just strength enough to keep her eyes open, she looks as if she were made of wax, her pulse is almost too weak to feel."

"But my dear Laura, this news is not bad. She must have something to eat now."

"The physician has been sent for. It is he who will prescribe what is to be given her; but to tell you the truth I have no hope. As you can imagine, she will not tell the physician the truth, so God knows what he will prescribe for her. I whispered to her not to take anything, and she understood."

"If she does not die of inanition before tomorrow I am sure she will live, and her physician will have been Nature."

"God grant it! I will go back to see her at noon."

"Why not sooner?"

"Because her room will be full of people."

Needing to hope, I thought of sustaining my own life, I ordered a meal prepared, and in the meanwhile I began a letter to C. C. against the time when she would be strong enough to read it. Moments of repentance are very gloomy. I was to be pitied. I badly needed to see Laura again to learn what the physician's oracle had been. I had good reason to laugh at all oracles; nevertheless I was badly in need of this physician's, and above all of hearing that it was favorable.

Laura's daughters brought me a dinner, but I could swallow nothing. They amused me by eating it all themselves with ravenous appetites. Her eldest daughter, the showpiece, never looked at me. I thought the two younger ones were free and easy; but I examined them only to feed my painful repentance.

Laura came at last and told me that the patient was still in the same state of inanition, that her extreme weakness had greatly surprised the physician, who did not know to what to attribute it. He had prescribed cordials and light broths, and he had prognosticated that she would recover her health if she could sleep. When he ordered a night nurse for her the patient had given Laura her hand; so she promised me she would not leave her again. Her mother had gone to see her, and I was glad to hear it. I saw very well that if she could sleep she would recover, so I longed for morning. I gave Laura six zecchini and her daughters one apiece, and ate some fish for supper. I also went to bed undressed, despite the badness of the bed. When Laura's daughters saw me in bed they undressed without further ado and lay down in another, which was beside mine. Their confidence pleased me. The eldest sister must have known what was what. She went off to bed in another room, for she had a lover who was to marry her in the fall.

Very early the next morning Laura came in looking cheerful and told me that the patient had slept well and that she was going back to the convent to take her a dish of soup. However, it was too soon to cry victory, for she still needed to regain her strength and replace the blood she had lost. I now felt sure that she would recover her health; and so she did. But I stayed there another week, unable to make up my mind to go until C. C. practically ordered me to do so in a four-page letter. When I left, Laura wept for joy on finding herself rewarded by nearly all the fine linen I had bought for her for the patient, and her two younger daughters cried too, apparently because they had not managed to persuade me to give them at least a kiss during the ten days I spent in their house.

In Venice I returned to my old occupations; but without a real and satisfying love affair I could not be happy. The only pleasure I had was receiving every Wednesday a letter from my little wife, who encouraged me to wait instead of begging me to carry her off. Laura assured me that she had become more beautiful. I was dying to see her.

It was at the end of August that, Laura having told me of a profession[11] which had the whole convent in turmoil, I decided to give myself the pleasure of seeing my beautiful angel. Since the visiting rooms were sure to be full of people and the nuns would be receiving visitors at the convent gate, it was likely that the boarders would appear and that C. C. would be there too. There was no reason to fear that I would be noticed more than anyone else on a day when there would be a crowd of strangers. So I went, having neither said anything to Laura nor announced my visit to C. C. in my last letter.

I thought I should die with pleasure when I saw her four paces from me, staring at me in her surprise at seeing me there. I thought she was taller and more developed, that her face was even more beautiful, which I had considered impossible. I had eyes only for her, and I did not go back to Venice until the gate was closed.

But the letter which she wrote me three days later described her pleasure at seeing me too vividly for me not to try to think of some way of giving it to her often. I answered immediately that she would see me at mass at her church on every feast day; and I began at once. It cost me nothing. I did not see her; but as I knew that she saw me, her pleasure was enough to make mine complete. I had nothing to fear, for it was almost impossible that I should be recognized in a church to which no one went except the plain citizens of Murano and their womenfolk. After hearing one or two masses I got into a traghetto gondola,[12] whose gondolier could have no possible interest in knowing who I was. However, I remained on my guard. Knowing that her father's intention was to make C. C. forget me, I was sure that if he learned that I still put in an appearance he would confine her to another convent where I could have no contact with her.

Thus did I reason, but I was not well enough acquainted with the character of nuns or their peculiar kind of curiosity. Moreover it did not occur to me that, my person being noticeable and they seeing that I assiduously frequented their church, they would all conclude together that there must be some reason for it and would do their best to find it out.

After five or six feast days C. C. wrote me jocosely that I had become the puzzle of the entire convent, both nuns and boarders. The whole choir looked for me on the minute; they told one another when they saw me come in and take holy water; and it was observed that I never looked at the grating behind which all the recluses must be nor at any woman or girl who entered or left the church. The old nuns said that I must have some sorrow from which my only hope of being relieved was the protection of their Holy Virgin, in whom it was clear that I must have perfect trust; and the young ones said that I must be suffering from melancholia, a misanthrope who shunned the great world. My dear wife's writing me all this amused me. I wrote her that if she feared I might be recognized I would stop going, and she answered that she would be very sad if she were deprived of the pleasure of seeing me, which was her only happiness. Having learned of this general curiosity, however, I no longer dared to go to Laura's house. I was growing thin, I was wearing myself out; I could not long survive this sort of life. I was born to have a mistress and to live happily with her. Not knowing what to do, I gambled and I won nearly every day, yet for all that I was bored. After the five thousand zecchini I had won in Padua through the lucky hands of my partner I had followed Signor Bragadin's advice. I rented a casino,[13] where I dealt at faro on half shares with a magnate who protected me against the frauds of certain tyrannical aristocrats in competition with whom a mere private citizen is always in the wrong in my charming country.

On All Saints' Day, just as I was about to get into my gondola to return to Venice after hearing mass, I met a woman of the same type as Laura, who, after letting a letter drop at my feet, walked on. I pick it up and I see the same woman, satisfied that she had seen me do so, pursue her way. The letter was white and sealed with wax the color of aventurine.[14] The imprint represented a running knot. No sooner have I entered the gondola than I unseal it and read the following:

"A nun who has seen you in her church every feast day for the past two and a half months wishes you to make her acquaintance. A pamphlet which you lost and which has come into her hands assures her that you understand French. However, you may answer her in Italian, for she desires clarity and precision. She does not invite you to have her summoned to the visiting room, because before you obligate yourself to speak with her she wishes you to see her. So she will give you the name of a lady whom you can accompany to the visiting room, who will not know you, and hence will not be compelled to introduce you if by any chance you do not wish to be known.

"If this seems to you unsuitable, the same nun who writes you this letter will give you the address of a casino here in Murano where you will find her alone at the first hour of the night on the day you indicate to her; you can stay and sup with her, or leave a quarter of an hour later if you have business.

"Would you prefer to offer her supper in Venice? Let her know the day, the hour of the night, and the place to which she is to go, and you will see her leave a gondola masked, provided you are on the quay alone, without a servant, masked, and holding a candle.

"Being certain that you will answer me, and as impatient as you can imagine to read your answer, I beg you to deliver it tomorrow to the same woman who brought you this letter. You will find her an hour before noon in the Church of San Canziano[15] at the first altar on the right.

"Consider that if I had not supposed you to be well disposed and honorable, I should never have resolved to take a step which might give you an unfavorable opinion of me."

The tone of this letter, which I copy word for word, surprised me even more than its contents. I had business, but I dismissed everything to shut myself in my room and answer. Making such a request was sheer madness, yet I found a dignity in it which forced me to respect her. I was at first inclined to believe that the nun might be the one who was teaching C. C. French and who was beautiful, rich, and a flirt, and that my dear wife might have been indiscreet yet know nothing about this unheard-of step on her friend's part, and for that reason had been unable to notify me of it. But I dismissed the suspicion precisely because it pleased me. C. C. had written me that the nun who taught her French was not the only one who had a good command of the language. I could not doubt C. C.'s discretion and the candor with which she would have confessed it to me if she had confided anything at all to the nun. However, since the nun who had written me might be C. C.'s beautiful friend or might be someone else, I wrote her an answer in which I straddled the ditch as far as good manners permitted me to do so; here it is:

"I hope, Madame, that my answer in French will detract nothing from the clarity and precision which you demand and of which you set me an example.

"The subject is most interesting; it seems to me of the greatest moment under the circumstances, and obliged to give an answer without knowing to whom, do you not understand, Madame, that, not being a conceited fool, I must fear a snare? It is honor which obliges me to be on my guard. If it is true, then, that the pen which writes to me is that of a respectable lady who does me the justice to suppose me possessed of a soul as noble and a heart as well disposed as her own, she will find, I hope, that I can answer her only in the following terms:

"If you have thought me worthy, Madame, of making your acquaintance personally, your opinion of me being based only on my appearance, I consider it my duty to obey you if only to disabuse you should I by chance have involuntarily led you into error.

"Of the three arrangements which you have been so generous as to propose to me, I dare choose only the first, on the conditions which your very clear foresight has stipulated. I shall accompany to your visiting room a lady whom you will name to me and who will not know me. Hence there will be no question of introducing me. Be indulgent, Madame, to the specious reasons which oblige me not to name myself. In exchange, I promise you on my honor that your name will become known to me only that I may do you homage. If you see fit to speak to me I will answer you only with the most profound respect. Permit me to hope that you will be alone at the grating and to tell you for form's sake that I am a Venetian and free in the fullest sense of the word. The only reason which prevents me from deciding on the two other arrangements which you propose to me and which do me infinite honor is, permit me to repeat, my fear of being trapped. Those happy meetings can take place as soon as you have become better acquainted with me and no doubts trouble my soul, which abhors falsehood. Very impatient in my turn, I will go tomorrow at the same hour to San Canziano to receive your answer."

Having found the woman at the appointed place, I gave her my letter and a zecchino. The next morning I returned there and she came up to me. After giving me back my zecchino she handed me the following answer, asking me to go and read it and to come back afterward to tell her if she should wait for an answer. After reading it I went and told her that I had no answer to give her. This is what the nun's letter to me said:

"I believe, Monsieur, that I have been mistaken in nothing. Like yourself, I abhor falsehood when it can have consequences; but I consider it only a trifle when it harms no one. Of my three proposals you have chosen the one which does most honor to your perception. Respecting the reasons you may have for concealing your name, I write the Countess S.[16] what I ask you to read in the note herewith. You will seal it before having it delivered to her. She will be forewarned of it by another note. You will go to her house at your convenience; she will appoint an hour and you will accompany her here in her own gondola. She will not interrogate you, and you need give her no explanations. There will be no question of an introduction; but since you will learn my name, it will rest with you to come to see me masked whenever you wish, asking for me in the name of the same Countess. Thus we shall become acquainted without your being obliged to sacrifice any of the evening hours which may be precious to you. I have ordered the woman who brings this to wait for your answer in case you should be known to the Countess and hence unwilling to make this use of her. If my choice is agreeable to you tell the woman that you have no answer to send; whereupon she will take my note to the Countess. You may take the other to her at your convenience."

I told the woman that I had no answer to send when I was certain that I was not known to the Countess, whose name I had never heard. Here is the wording of the note I was to deliver to her:

"I beg you, my dear friend, to come and speak with me when you have time, and to name your hour to the masker who brings you this note so that he can accompany you. He will be punctual. You will greatly oblige your loving friend."

The address was to the Countess S., Riva del Rio Marin.[17] I thought the note a masterpiece of the spirit of intrigue. There was something lofty in this way of proceeding. I was made to play the role of a person who was being granted a favor. I saw it all clearly.

In her last letter the nun, showing no interest in who I was, approved my choice and tried to appear indifferent to nocturnal meetings; but she expected, and even seemed certain, that I would come and have her called to the visiting room after I had seen her. Her certainty increased my curiosity. She had reason to hope that I would do it if she was young and pretty. It was perfectly possible for me to delay for three or four days and find out from C. C. who the nun might be; but aside from its being an underhanded action, I was afraid I should spoil my chances and be sorry. She told me to call on the Countess at my convenience; her dignity demanded that she should not seem eager; but she knew that I must be so. She seemed too much at home in intrigue for me to believe her a novice and inexperienced; I feared I would repent of having wasted my time; and I prepared to laugh if I found I was with some old woman. In short, it is certain that I would not have gone had I not felt curious to see what sort of face a woman of this kind would put upon a meeting with me after she had offered to come to supper with me in Venice. Then, too, I was much surprised at the great freedom enjoyed by these holy virgins, who could so easily violate their rule of enclosure.

At three in the afternoon I sent a note in to the Countess S. She came out a minute later from the room in which she was entertaining guests and said that she would be glad if I would call at her house the next day at the same hour; and after dropping me a fine curtsy she withdrew. She was a domineering woman, beginning to fade a little but still beautiful.

The next morning, which was a Sunday, I went to mass at my usual hour, in my finest clothes and with my hair elegantly dressed, and already unfaithful in imagination to my dear C. C., for I was more concerned with displaying myself to the nun, be she young or old, than to her.

After dinner I mask and at the appointed hour go to call on the Countess, who was waiting for me. We go down, get into a commodious two-oared gondola, we arrive at the convent of the XXX[18] without having talked of anything but the beautiful autumn we were enjoying. She asks to see M. M.[19] The name astonishes me, for the bearer of it was celebrated. We go into a small visiting room, and five minutes later I see M. M. appear, go straight to the grating, open four square sections of it by pressing a spring, embrace her friend, then close the ingenious window again. The four sections made an opening eighteen inches square. Any man of my stature could have passed through it. The Countess sat down facing the nun and I on the other side in a position from which I could examine this rare beauty of twenty-two or twenty-three years at my ease. I decide at once that she must be the same nun whom C. C. had praised to me, the one who loved her dearly and was teaching her French.

Very nearly beside myself with admiration, I heard nothing of what they said. As for me, not only did the nun not once speak to me, she did not condescend to give me a single look. She was a perfect beauty, tall, so white of complexion as to verge on pallor, with an air of nobility and decision but at the same time of reserve and shyness, large blue eyes; a sweet, smiling face, beautiful lips damp with dew, which allowed a glimpse of two magnificent rows of teeth; her nun's habit did not let me see any hair; but whether she had it or not, its color must be light chestnut; her eyebrows told me as much; but what I found admirable and surprising were her hand and forearm, which I saw to the elbow: it was impossible to see anything more perfect. No veins were visible, and instead of muscles I saw only dimples. Despite all this I did not regret having refused the two meetings over a supper which the divine beauty had offered me. Sure that I should possess her in a few days, I enjoyed the pleasure of paying her the tribute of desiring her. I could not wait to be alone with her at the grating, and I thought I should have committed the worst of offenses if I had waited any longer than the next day to assure her that I had accorded her qualities all the justice they deserved. She continued not to look at me; but in the end it pleased me.

Suddenly the two ladies lowered their voices and put their heads together; as this indicated that I was one too many, I slowly walked away from the grating and looked at a painting. A quarter of an hour later they bade each other good-by, after embracing at the movable window. The nun turned away without giving me an opportunity even to bow to her. On the way back to Venice the Countess, perhaps tiring of my silence, remarked with a smile:

"M. M. is beautiful, but her mind is even more extraordinary."

"I have seen the one and I believe the other."

"She did not say a word to you."

"Since I did not wish to be introduced to her, she wished to ignore my being there. It was her way of punishing me.''

The Countess having made no reply, we arrived at her house without opening our mouths again. I left her at her door, because it was there that she dropped me the fine curtsy which means, ''Thank you. Good-by.'' I went elsewhere to muse over the strange adventure, whose inevitable consequences I was eager to see.

CHAPTER II

Countess Coronini. Wounded feelings. Reconciliation. First meeting. Philosophical digression.

SHE HAD not spoken to me, and I was glad of it. I was so overwhelmed that I might not have answered anything worth saying. I saw that she had no need to fear the humiliation of a refusal; yet it takes great courage in such a woman to run the risk of it. So much boldness at her age surprised me and I was at a loss to understand so much freedom. A casino at Murano! Able to go to Venice! I decided that she must have an acknowledged lover who was happy to make her happy. The idea set bounds to my sense of triumph. I saw that I was on the verge of becoming unfaithful to C. C.; but I did not feel restrained by any scruple. I thought that an infidelity of this kind, even if she were to discover it, could not offend her, because it would only be meant to keep me alive and so to preserve me for her.

The next morning I went to call on Countess Coronini,[1] who chose to live in the convent of Santa Giustina.[2] She was an old woman with a long experience of all the courts of Europe and who had made a reputation by taking a hand in their affairs. The desire for repose which follows disgust had made her choose the convent as her retreat. I had been introduced to her by a nun who was a relative of Signor Dandolo. This former beauty, finding that she no longer wished to exercise her considerable intelligence in the machinations of royal self-interest, kept it entertained with the frivolous gossip with which the city in which she lived supplied her. She knew everything and, as was only to be expected, always wanted to know more. She received all the ambassadors at her grating, and in consequence every foreigner was introduced to her, and several grave Senators from time to time paid her long visits. Curiosity was always the mainspring of these visits on either side; but it was concealed under the veil of the interest which the nobility may be expected to take in whatever is going on. In short, Signora Coronini knew everything and took pleasure in giving me very entertaining lessons in morals when I went to see her. As I was to call on M. M. in the afternoon I thought that I should succeed in learning something about the nun from the well-informed Countess.

As I found it perfectly easy, after some other subjects, to bring the conversation around to that of the convents in Venice, we were soon discussing the intelligence and reputation of a nun of the Celsi[3] family, who, though ugly, exercised great influence in whatever quarter she pleased. We then spoke of the young and charming nun of the Micheli family[4] who had taken the veil to prove to her mother that she was the more intelligent of the two. Speaking of several other beauties who were said to indulge in love affairs, I named M. M. and said that she must be of the same stamp, but that she was an enigma. The Countess smiled and answered that she was not an enigma to everybody but that she must be so to people in general.

"But what really is an enigma," she added, "is her suddenly having taken the veil when she is rich, highly intelligent, very cultivated, and, so far as I know, a freethinker. She became a nun for no reason, either physical or moral. It was sheer caprice."

"Do you think she is happy, Signora?"

"Yes, if she has not repented and if repentance does not overtake her—which, if she is wise, she will keep to herself."

Convinced by the Countess's mysterious tone that M. M. must have a lover, but resolved not to let it trouble me, I mask after dining without appetite, I go to Murano, I ring at the gate, and, with my heart racing, I ask for M. M. in the name of Countess S. The small visiting room was closed. I am shown the one I am to enter. I take off my mask, put it on my hat, and sit down to wait for the goddess. She was long in coming, but instead of making me impatient the wait pleased me; I feared the moment of our interview and even its effect. But an hour having gone by very quickly, such a delay seemed to me unnatural. Surely she had not been informed. I rise, resuming my mask, go back to the gate, and ask if I have been announced to Mother M. M. A voice answers yes, and that I had only to wait. I returned to my chair, a little thoughtful, and a few minutes later I see a hideous lay sister, who says:

"Mother M. M. is occupied the whole day."

The words were scarcely spoken before she was gone.

Such are the terrible moments to which a pursuer of women is exposed; there is nothing more cruel. They degrade, they distress, they kill. In my revulsion and humiliation, my first feeling was contempt for myself, a dark contempt which approached the limits of horror. The second was disdainful indignation toward the nun, on whom I passed the judgment she appeared to deserve. She was mad, a wretched creature, shameless. My only consolation was to think her such. She could not have acted toward me as she had done unless she was the most impudent of women, the most lacking in common sense; for her two letters, which were in my possession, were enough to dishonor her if I wanted to avenge myself, and what she had done cried for vengeance. She could only defy it if she was more than mad; her behavior was that of a raving maniac. I would already have thought her out of her mind, if I had not heard her talk rationally with the Countess.

Yet in the tumult which shame and anger aroused in my soul affixa humo ("fastened to the earth")[5] I was encouraged by discerning lucid intervals. I saw clearly, laughing at myself, that if the nun's beauty and stately bearing had not dazzled me and made me fall in love, and if a certain amount of prejudice had not entered in as well, the whole thing would not amount to much. I saw that I could pretend to laugh at it, and that no one would be able to guess that I was only pretending.

Aware, despite all this, that I had been insulted, I saw that I must take my revenge, but that there must be nothing base in it; and no less aware that I must not give her the least opportunity to crow over having played a practical joke on me, I saw that I must not show any vexation. She had sent me word that she was engaged, and that was all. I must pretend indifference. Another time she would not be engaged; but I defied her to trap me another time. I thought I ought to convince her that her behavior had only made me laugh. I must, of course, send her back the originals of her letters, but enclosed in a short and sufficient one from me. What greatly annoyed me was that I must certainly stop going to mass at her church, for since she had no idea that I went there for C. C., she might have supposed that I would be going only in the hope that she would make some apology and would again offer me the opportunities to meet her which I had rejected. I wanted her to be certain that I scorned her. For a moment I believed that the meetings she had proposed were merely figments to deceive me.

I fell asleep about midnight with this plan in mind, and on waking in the morning I found it ripe. I wrote a letter and after writing it I put it aside for another twenty-four hours to see if, when I read it over, it would show even a trace of the wounded feelings which were tormenting me.

I did well, for when I read it over the next morning I thought it unworthy of me. I quickly tore it up. There were expressions in it which revealed that I was weak, pusillanimous, and in love, and so would have made her laugh. There were others which betrayed anger, and others which showed that I was sorry to have lost all hope of possessing her.

The next day I wrote her another, after writing to C. C. that serious reasons forced me to stop going to hear mass at her church. But the next morning I thought my letter laughable, and I tore it up. It seemed to me that I had lost my ability to write, and I did not realize the reason for my difficulty until ten days after she had insulted me. I had one.

M. M.'s face had made an impression on me which could not be effaced by the greatest and most powerful of abstract beings—by Time.

In my ridiculous situation I was tempted again and again to go and tell my troubles to Countess S.; but—thank God!—I never went any farther than her door. The thought coming to me at last that the harebrained nun must be living in terror because of her letters, with which I could ruin her reputation and do the greatest harm to the convent, I resolved to send them to her with a note in the following terms. But it was not until ten or twelve days after the incident.

"I beg you to believe, Madame, that it was by an oversight that I did not immediately send you your two letters, which you will find herewith. I have never thought of departing from what I am by taking a base revenge. I am obliged to forgive you for two pieces of folly, whether you committed them naturally and unthinkingly or to mock me; but I advise you not to act in the same manner toward some other man in the future, for not everyone is like me. I know your name; but I assure you it is as if I did not know it. I tell you this though it is possible that you care nothing for my discretion; but if that is the case I am sorry for you.

"You will no longer see me in your church, Madame, and it will cost me nothing, for I will go to another; yet I think it proper that I should tell you the reason. I consider it likely that you have committed the third folly of boasting of your exploit to some of your friends, and so I am ashamed to put in an appearance. Forgive me if despite my being, as I suppose, five or six years older than you, I have not yet trampled upon all prejudices; believe me, Madame, there are some which should never be shaken off. Do not take it amiss if I give you this little lesson, after the only too substantial one which you apparently gave me only in mockery. Be certain that I will profit by it all the rest of my life."

I felt that my letter was the gentlest treatment I could give the giddy nun. I went out and, calling aside a Friulian,[7] who could not recognize me under my mask, I gave him my letter, which contained the two others, and gave him forty soldi to take it at once to its address in Murano, promising him another forty when he should come back to tell me he had faithfully done his errand. The instructions I gave him were that he should deliver the packet to the portress, then leave without waiting for an answer even if the portress told him to wait. But it would have been a mistake on my part to wait for him. In our city the Friulians are as reliable and trustworthy as the Savoyards[8] were in Paris ten years ago.

Five or six days later, as I was coming out of the opera, I see the same Friulian carrying his lantern. I call him and, not taking off my mask, ask him if he knows me; after looking at me attentively he says he does not. I ask him if he had done the errand in Murano on which I sent him.

"Ah, Signore! God be praised! Since it is you I have something urgent to tell you. I took your letter as you ordered me to, and after delivering it to the portress I left despite her telling me to wait. When I got back I did not find you, but what of it? The next morning a Friulian of my acquaintance, who was at the gate when I delivered your letter, came and woke me to tell me I must go to Murano, because the portress insisted on talking to me. I went, and after making me wait for a time she told me to go into the visiting room, where a nun wished to speak with me. The nun, who was as beautiful as the morning star, kept me for an hour and more, asking me countless questions all directed to learning, if not who you are, at least some way of my discovering where I could find you; but it was all to no avail since I knew nothing about you.

"She left, ordering me to wait, and two hours later she reappeared with a letter. She gave it to me and said that if I could manage to deliver it to you and bring her the answer she would give me two zecchini; but that if I did not find you I should go to Murano every day and show her her letter, promising me forty soldi for each trip I made. Up to now I have earned twenty lire; but I am afraid she will get tired of it. You have only to answer her letter and I will earn the two zecchini."[9]

"Where is it?"

"Locked up where I live, for I am always afraid of losing it."

"Then how am I to answer it?"

"Wait for me here. You will see me back with the letter in a quarter of an hour."

"I will not wait for you, for I have no interest in answering it; but tell me how you persuaded the nun to believe that you could find me. You are a rascal. It is not likely that she would have entrusted her letter to you if you had not given her reason to expect you to find me."

"That is so. I described your coat to her, and your buckles, and your height. I assure you that for the last ten days I have looked carefully at every masker of your height, but in vain. It is your buckles there that I recognized; but I should not have recognized you by your coat. Alas, Signore! It will cost you nothing to answer only a line. Wait for me in that coffeehouse."

Unable any longer to overcome my curiosity, I decide not to wait for him but to go with him to his lodging. I did not think I was obliged to answer more than: "I have received your letter. Farewell." The next morning I would have changed buckles and sold the coat. So I go to his door with the Friulian, he goes for the letter, hands it to me, and I take him with me to an inn where, to read the letter at leisure, I engage a room, have a fire lighted, and tell him to wait for me outside. I unseal the packet, and the first thing which surprises me is the two letters she had written me and which I had thought I should return to her to set her heart at rest. At the sight I am seized by a palpitation which already heralds my defeat. Besides the two letters I see a short one signed "S." It was addressed to "M. M." I read it, and I find:

"The masker who escorted me to the convent and home again would never have opened his lips to say a word to me if I had not taken it into my head to tell him that the charms of your mind are even more winning than those of your face. He answered that he wished to become acquainted with the former and that he was certain of the latter. I added that I did not understand why you had not spoken to him; and he answered with a smile that you wanted to punish him and that since he had not wished to be introduced to you, you in your turn wished to ignore his presence. I wanted to send you this note this morning; but I could not. Farewell. S. F.''

After reading the Countess's note, which neither added nor subtracted an iota from the truth, and which might be a piece of evidence for the defense, my heart beat less violently. Delighted to discover that I am on the verge of being convinced that I was wrong, I pluck up my courage, and this is what I find in the letter from M. M.:

''From a weakness which I consider thoroughly excusable, curious to know what you might have found to say about me to the Countess on your way to visit me and when you took her back home, I seized the moment when you were walking up and down in the visiting room to ask her to inform me. I told her to send me word at once, or at latest the next morning, for I foresaw that in the afternoon you would certainly come to pay me a duty call. Her note, which I send you and which I ask you to read, reached me a half hour after you were sent away. First fatal mishap. Not having received her letter when you asked to see me, I did not have the courage to receive you. Second fatal weakness, for which I can easily be forgiven. I ordered the lay sister to tell you that I was 'ill the whole day.' A perfectly legitimate excuse whether it is true or false, for it is a polite lie in which the words 'the whole day' convey all. You had already left and I could not send someone running after you when the idiotic old woman came and reported to me what she had told you, not that I was 'ill,' but that I was 'occupied.' Third fatal mishap. You cannot imagine what I wanted to say, and to do, to the lay sister in my righteous anger; but here one can neither do nor say anything. One can only be patient, dissimulate, and thank God when mistakes arise from ignorance rather than from malice. I at once foresaw in part what did indeed happen, for human reason could never have foreseen it all. I guessed that, believing you had been duped, you would be disgusted, and I felt the blackest misery since I saw no way to let you know the truth until the feast day. I was certain that you would come to our church. Who could have guessed that you would take the thing with the extraordinary violence which your letter set before my eyes? When I did not see you appear in church my grief began to be unbearable, for it was mortal, but it drove me to despair and pierced my heart when I read, ten days after the event, the cruel, barbarous, unjust letter which you wrote me. It made me wretched, and I will die of it unless you come to justify yourself immediately. You thought you had been duped—that is all you can say, and you are now convinced that you were mistaken. But even believing that you were duped, you must admit that to take the course you did and to write me the terrible letter you sent me, you must imagine me a monster not to be found among women who, like myself, are well born and have been well brought up. I send you back the two letters which you sent back to me to soothe my fears. Know that I am a better physiognomist than you are, and that what I did I did not do out of 'folly.' I have never thought you capable of a base action, even if you were certain that I had brazenly duped you; but in my countenance you have seen only the soul of shamelessness. You will perhaps be the cause of my death, or at least you will make me wretched for all the rest of my life, if you do not wish to justify yourself; since, for my part, I believe I am justified completely.

"Consider that, even if my life is of no concern to you, your honor demands that you come to talk with me at once. You must come in person to recant all that you have written me. If you do not realize the terrible effect your infernal letter must have on the soul of an innocent woman, and one who is not out of her mind, permit me to feel sorry for you. You would not have the slightest knowledge of the human heart. But I am sure you will come, if the man to whom I am entrusting this letter finds you. M. M."

I did not need to read her letter twice to be in despair. M. M. was right. I at once masked to go out of the room and speak to the Friulian. I asked him if he had spoken with her that morning and if she looked ill. He replied that he thought she looked more dejected every day. I went back, telling him to wait.

I did not finish writing to her until daybreak. Here, word for word, is the letter which I wrote to the noblest of all women, whom, drawing the wrong conclusion, I had most cruelly insulted.

"I am guilty, Madame, and as unable to justify myself as I am completely convinced of your innocence. I cannot live except in the hope of your forgiveness, and you will grant it to me when you reflect upon what made me commit my crime. I saw you, you dazzled me, and, thinking of my honor,[10] it seemed to me chimerical; I thought I was dreaming. I saw that I could not be rid of my doubt until twenty-four hours later, and God alone knows how long they seemed to me. They passed at last, and my heart palpitated when I was in the visiting room counting the minutes. At the end of sixty—which, however, as the result of a kind of impatience entirely new to me, went by very quickly—I see an ill-omened figure which, with odious brevity, tells me that you are 'occupied' for the whole day; then it makes off. Imagine the rest! Alas, it was nothing short of a thunderbolt, which did not kill me and did not leave me alive. Dare I tell you, Madame, that if you had sent me, even by the hands of the same lay sister, two lines traced by your pen, you would have sent me away if not satisfied at least unperturbed. This is the fatal mishap, which you forgot to cite to me in your charming and most powerful justification. The effect of the thunderbolt was the fatal one which made me see myself as duped, mocked. It revolted me, my self-esteem cried out, dark shame overwhelmed me. I loathe myself and am forced to believe that under the countenance of an angel you fostered a fiendish soul. I leave in consternation, and in the course of eleven days I lose my common sense. I wrote you the letter of which you are a thousand times justified in complaining; but —can you believe it?—I thought it courteous. It is all over now. You will see me at your feet an hour before noon. I shall not go to bed. You shall pardon me, Madame, or I will avenge you. Yes, I myself will be your avenger. The only thing I ask of you, as a great favor, is that you will burn my letter or say nothing about it tomorrow. I sent it to you only after having written you four which I tore up after reading them, because I found expressions in them from which I feared you would read the passion which you have inspired in me. A lady who had duped me was not worthy of my love, were she an angel. I was not wrong but . . . wretched! Could I believe you capable of it after I had seen you? I will now lie down for three or four hours. My tears will flood my pillow. I order the bearer to go to your convent at once, so that I may be sure you will receive this letter when you wake. He would never have found me if I had not approached him as I left the opera. I shall have no more need of him. Do not answer me."

After sealing my letter I gave it to him, ordering him to go to the convent gate and to deliver it only into the hands of the nun. He promised to do so, I gave him a zecchino, and he set off. After spending six hours in impatience I masked and went to Murano, where M. M. came down as soon as I was announced. I had been shown into the small visiting room in which I had seen her with the Countess. I went down on my knees before her; but she hurriedly told me to get up, for I could be seen. Her face was instantly suffused by a fiery blush. She sat down, I sat down before her; and so we spent a good quarter of an hour looking at each other. I finally broke the silence by asking her if I could count on being forgiven, and she put her beautiful hand out through the grating; I bathed it with my tears and kissed it a hundred times. She said that our acquaintance having begun with such a fierce storm should make us hope for an eternal calm.

"It is the first time," she said, "that we are talking together; but what has happened to us is enough for us to believe that we know each other perfectly. I hope that our friendship will be equally tender and sincere, and that we can be indulgent toward each other's failings."

"When may I convince you of my feelings, Signora, outside these walls and in all the joy of my soul?"

"We will sup at my casino whenever you please—I need only know two days in advance—or with you in Venice, if that is not inconvenient for you."

"It would only increase my happiness; I must tell you that I am in easy circumstances and that, far from fearing to spend money I delight in it and that all I have belongs to the object I adore."

"I welcome both the fact and the confidence. I, too, can tell you that I am tolerably rich and that I feel I could refuse nothing to my lover."

"But you must have one."

"Yes, I have; and it is he who makes me rich and who is completely my master. For this reason I never leave him in ignorance of anything. Day after tomorrow at my casino you shall know more."

"But I hope that your lover—"

"Will not be there? You may be sure he will not. And have you a mistress?"

"Alas! I had one, but she has been torn from me. For six months I have lived in perfect celibacy."

"But you still love her."

"I cannot remember her without loving her; but I foresee that the seduction of your charms will make me forget her."

"If you were happy I am sorry for you. She was torn from you; and you have been consumed with grief, shunning society—I divined it. But if it falls out that I take her place, no one, my dear friend, shall tear me from your heart."

"But what will your lover say?"

"He will be delighted to see me in love and happy with a lover like you. Such is his nature."

"Admirable nature! Heroism beyond my strength."

"What sort of life do you lead in Venice?"

"Theaters, society, casinos, where I defy Fortune and find her sometimes kind and sometimes not."

"At the houses of foreign ambassadors too?"

"No, because I am too closely connected with certain patricians; but I know them all."

"How can you know them if you do not see them?"

"I met them in foreign countries. In Parma I knew the Duke of Montealegre,[11] the Spanish Ambassador; in Vienna Count Rosenberg;[12] in Paris the French Ambassador,[13] about two years ago."

"My dear friend, I advise you to leave, for it is about to strike noon. Come day after tomorrow at the same hour, and I will give you the necessary instructions so that you can sup with me."

"Alone?"

"Of course."

"Dare I ask you for a pledge? For this good fortune is so great."

"What pledge do you wish?"

"To see you stand at the small window, with myself in the place where Countess S. was."

She rose and with the most gracious smile pressed the spring, and after a kiss whose harshness must have pleased her as much as its sweetness, I left her. She followed me to the door with her amorous eyes.

Joy and impatience absolutely prevented me from eating and sleeping during the whole two days. It seemed to me that I had never been so happy in love and that I was to be so for the first time. In addition to M. M.'s birth, her beauty, and her intelligence, which together constituted her true worth, bias entered in to make the extent of my happiness incomprehensible. She was a vestal.[14] I was to taste a forbidden fruit. I was to infringe on the rights of an omnipotent husband, snatching from his seraglio the most beautiful of his sultanas.

If at the time my reason had not been enslaved I should have seen very well that my nun could not be essentially different from all the pretty women I had loved in the thirteen years I had been skirmishing on the fields of love; but what man in love dwells on such a thought? If it comes into his mind he rejects it with disdain. M. M. must be absolutely different from all the women in the universe and more beautiful.

Animal nature, which chemists call the "animal kingdom," instinctively secures the three means necessary to perpetuate itself. They are three real needs. It must feed itself, and in order that doing so shall not be a labor, it has the sensation called "appetite"; and it finds pleasure in satisfying it. In the second place it must preserve its own species by generation, and certainly it would not perform that duty—despite what St. Augustine[15] says—if it did not find pleasure in doing it. In the third place it has an unconquerable inclination to destroy its enemy; and nothing is better contrived, for since it must preserve itself it must hate whatever achieves or desires its destruction. Under this general law, however, each species acts independently. These three sensations—hunger, appetite for coitus, hate which tends to destroy the enemy—are habitual satisfactions in brute beasts, let us not call them pleasures; they can only be such comparatively speaking; for they do not reason about them. Man alone is capable of true pleasure, for, endowed with the faculty of reason, he foresees it, seeks it, creates it, and reasons about it after enjoying it. My dear reader, I beg you to follow me; if you drop me at this point, you are not polite. Let us examine the thing. Man is in the same condition as the beasts when he yields to these three instincts without his reason entering in. When our mind makes its contribution, these three satisfactions become pleasure, pleasure, pleasure: the inexplicable sensation which makes us taste what we call happiness, which we cannot explain either, although we feel it.

The voluptuary who reasons disdains greediness, lust, and the brutal vengeance which springs from a first impulse of anger; he is an epicure; he falls in love but he does not wish to enjoy the object he loves unless he is sure that he is loved; when he is insulted, he will not avenge himself until he has coldly arrived at the best way to relish the pleasure of his revenge. In the result he is more cruel, but he consoles himself by the knowledge that he is at least reasonable. These three operations are the work of the soul, which, to procure itself pleasure, becomes the minister of the passions quae nisi parent imperant ("which, if they do not obey, command").[16] We bear hunger in order to savor culinary concoctions better; we put off the pleasure of love in order to make it more intense; and we defer a vengeance in order to make it more deadly. Yet it is true that people often die of indigestion, that we deceive ourselves or allow ourselves to be deceived in love by sophisms, and that the object we wish to exterminate often escapes our vengeance; but we run these risks willingly.

CHAPTER III

Continuation of the preceding chapter. First assignation with M. M. Letter from C. C. My second assignation with the nun in my superb casino in Venice. I am happy.

NOTHING CAN be dearer to the thinking man than life; yet the greatest voluptuary is he who best practices the difficult art of making it pass quickly. He does not want to make it shorter; but he wants amusement to render its passing insensible. He is right, if he has not failed in any duty. They who believe that they have no duty save that of pleasing their senses are wrong, and Horace may have been wrong too in the passage where he told Julius Florus[1]: Nec metuam quid de me judicet heres, Quod non plura datis inveniet ("Nor will I fear my heir's judgment of me because he does not find more than I received").[2]

The happiest of men is he who best knows the art of being happy without infringing on his duties; and the unhappiest is he who has adopted a profession in which he is under the sad necessity of foreseeing the future from dawn to dark of every day.

Certain that M. M. would not break her word, I went to the visiting room two hours before noon. My expression made her instantly ask me if I was ill.

"No," I answered; "but I may look so in the uneasy expectation of a happiness too great for me. I have lost appetite and sleep; if it is deferred I cannot answer to you for my life."

"Nothing is deferred, my dear friend; but how impatient you are! Let us sit down. Here is the key to the casino[3] to which you will go. There will be people there, for we have to be served; but no one will speak to you and you need speak to no one. You will be masked. You are not to go there until half past the first hour of night,* [4] no sooner. You will go up the stairs opposite the street door and at the top of the stairs you will see, by the light of a lantern, a green door, which you will open to enter an apartment which you will find lighted. In the second room you will find me, and if I am not there you will wait for me. I will not be more than a few minutes late. You may unmask, sit by the fire, and read. You will find books. The door to the casino is in such-and-such a place."

Since her description could not be more precise, I express my delight that I cannot go wrong. I kiss the hand which gives me the key and the key as well before putting it in my pocket. I ask her if I will see her in secular clothes or dressed as a saint as I now saw her.

"I leave here dressed in my habit, but at the casino I put on secular clothes. There I have everything I need in the way of masking attire too."

"I hope that you will not put on secular clothes this evening."

"Why, if I may ask?"

"I love you so much in your coif, as you are now."

"Ah, I understand. You imagine that I have no hair, so I frighten you; but let me tell you that I have a wig which could not be better made."

---

* According to the Italian reckoning this is two hours after sunset. (C.'s note.)

"Good God! What are you saying? The very name of 'wig' undoes me. But no. No, no; never doubt it—I will think you charming even so. Only be careful not to put it on in my presence. I see that you are mortified. Forgive me. I am in despair that I mentioned it to you. Are you certain that no one will see you leaving the convent?"

"You will be certain of it yourself when, making the circuit of the island in a gondola, you will see where the little quay is. It gives onto a room of which I have the key, and I am sure of the lay sister who waits on me."

"And the gondola?"

"It is my lover who vouches to me for the fidelity of the gondoliers."

"What a man your lover is! I imagine he is old."

"Certainly not. I should be ashamed. I am sure he is not forty. He has everything, my dear friend, to deserve love. Good looks, wit, a gentle nature, and perfect manners."

"And he forgives you your caprices."

"What do you mean by 'caprices'? He took me a year ago. Before him I knew no man, as before you I knew no one who inspired me with a fancy. When I told him everything he was rather surprised, then he laughed and only read me a short lecture on the risk I was running by putting myself in the power of a man who might be indiscreet. He wanted me to know who you are before I went any further; but it was too late. I vouched for you, and he laughed again at my vouching for someone I did not know."

"When did you confide it all to him?"

"Day before yesterday; but completely truthfully. I showed him copies of my letters and of yours, reading which made him say he thought you were French despite your having told me that you were Venetian. He is curious to know who you are, and that is all; but since I am not curious about it you need have no fear. I give you my word of honor that I will never make the slightest attempt to find out.''

''Nor I to find out who this man is, who is as extraordinary as yourself. I am in despair when I think of the bitter sorrow I caused you.''

''Let us say no more about it; but console yourself, for when I think about it I conclude that you could have acted otherwise only if you were a conceited fool.''

When I left she repeated the pledge of her love to me at the little window and she remained there until I was out of the visiting room.

That night at the appointed hour I found the casino without any difficulty, I opened the door and, following her instructions, I found her dressed in secular clothes of the utmost elegance. The room was lighted by candles in girandoles in front of mirrors and by four other candelabra on a table on which there were some books. M. M. seemed to have a beauty entirely different from that which I had seen in the visiting room. Her hair appeared to have been done in a chignon which emphasized its abundance, but my eyes merely glanced at it, for nothing would have been more stupid at the moment than a compliment on her fine wig. To fall on my knees before her, to show her my boundless gratitude by constantly kissing her beautiful hands, were the forerunners of transports whose outcome ought to be a classical amorous combat; but M. M. thought her first duty was to defend herself. Ah! those charming refusals! The strength of two hands repelling the attacks of a respectful and tender lover who is at the same time bold and insistent, played very little part in them; the weapons she used to restrain my passion, to moderate my fire, were arguments delivered in words as amorous as they were energetic and reinforced every moment by loving kisses which melted my soul. In this struggle, as sweet as it was painful to us both, we spent two hours. At the end of the combat we congratulated ourselves on each having carried off the victory; she in having been able to defend herself against all my attacks, I in having kept my impatience in check.

At four o'clock[5] (I am still using the Italian reckoning) she said she was very hungry and that she hoped she would not find me differing from herself. She rang, and a well-dressed woman who was neither young nor old and whose appearance betokened respectability came in and laid a table for two, and after putting everything we needed on another beside us, she served us. The service was of Sèvres porcelain.[6] Eight made dishes composed the supper; they were set on silver boxes filled with hot water which kept the food always hot. It was a choice and delicious supper. I exclaimed that the cook[7] must be French, and she said I was right. We drank only Burgundy, and we emptied a bottle of "oeil de perdrix" champagne[8] and another of some sparkling wine for gaiety. It was she who dressed the salad; her appetite was equal to mine. She rang only to have the dessert brought, together with all the ingredients for making punch. In everything she did I could not but admire her knowledge, her skill, and her grace. It was obvious that she had a lover who had taught her. I was so curious to know who he was that I said I was ready to tell her my name if she would tell me that of the happy man whose heart and soul she possessed. She said we must leave it to time to satisfy our curiosity.

Among her watch charms she had a little rock-crystal flask exactly like the one I had on my watch chain. I showed it to her, praising the essence of rose which it contained and with which a small piece of cotton was soaked. She showed me hers, which was filled with the same essence in liquid form.

"I am surprised," I said, "for it is very rare and it costs a great deal."

"And it is not for sale."

"That is true. The creator of the essence is the King of France; he made a pound of it, which cost him ten thousand écus."

"It was a present to my lover, who gave it to me."

"Madame de Pompadour sent a small flask of it two years ago to Signor Mocenigo,[9] the Venetian Ambassador in Paris, through the A. de B.,[10] who is now the French Ambassador here."

"Do you know him?"

"I met him that day, having the honor to dine with him. As he was about to set out on his journey here, he had come to take his leave. He is a man whom Fortune has favored, but a man of merit and great wit and of distinguished birth, for he is a Count of Lyons.[11] His handsome face has won him the nickname of 'Belle-Babet';[12] we have a little collection of his poems,[13] which do him honor."

Midnight had struck and, since time was beginning to be precious, we leave the table, and before the fire I become insistent. I said that if she would not yield to love she could not refuse nature, which must be urging her to go to bed after such a fine supper.

"Are you sleepy, then?"

"Not in the least; but at this hour people go to bed. Let me put you to bed and sit by your side as long as you wish to stay there, or else permit me to retire."

"If you leave me you will make me very unhappy."

"No more unhappy than I shall feel at leaving you; but what are we to do here in front of the fire until dawn?"

"We can both sleep in our clothes on the sofa you see there."

"In our clothes? So be it. I can even let you sleep; but if I do not sleep will you forgive me? Beside you, and uncomfortable in my clothes, how could I sleep?"

"Very well. Besides, this sofa is a real bed. You shall see."

With that she rises, pulls the sofa out at an angle, arranges pillows, sheets, and a blanket, and I see a real bed. She tucks my hair under a large handkerchief and hands me another so that I can do her the same service, saying that she has no nightcap. I set to work, concealing my distaste for her wig, when something totally unexpected gives me the most agreeable surprise. Instead of a wig, I find the most beautiful head of hair. She tells me, after laughing heartily, that a nun's only obligation is not to let the outside world see her hair, and after saying so she throws herself down at full length on the couch. I quickly take off my coat, kick my feet out of my shoes, and fall more on her than beside her. She clasps me in her arms, and subjecting herself to a tyranny which insults nature, she considers that I must forgive her all the torments which her resistance cannot but inflict on me.

With a trembling and timid hand and looking at her with eyes which begged for charity, I undo six wide ribbons which fastened her dress in front and, ravished with joy because she does not stop me, I find myself the fortunate master of the most beautiful of bosoms. It is too late: she is obliged, after I have contemplated it, to let me devour it; I raise my eyes to her face, and I see the sweetness of love saying to me: "Be content with that, and learn from me to bear abstinence." Driven by love and by omnipotent nature, in despair because she will not let my hands move elsewhere, I make every imaginable effort to guide one of hers to the place where she could have convinced herself that I deserved her mercy; but with a strength greater than mine she refuses to remove her hands from my chest, where she could have found nothing to interest her. Nevertheless, it was there that her mouth descended when it detached itself from mine.

Whether from need or from the effect of lassitude, having passed so many hours unable to do anything but constantly swallow her saliva mixed with mine, I sleep in her arms, holding her clasped in mine. What woke me with a start was a loud chiming of bells.

"What is that?"

"Let us dress quickly, my dear, my love; I must get back to the convent."

"Then dress. I am going to enjoy the spectacle of seeing you disguised as a saint again."

"Gladly. If you are not in any hurry you can sleep here."

She then rang for the same woman, who I realized must be the great confidante of all her amorous mysteries. After having her hair done up, she took off her dress, put her watches, her rings, and all her secular ornaments in a desk, which she locked, put on the shoes of her order, then a corset in which, as in a prison, she confined the pretty children which alone had fed me on their nectar, and finally put on her habit. Her confidante having gone out to summon the gondolier, she flung herself on my neck and said that she would expect me the next day but one to decide on the night she would come to spend with me in Venice, where, she said, we would make each other completely happy; and she left. Very well pleased with my good fortune, though full of unsatisfied desires, I put out the candles and slept deeply until noon.

I left the casino without seeing anyone, and, well masked, went to call on Laura, who gave me a letter from C. C. which ran as follows:

"Here, my dear husband, is a good example of my way of thinking. You will find me ever more worthy to be your wife. You must believe that, despite my age, I can keep a secret and that I am discreet enough not to take your silence in bad part. Sure of your heart, I am not jealous of what can divert your mind and help you to bear our separation patiently.

"I must tell you that yesterday, going through a corridor which is above the small visiting room and wanting to pick up a toothpick I had dropped, I had to take a stool away from the wall. Picking it up, I saw through an almost imperceptible crack where the floor meets the wall your own person very much interested in conversing with my dear friend Mother M. M. You cannot imagine either my surprise or my joy. Yet those two feelings instantly gave place to my fear of being seen and making some babbling nun curious. After quickly putting the stool back in its place, I left. Ah, my dear! I beg you to tell me everything. How could I love you and not be curious about the whole story of this remarkable occurrence? Tell me if she knows you, and how you made her acquaintance. She is my dear friend, of whom I told you, and whom I did not think it necessary to name to you. It is she who has taught me French and she has given me books in her room which have enlightened me on a very important matter of which few women have any knowledge. Know that but for her the terrible illness which almost killed me would have been discovered. She gave me linen and sheets; I owe her my honor; and so she learned that I have had a lover, as I have learned that she has had one too, but we were never curious about our respective secrets. Mother M. M. is an incomparable woman. I am certain, my dear, that you love her and that she loves you, and since I am not in the least jealous of her I deserve that you should tell me all about it. But I am sorry for you both, for all that either of you can do can only serve, I believe, to excite your mutual passion. The whole convent believes that you are ill; I am dying to see you. So come at least once. Farewell."

The letter made me uneasy, for I felt very sure of C. C., but the crack might betray us to others. In addition, I now had to tell my darling a lie, for honor and love forbade me to tell her the truth. In the answer which I immediately sent her I said that she must at once inform her friend that she had seen her through the crack, talking to a masker. As for my having made the nun's acquaintance, I said that having heard of her rare qualities I had had her called to the grating, announcing myself under a false name, and that consequently she must refrain from talking about me, for she had recognized me as the same man who went to hear mass at her church. As for love, I assured her that there was no such thing between us, though I agreed that she was a charming woman.

On St. Catherine's Day,[14] which was C. C.'s name day, I went to mass in her church. Going to the traghetto to take a gondola, I observe that I am followed. I needed to make sure of it. I see the same man also take a gondola and follow me; this could be natural; but to make certain I disembark in Venice at the Palazzo Morosini del Giardino,[15] and I see the same man disembarking too. After that I am in no more doubt. I come out of the palace, I stop in a narrow street near the Flanders post,[16] and, knife in hand, I force him into the corner of the street and, putting the point to his throat, I insist on his telling me at whose order he is following me. He would perhaps have told me all if someone had not happened to enter the street. At that he got away, and I learned nothing. But seeing that it was only too easy for a busybody to know who I was if he persisted in trying to find out, I resolved not to go to Murano again except masked or at night.

The next day, which was the one on which M. M. was to let me know how she would arrange to come to supper with me, I went to the visiting room very early. I saw her before me, displaying on her face the signs of the contentment which flooded her soul. The first compliment she paid me was on my appearing at her church after three weeks during which I had not been seen there. She told me that the Abbess had been very pleased, because she said she was sure she knew who I was. I thereupon told her the story of the spy, and my resolve not to go to mass in her church again. She replied that I would do well to show myself in Murano as little as possible. She then told me the whole story of the crack in the old flooring and said that it had already been stopped up. She said she had been warned by a boarder at the convent who was fond of her, but she did not name her.

After these few remarks I asked her if my happiness was deferred, and she answered that it was deferred only for twenty-four hours because the new lay sister had invited her to supper in her room.

“Such invitations,” she said, “come seldom, but when they do one cannot refuse except at the cost of making an enemy of the person who extends the invitation.”

“Can one not say one is ill?”

“Yes, but then one must receive visitors.”

“I understand, for if you refuse you may be suspected of slipping away.”

“Then you are the only one who can perform the miracle?”

“You may be sure that I am the only one, and that gold is the powerful god who performs it. So tell me where you will wait for me tomorrow precisely at the second hour of the night.”

“Could not I wait for you here[17] at your casino?”

“No, for the person who will take me to Venice is my lover.”

“Your lover?”

“Himself.”

“That is something new! Well then, I will wait for you in the Piazza dei Santi Giovanni e Paolo, behind the pedestal of the equestrian statue of Bartolomeo da Bergamo.”[18]

“I have never seen either the statue or the square except in an engraving; but I will not fail to be there. You have told me enough. Nothing but terribly bad weather could keep me from coming; but let us hope for good. So good-by. We will talk much tomorrow evening, and if we sleep we shall go to sleep more content.”

I had to act quickly, for I had no casino. I took a second rower, so that I was in the San Marco quarter in less than a quarter of an hour. After spending five or six hours looking at a number of them, I chose the most elegant and hence the most expensive. It had belonged to Lord Holderness,[19] the English Ambassador, who had sold it cheaply to a cook on his departure. He rented it to me until Easter for a hundred zecchini in advance, on condition that he himself would cook the suppers and dinners I might give.

The casino had five rooms, furnished in exquisite taste. It contained nothing that was not made for the sake of love, good food, and every kind of pleasure. Meals were served through a blind window which was set back into the wall and filled by a revolving dumb-waiter which closed it completely. The masters and the servants could not see one another. The room was decorated with mirrors, chandeliers, and a magnificent pier glass above a white marble fireplace; and the walls were tiled with small squares of painted Chinese porcelain, all attracting interest by their representations of amorous couples in a state of nature, whose voluptuous attitudes fired the imagination. Some small armchairs matched the sofas which were placed to left and right. Another room was octagonal and walled with mirrors, with floor and ceiling of the same; the counterposed mirrors reflected the same objects from innumerable points of view. The room was next to an alcove, which gave by concealed doors onto a dressing room on one side and on the other a boudoir in which were a bathtub and an English-style water closet. All the wainscoting was embossed in ormolu or painted with flowers and arabesques. After telling him not to forget to put sheets on the bed and candles in all the chandeliers and in the candelabra in each room, I ordered him to prepare a supper for two for that evening, warning him that I wanted no wines except Burgundy and champagne and no more than eight made dishes, leaving the choice to him regardless of expense. He was to see to the dessert too. Taking the key to the street door I warned him that when I came in I wished to see no one. The supper was to be ready at the second hour[20] of night and was to be served when I rang. I observed with pleasure that the clock in the alcove had an alarm, for despite my love I was beginning to succumb to the power of sleep.

After giving these orders I went to a milliner's to buy a pair of slippers and a nightcap trimmed with a double ruffle of Alençon point.[21] I put it in my pocket. Since I was to give supper to the most beautiful of all the sultanas of the Master of the Universe, I wanted to make sure the evening before that everything would be in order. Having told her that I had a casino, I must not appear to be a novice in any respect.

It was the cook who was surprised when he saw me at the second hour all alone. I instantly berated him for not having lighted candles everywhere, when, as I had told him the hour, he could be in no doubt about it.

"I will not fail to do so another time."

"Then light up and serve."

"You told me it would be for two."

"Serve for two. Remain present at my supper this first time, so that I can point out to you everything I find good or bad."

The supper came in the dumb-waiter in good order, two dishes at a time; I commented on everything; but I found everything excellent in Saxon porcelain.[22] Game, sturgeon, truffles, oysters, and perfect wines. I only reproached him with having forgotten to set out hard-boiled eggs, anchovies, and prepared vinegars on a dish, to make the salad. He rolled up his eyes with a contrite look, accusing himself of having committed a great crime. I also said that another time I wanted to have bitter oranges to give flavor to the punch and that I wanted rum, not arrack. After spending two hours at table I told him to bring me the account of all that he had spent. He brought it a quarter of an hour later, and I found it satisfactory. After paying him and ordering him to bring me coffee when I should ring, I retired to the excellent bed which was in the alcove. The bed and the good supper won me the most perfect sleep. But for them, I should not have been able to sleep for thinking that on the next night I should have my goddess in my arms in that very bed. On leaving in the morning I told my man that for dessert I wanted all the fresh fruits he could find and, above all, ices. To keep the day from seeming long I gambled until nightfall and I did not find Fortune different from my love. Everything went just as I wished. In the depths of my soul I gave thanks for it to the powerful Genius of my beautiful nun.

It was at the first hour[23] of night that I took up my post by the statue of the heroic Colleoni. She had told me to be there at the second hour, but I wanted to have the sweet pleasure of waiting for her. The night was cold, but magnificent, and without the least wind.

Exactly at the second hour I saw a gondola with two rowers arrive and disembark a masker, who, after speaking to the gondolier at the prow, came toward the statue. Seeing a male masker, I am alarmed, I slip away, and I regret not having pistols. The masker walks around the statue, comes up to me, and offers me a peaceable hand which leaves me in no more doubt. I recognize my angel dressed as a man. She laughs at my surprise, clings to my arm, and without a word between us we make our way to the Piazza San Marco, cross it, and go to the casino, which was only a hundred paces from the Teatro San Moisè.

Everything is as I have ordered. We go upstairs, I quickly unmask, but M. M. gives herself the pleasure of walking slowly through every corner of the delicious place in which she was being received, delighted that I should see all the graces of her person in every profile and often in full face and admire in her clothing what kind of man the lover who possessed her must be. She was surprised at the magic which everywhere showed her her person from a hundred different points of view at the same time even when she stood still. The multiplied portraits of her which the mirrors offered her by the light of all the candles expressly placed for the purpose were a new spectacle which made her fall in love with herself. Sitting on a stool I attentively examined all the elegance of her attire. A coat of short-napped rose velvet edged with an embroidery of gold spangles, a matching hand-embroidered waistcoat, than which nothing could be richer, black satin breeches, needle-lace ruffles, buckles set with brilliants, a solitaire of great value on her little finger and on her other hand a ring which showed only a surface of white taffeta covered by a convex crystal. Her bautta[24] of black blond-lace was as beautiful as possible in both design and fineness. So that I could see her even better she came and stood in front of me. I search her pockets and I find a snuffbox, a comfit box, a phial, a case of toothpicks, a pair of opera glasses, and handkerchiefs exhaling scents which sweetened the air. I attentively examine the richness and workmanship of her two watches and of her fine seals hung as pendants from chains covered with small diamonds. I search her side pockets and I find flintlock pistols with a spring firing mechanism, of the finest English manufacture.

"All that I see," I say, "is beneath you, but permit my astonished soul to do homage to the adorable being who wishes to convince you that you are really his mistress."

"That is what he said when I asked him to take me to Venice and leave me there, adding that his wish was that I should enjoy myself there and become ever more convinced that he whom I was about to make happy deserved it."

"It is unbelievable, my dear. Such a lover is one of a kind, and I can never deserve a happiness by which I am already dazzled."

"Let me go and unmask by myself."

A quarter of an hour later she appeared before me with her beautiful hair dressed like a man's but unpowdered and with side locks in long curls which came down to the bottom of her cheeks. A black ribbon tied it behind, and it fell to her knees in a hanging plait. M. M. as a woman resembled Henriette,[25] and as a man a Guards officer named L'Étorière[26] whom I had known in Paris; or rather she resembled the youth Antinoüs,[27] whose statues are still to be seen, if her French clothes had permitted the illusion.

Overwhelmed by so many charms, I thought I felt ill. I threw myself on the sofa to support my head.

"I have lost all my confidence," I said; "you will never be mine; this very night some fatal mishap will tear you from my desires; perhaps a miracle performed by your divine spouse in his jealousy of a mortal. I feel prostrated. In a quarter of an hour I may no longer exist."

"Are you mad? I am yours this moment if you wish. Though I have not eaten I do not care about supper. Let us go to bed."

She felt cold. We sit down before the fire. She tells me that she has no vest on. I unfasten a diamond brooch in the shape of a heart which kept her ruffle closed, and my hands feel before my eyes see what only her shirt defended against the air, the two springs of life which ornamented her bosom. I become ardent; but she needs only a single kiss to calm me, and two words: "After supper."

I ring, and seeing her alarm I show her the dumbwaiter.

"No one will see you," I say; "you must tell your lover, who may not know of this device."

"He knows of it; but he will admire your thoughtfulness and will say that you are no novice in the art of pleasing and that clearly I am not the only woman who enjoys the delights of this little house with you."

"And he will be wrong. I have neither supped nor slept here except alone; and I hate deceit. You are not my first passion, my divine love; but you will be my last."

"I am happy, my dear, if you will be faithful. My lover is so; he is kind, he is gentle; but he has always left my heart empty."

"His must be so too, for if his love were like mine he would not permit you an absence of this kind. He could not put up with it."

"He loves me, as I love you; do you believe that I love you?"

"I must believe it; but you would not put up with—"

"Say no more; for I feel that, if you will not keep anything from me, I will forgive you everything. The joy which I feel in my soul at this moment is due more to my certainty that I shall leave you wanting nothing than to my certainty that I shall spend a delicious night with you. It will be the first in my life."

"Then you have not spent nights with your worthy lover?"

"Yes, but those nights were inspired only by friendship, gratitude, and compliance. Love is what counts. Despite that, my lover is like you. He has a natural vivacity and his wit is always ready, like yours; besides which both his face and his person are attractive, though he does not resemble you in looks. I also think he is richer than you are, though this casino might make one conclude the opposite. But do not imagine that I consider you less deserving than he because you confess that you are incapable of the heroism of permitting me an absence; on the contrary, if you told me that you would be as indulgent as he is to one of my caprices, I should know that you do not love me as I am very glad that you do love me."

"Will he wish to know the details of this night?"

"He will believe that it will please me if he asks me about it, and I shall tell him everything except some circumstances which might humiliate him."

After the supper, which she found choice and exquisite, as she did the ices and the oysters, she made punch, and in my amorous impatience, after drinking several glasses of it, I begged her to consider that we had only seven hours before us and that we should be doing very wrong not to spend them in bed. So we went into the alcove, which was lighted by twelve flaming candles, and from there to the dressing room, where, presenting her with the fine lace cap, I asked her to dress her hair like a woman. After saying that the cap was magnificent she told me to go and undress in the outer room, promising that she would call me as soon as she was in bed.

It took only two minutes. I flung myself into her burning arms, on fire with love and giving her the most lively proofs of it for seven continuous hours which were interrupted only by as many quarters of an hour devoted to the most feeling talk. She taught me nothing new so far as the physical side of the performance was concerned, but any quantity of new things in the way of sighs, ecstasies, transports, and unfeigned sentiments which find scope only at such moments. Each discovery I made elevated my soul to Love, who furnished me with fresh strength to show him my gratitude. She was astonished to find herself capable of so much pleasure, for I had shown her many things which she thought were fictions. I did what she did not think she was entitled to ask me to do to her, and I taught her that the slightest constraint spoils the greatest of pleasures. When the alarm chimed she raised her eyes to the Third Heaven[28] like an idolator, to thank the Mother and the Son[29] for having so well rewarded her for the effort it had cost her to declare her passion to me.

We dressed in haste, and seeing me put the beautiful cap in her pocket she assured me that it would always be most dear to her. After taking coffee we hurried to the Piazza dei Santi Giovanni e Paolo, where I left her, assuring her that she would see me on the next day but one. After watching her get into her gondola I went home, where ten hours of sleep restored me to my normal state.

CHAPTER IV

Continuation of the preceding chapter. Visit to the convent and conversation with M. M. Letter which she writes me and my answer. Another meeting at the casino in Murano in the presence of her lover.

ON THE next day but one I went to the visiting room after dinner. I send for her, and she comes at once and tells me to leave, for she is expecting her lover, but that I must come without fail on the following day. I leave. At the end of the bridge I see a poorly masked masker getting out of a gondola the gondolier of which I knew and had good reason to believe was then in the service of the French Ambassador. He was not in livery, and the gondola was plain, like all gondolas belonging to Venetians. I turn and see the masker going to the convent. I feel no more doubt, and I go back to Venice delighted to have made the discovery and pleased that the Ambassador was my senior partner. I resolve to say nothing about it to M. M.

I go to see her the next day and she tells me that her friend had come to take leave of her until the Christmas holidays.

"He is going to Padua," she says, "but everything is arranged for us to sup at his casino if we wish."

"Why not in Venice?"

"No, not in Venice, until he is back. He asked me not to. He has great judgment."

"Very well. When shall we sup at the casino?"

"Sunday, if you like."

"Let it be Sunday; I will go to the casino at dusk and will read while I wait for you. Did you tell your friend that you were not uncomfortable in my casino?"

"My dear, I told him everything; but one thing greatly troubles him. He wants me to beg you not to expose me to the danger of a big belly."

"May I die if it ever entered my mind. But don't you run the same risk with him?"

"Never."

"Then we must be very careful in future. I think, since there is no masking[1] during the nine days before Christmas, I shall have to go to your casino by water, for if I go by land I could easily be recognized as the same man who went to your church."

"That is very prudent. I can easily point out the quay to you. I think you can come during Lent too, when God wants us to mortify our senses. Isn't it odd that there is a time when God approves of our amusing ourselves and another when we can only please him by abstinence! What can an anniversary have in common with the divinity? I do not understand how the action of the creature can influence the creator, whom my reason can only conceive as independent. It seems to me that if God had created man with the power to offend him, man would be justified in doing everything he forbade him to do, if only to teach him how to create. Can one imagine God being sad during Lent?"

"My divine one, you reason perfectly; but may I ask you where you learned to reason, and how you managed to break away?"

"My friend gave me good books, and the light of truth quickly dissipated the clouds of superstition which were oppressing my reason. I assure you that when I reflect on myself I think I am more fortunate in having found someone who has enlightened my mind than unfortunate in having taken the veil, for the greatest happiness of all is to live and die at peace, which we cannot hope to do if we believe what the priests tell us."

"You are very right; but permit me to wonder at you, for enlightening an extremely prejudiced mind such as yours must have been could not be the work of a few months."

"I should have seen the light much less quickly if I had been less steeped in error. What separated the true from the false in my mind was only a curtain; reason alone could draw it; but I had been taught to scorn reason. As soon as I was shown that I should set the greatest store by it I put it to work; it drew the curtain. The evidence of truth appeared with the utmost clarity, my stupid notions disappeared; and I have no reason to fear that they will reappear, for I strengthen my defenses every day. I can say that I did not begin to love God until after I had rid myself of the idea of him which religion had given me."

"I congratulate you. You were more fortunate than I. You have gone further in a year than I in ten."

"Then you did not begin by reading what Lord Bolingbroke[2] has written. Five or six months ago I was reading Charron's[3] La Sagesse, and I don't know how our confessor found it out. He dared to tell me at confession that I must stop reading it. I answered that since my conscience was not troubled by it, I could not obey him. He said that he would not absolve me, and I answered that I would go to communion nevertheless. The priest went to Bishop Diedo[4] to ask what he should do, and the Bishop came to talk with me and gave me to understand that I should be guided by my confessor. I answered that my confessor's business was to absolve me, and that he did not even have the right to advise me unless I asked him for advice. I told him outright that, since it was my duty not to scandalize the entire convent, if he persisted in refusing me absolution I would go to communion nevertheless. The Bishop ordered him to leave me to my conscience. But I was not satisfied. My lover procured me a brief from the Pope which authorizes me to confess to anyone I choose. All my sisters are jealous of the privilege; but I used it only once, for the thing is not worth the trouble. I always confess to the same priest, who has no difficulty in absolving me, for I tell him absolutely nothing of any importance."

So it was that I came to know her as an adorable freethinker; but it could not be otherwise, for she had an even greater need to quiet her conscience than to satisfy her senses.

After assuring her that she would find me at the casino I went back to Venice. On Sunday after dinner I had myself rowed around the island of Murano in a two-oared gondola, to see where the quay for the casino was and also the small one by which she left the convent; but I could make out nothing. I did not find the quay for the casino until during the novena,[5] and the small quay for the convent six months later at the risk of my life. We shall speak of it when we come to that time.

About the first hour of night I went to the temple of my love and, waiting for my idol to arrive, I amused myself by looking at the books which made up a small library in the boudoir. They were few but choice. They included all that the wisest philosophers have written against religion and all that the most voluptuous pens have written on the subject which is the sole aim of love. Seductive books, whose incendiary style drives the reader to seek the reality, which alone can quench the fire he feels running through his veins. Besides the books there were folios containing only lascivious engravings. Their great merit lay in the beauty of the drawing far more than in the lubricity of the poses. I saw engravings for the Portier des Chartreux,[6] made in England, and others for Meursius,[7] or Aloisia Sigea Toletana, than which I had never seen anything finer. In addition the small pictures which decorated the room were so well painted that the figures seemed to be alive. An hour went by in an instant.

The appearance of M. M. in her nun's habit wrung a cry from me. I told her, springing to embrace her, that she could not have come in better time to prevent a schoolboy masturbation to which all that I had seen during the past hour would have driven me.

"But in that saintly dress you surprise me. Let me adore you here and now, my angel."

"I will put on secular clothes at once. It will take me only a quarter of an hour. I do not like myself in these woolens."

"No, no. You shall receive the homage of love dressed as you were when you brought it to birth."

She answered only with a Fiat voluntas tua ("Thy will be done") delivered with the most devout expression as she let herself fall on the commodious sofa, where I treated her with caution despite herself. After the act I helped her take off her habit and put on a plain robe of Pekin muslin which was the height of elegance. I then played the role of chambermaid while she dressed her hair and put on a nightcap.

After supper, before going to bed we agreed not to meet again until the first day of the novena when, the theaters being closed for ten days, masks are not worn. She then gave me the keys to the door giving onto the quay. A blue ribbon fastened to the window above it was to be the signal which would show it to me by day, so that I could later go there by night. But what filled her with joy was that I went to stay in the casino and never left it until her lover returned. During the ten days I stayed there I had her four times and thereby convinced her that I lived only for her. I amused myself reading, or writing to C. C., but my love for the latter had grown calm. The chief thing which interested me in the letters she wrote me was what she told me about her dear friend Mother M. M. She said that I had done wrong not to cultivate her acquaintance, and I answered that I had not pursued it for fear of being recognized. In this way I made her even more obliged to keep my secret inviolably.

It is not possible to love two objects at once, and it is not possible to keep love vigorous if one either gives it too much food or none at all. What kept my passion for M. M. always at the same pitch was that I could never have her except with the greatest fear of losing her. I told her it was impossible that, one time or another, some nun would not need to speak with her at a time when she was neither in her room nor in the convent. She maintained that it could not happen, since nothing was more respected in the convent than a nun's privilege of shutting herself up in her room and denying herself even to the Abbess. She had nothing to fear but the fatal circumstance of a fire, for then, when everything was in confusion and it was not natural that a nun would remain calm and indifferent, her absence must necessarily become known. She congratulated herself on having been able to win over the lay sister, the gardener, and another nun whom she always refused to name. Her lover's tact and his money had done it all, and he vouched for the fidelity of the cook and his wife, who together took care of the casino. He was sure of his gondoliers, too, despite the fact that one of them must certainly be a spy for the State Inquisitors.

On Christmas Eve she told me that her lover was about to arrive, that she was to go with him to the opera[8] on St. Stephen's Day and sup with him at the casino on the third day of Christmas. After saying that she would expect me for supper on the last day of the year she gave me a letter, asking me not to read it until I was at home.

An hour before dawn I packed my things and went to the Palazzo Bragadin, where, impatient to read the letter she had given me, I immediately locked myself in my room. It ran as follows:

"You nettled me a little, my dear, when day before yesterday, on the subject of my having to keep everything about my lover from you, you said that, satisfied with possessing my heart, you leave me mistress of my mind. Dividing heart and mind is a sophistical distinction, and if it does not seem so to you, you must admit that you do not love the whole of me, for it is impossible that I can exist without a mind and that you can cherish my heart if it is not in accord with it. If your love can be content with the contrary, it does not excel in delicacy.

"But since circumstances may arise in which you could convict me of not having acted toward you with all the sincerity which true love demands, I have resolved to reveal a secret concerning my lover to you, despite the fact that I know he is certain I will never reveal it, for it is treachery. Yet you will not love me the less for it. Reduced to choosing between the two of you, and obliged to deceive one or the other, love has conquered in me; but not blindly. You shall weigh the motives which had the power to tip the scales to your side.

"When I could no longer resist my desire to know you intimately I could not satisfy it except by confiding in my friend. I had no doubt of his willingness. He conceived a very favorable idea of your character when he read your first letter, in which you chose the visiting room, and he thought you showed yourself a man of honor when, after we became acquainted, you chose the casino in Murano in preference to your own. But as soon as he learned of it he also asked me to do him the favor of allowing him to be present at our first interview ensconced in a perfect hiding place from which he would not only see all that we did without himself being seen but also hear all that we said. It is a closet whose existence cannot even be guessed. You did not see it during the ten days you spent in the casino; but I will show it to you on the last day of the year. Tell me if I could refuse him the favor. I granted it; and nothing was more natural than to keep it a secret from you. So now you know that my friend witnessed all that we said and did the first time we were together. But do not take it amiss, my darling; you pleasesd him, not only by everything you did but also by all the amusing things you said to me. I felt very anxious when our conversation turned to the nature my lover must have to be so excessively tolerant; but fortunately all that you said could only be flattering to him. This is the complete confession of my treachery, which, as a sensible lover, you must forgive me, and the more so since it did you no harm. I can assure you that my friend is most curious to know who you are. That night you were natural and very likable; if you had known that you were being watched God knows what you would have been. If I had told you the thing it is even possible that you would not have consented, and you would perhaps have been right.

''But now I must risk everything for the sake of everything and make myself easy, knowing that I have done nothing for which I can be reproached. Know, my dear, that on the last day of the year my friend will be at the casino, and that he will not leave it until the next day. You will not see him, and he will see everything. Since you are not supposed to know, you understand how natural you must be in everything, for if you were not, my friend, who is very intelligent, might suspect that I have betrayed the secret. The principal thing you must be careful about is what you say. He has all the virtues except the theological one called faith, and on that subject you have free rein. You can talk of literature, travel, politics, and tell as many anecdotes as you please, and be sure of his approval.

"The question remains whether you are willing to let a man see you during the moments when you surrender to the furies of love. This uncertainty is now my torment. Yes or no: there is no middle course. Do you understand how painful my fear is? Do you feel how difficult it must have been for me to take this step? I shall not sleep tomorrow night. I shall have no rest until I have read your answer. I will then decide on a course in case you answer that you cannot be affectionate in someone's presence, especially if the 'someone' is unknown to you. Yet I hope that you will come nevertheless, and that if you cannot play the role of lover as you did the first time no bad consequences will ensue. He will believe, and I will let him believe, that your love has cooled."

Her letter surprised me greatly; then, after thinking it over, I laughed. But it would not have made me laugh if I had not known what sort of man it was who would witness my amorous exploits. Certain that M. M. must be very uneasy until she received my answer, I answered her at once, in the following terms:

"My divine angel, I want you to receive my answer to your letter before noon. You shall dine perfectly easy.
